THE DECISIONS

OF THE

Supreme Court of the United States,

AT

OCTOBER TERM, 1885.

[3] SAMUEL H. EMERSON (as Interpleader), Plff. in Err.,
v.
W. M. SENTER AND W. T. WILKINS, as SENTER & Co.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 3-10.)

Partnership—assignment for benefit of creditors by surviving partner—fraud of assignor.

A sole surviving partner of an insolvent firm, who is himself insolvent, can make a valid assignment of partnership assets for the benefit of the joint creditors, with preferences to some of them, there being no statute forbidding it; and such assignment, being valid, is not rendered void because of the fraudulent omission by the surviving partner, from the schedules, of certain partnership property for his own benefit, the assignee and the beneficiaries of the trust being ignorant of the fraud.

Submitted Mar. 9, 1886, Decided April 12, 1886.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Arkansas. Reversed with directions.

The case is stated by the court.

Mr. U. M. Rose, for plaintiff in error:

That a surviving partner has the power to make an assignment for the benefit of creditors has been settled by the case of Hoyt v. Sprague, 103 U. S. 613 (Bk. 26, L. ed. 585), where such an assignment was upheld and enforced. The power naturally results from the full control which the surviving partner has over the partnership assets.

The power to prefer one creditor to another is incident to the power to assign.

Brooks v. Marbury, 11 Wheat. 78 (24 U. S. bk. 6, L. ed. 423); Clarke v. White, 12 Pet. 200 (37 U. S. bk. 9, L. ed. 1055); Tompkins v. Wheeler, 16 Pet. 106 (41 U. S. bk. 10, L. ed. 903); Ex parte Conway, 4 Ark. 123; Hempstead v. Johnson, 18 Ark. 123; Mandel v. Peay, 20 Ark. 329.

There can be no reason why surviving partners should be made exceptions to this rule. They can prefer creditors at any time by payment; and if they can prefer by payment, they can prefer by an assignment, which is only a means of raising a fund for payment.

When a man is insolvent, and his creditors prevail on him to execute an assignment for their protection, and they and their assignee take the property in good faith, their claims ought not to be defeated because the assignor has acted fraudulently. Having acquired the entire interest in the property assigned, they ought to stand as well as though they had obtained a mortgage or deed of trust upon it. The mere fact that the assignor had concealed some of his property from the assignee is no reason why the part which he has turned over, and which has been received in good faith, should not be applied to the payment of debts.

Marbury v. Brooks, 7 Wheat. 556 (20 U. S. bk. 5, L. ed. 522); Brooks v. Marbury, supra; Bancroft v. Blizzard, 13 Ohio, 80; Thomas v. Talmadge, 16 Ohio St. 439; Meyers v. Kinzie, 26 Ill. 36; Gates v. Labaume, 19 Mo. 17; Wise v. Mimer, 28 Mo. 237; State v. Keeler, 49 Mo. 548; Sipe v. Earman, 26 Gratt. 568; Wilson v. Davenport, 7 Cold. 32; Hollister v. Loud, 2 Mich. 309; Abercrombie v. Bradford, 16 Ala. 560; Governor v. Campbell, 17 Ala. 566; Cornish v. Dews, 18 Ark. 172; Hempstead v. Johnson, 18 Ark. 124; Mandel v. Peay, 20 Ark. 329.

It having been settled by three adjudications of the Supreme Court of Arkansas that the creditors provided for in the assignment are not to be affected by the fraud of the assignor, it has become a construction of its Statute of Frauds, and a rule of property for its citizens, which will be enforced in the courts of the United States.

Mr. Thos. C. McRae, for defendants in error:

We submit that a surviving partner has no power to make an assignment of the partnership assets in his hands, for the benefit of creditors, with preferences; and therefore the instrument under which appellant claims is bad.

Surviving partners are held strictly as trustees.

Wherever property is held by a person as a trustee for the benefit of creditors and others, he cannot assign the same with preferences.

Robins v. Embry, 1 Smedes & M. Ch. 207; Richards v. N. Hampshire Ins. Co. 43 N. H. 263.

The partner having control of the assets of a dissolved copartnership, under an agreement empowering him to wind up the business, has no authority to make an assignment for the benefit of the creditors of the partnership with preferences, and such an assignment is illegal.

Marsh v. Bennett, 5 McLean, 117; Bancroft v. Snodgrass, 1 Colo. 430, 439.

It is claimed that the power to prefer is incident to the power to assign.

We deny the sequence. Limited partnerships may make general assignments, and yet may not make preferences.

Burrill, Assignments, 3d ed. §§ 90, 171; Ark. Digest, 1884, § 4842.

It is also said that inasmuch as surviving partners can prefer creditors at any time by payment, so can they by assignment.

But paying or securing a creditor is not equivalent to preferring him in an assignment.

Burrill, 2d ed. §§ 167, 168.

Wall v. Lakin, 18 Met. 167, and see pp. 171, 172; U. S. v. Bank of U. S. 8 Rob. (La.) 262, 404.

The fraud of the assignor is alone the criterion.

The assignee gives no consideration, ordinarily understood as valuable, by which his status quo is changed. The creditors ordinarily give no additional consideration.

The assignee takes the place of the assignor, and is in no better position.

Jur. pp. 209, 749; Bump, Fraud. Conv. 2d ed. p. 488.

Mr. Justice Harlan delivered the opinion of the court:

Butler and Moores constituted a mercantile firm doing business in the State of Arkansas under the name of A. Butler & Co. The former died on the 17th day of December, 1881, [4] and thereafter, February 23, 1882, Moores, as surviving partner, executed a deed of assignment to Emerson, the plaintiff in error. The deed recited the death of Butler, the insufficiency of assets to discharge the partnership debts, and the desire of Moores, as surviving partner, to provide for their payment, so far as in his power, "by an assignment of all the property belonging to him as such surviving partner." The grantor, for the purposes named, and in consideration of one dollar paid by the grantee, transferred and assigned to Emerson, his successors and assigns, "all the stock in trade, goods, wares and merchandise, debts, choses in action, property and effects of every description, belonging to the said firm of A. Butler & Co." or to the grantor, "as such surviving partner, mentioned, contained, or referred to in the schedule hereunto annexed." The conveyance was in trust that the assignee take possession of the property described, "sell the same as provided by law, and, with all reasonable dispatch," collect the debts and demands assigned and apply the proceeds: (1) to pay all the just and reasonable expenses, costs and charges of executing the assignment, and carrying into effect the trust thereby created; (2) to pay in full, if the residue of the proceeds is sufficient for that purpose, all the debts and liabilities then due or to become due from Moores, as surviving partner, with interest thereon, to certain preferred creditors, among whom were the defendants in error, Senter & Co.; (3) to apply the balance to all other debts and liabilities of A. Butler & Co., or of Moores, as surviving partner; (4) to repay the latter, as surviving partner, whatever may remain after meeting the costs and expenses of the trust, and the amounts due respectively to other creditors.

The deed invested the assignee with all the power and authority necessary to the full execution of the trust created by it. It was accepted by Emerson and by some of the preferred creditors therein mentioned.

The debts of the firm largely exceeded its assets, and Moores individually, as well as surviving partner, was insolvent when he made the assignment. In addition to the recitals in the deed of a desire to make an assignment of all the property in his hands as surviving partner [5] Moores represented to his creditors that he had done so. Nevertheless, for the purpose of hindering and cheating his creditors, he omitted from his schedule $500 worth of goods which belonged to him as surviving partner; and, with like intent, left out of the schedule and withheld from his assignee $1,000 in cash and other property which he held as surviving partner; appropriating to his own use the property so omitted from the schedule.

Neither the assignee nor the preferred creditors who accepted the deed had any knowledge of the alleged fraud of the grantor until after their acceptance of its provisions.

Upon an issue formed between Emerson, asserting the validity of the deed, and Senter & Co., who, as creditors of the firm, attached the assigned effects as the property of the surviving partner, the deed of assignment was held to be void and the claim of the assignee denied.

The court below proceeded upon the ground, in part, that a sole surviving partner of an insolvent firm, who is himself insolvent, cannot make a valid assignment of partnership assets for the benefit of the joint creditors, with preference to some of them. We are unable to concur in this view.

Some of the cases hold that one partner cannot, either during the continuance of the partnership, or after its dissolution by agreement, make such an assignment. It cannot, however, be doubted that, in the absence of a statute prohibiting it, such an assignment, whether during the continuance of the partnership or after its dissolution by agreement, would be valid where the partners all unite in executing it, or where one of them executes it by the direction or with the consent of the others. Partnership creditors have no specific lien upon the joint funds for their debts. 3 Kent, Com. 65; Story, Part. § 358. They have no such relations with the partnership as entitles them to [8] interfere with the complete control of the joint property by the partners during the existence of the partnership, or with their right, after a dissolution, by agreement, of the partnership, to dispose of it for the payment of their joint debts, giving such preference as they deem proper.

When the partnership is dissolved by the death of one partner, the surviving partner is entitled to the possession and control of the joint property for the purpose of closing up its business. Wickliffe v. Eve, 17 How. 469 [58 U. S. bk. 15, L. ed. 163]; Shanks v. Klein, 104 U. S. 18 [Bk. 26, L. ed. 635]. To that end, and for the purpose of paying the joint debts, he may, according to the settled principles of the law of partnership, administer the affairs of the firm and, by sale or other reasonable disposition of its property, make provision for meeting its obligations. He could not otherwise properly discharge the duty which rests upon him, to wind up the business and pay over to the representative of the deceased partner what may be due to him after a final settlement of the joint debts. It is true that, in many cases —where, for instance, the surviving partner is not exercising due diligence in settling the partnership business, or is acting in bad faith—the personal representative of the deceased partner may invoke the interference of a court of equity, and compel such a disposition of the partnership effects as will be just and proper; this, because as between the partners, and therefore, as between the surviving partner and the personal representatives of the deceased partner, the joint assets constitute a fund to be appropriated primarily to the discharge of partnership liabilities, though not necessarily, and under all circumstances, upon terms of equality as to all the joint creditors. But while the surviving partner is under a legal obligation to account to the personal representative of a deceased partner, the latter has no such lien upon the joint assets as would prevent the former from disposing of them for the purpose of closing up the partnership affairs. He has a standing in court only through the equitable right which his intestate had, as between himself and the surviving partner, to have the joint property applied in good faith for the liquidation of the joint liabilities. As with the concurrence of all of the partners the joint property could have been sold or assigned for the benefit of preferred creditors of the firm, the surviving [9] partner, there being no statute forbidding it, could make the same disposition of it. The right to do so grows out of his duty, from his relations to the property, to administer the affairs of the firm so as to close up its business without unreasonable delay; and his authority to make such a preference—the local law not forbidding it—cannot, upon principle, be less than that which an individual debtor has in the case of his own creditors. It necessarily results that the giving of preference to certain partnership creditors was not an unauthorized exertion of power by Moores, the surviving partner.

It is, however, contended that the assignment in question was void because of the fraudulent omission from the schedule by Moores of certain property which constituted a part of the partnership assets, and was appropriated by him to his own use. But this fraud upon the part of Moores did not affect the rights of the assignee and of the beneficiaries of the trust who were ignorant of the fraud of the grantor. Such seems to be the established doctrine of the Supreme Court of Arkansas. In Hempstead v. Johnson, 18 Ark. 140, it was said that a deed of trust or other conveyance is not necessarily void "because its effect is to hinder and delay the creditors of the grantor in the collection of their claims. But such must be its object. It must be a fraudulent contrivance for that purpose; and the grantee, or person to be benefited by the conveyance, must be party privy to the fraudulent design." Referring to the facts which existed in that case, that the grantor was in failing circumstances when the deed of trust was made; that suits were pending against him, and that some of the beneficiaries were his near relatives, the court said: "But all these facts may and do exist in many cases, consistently with the hypothesis that the conveyance was made in good faith to secure preferred creditors, whose demands are just." In Cornish v. Dews, 18 Ark. 181, the court said: "As held in the case of Hempstead v. Johnson, supra, if the deed was valid when executed, no subsequent conduct on the part of the grantor, or the trustee, however fraudulent, could avoid the deed, and deprive the creditors, accepting it in good faith and not participating in the fraud, of their rights under it. And even if Cornish (the [10] grantor) had the purpose, when he made the deed, of hindering and delaying creditors not provided for by it, yet, if the preferred creditors were not parties or privies to his fraudulent purpose, but accepted the deed in good faith to secure the debts really due them, it would be valid as to them." See also Mandel v. Peay, 20 Ark. 329; Hunt v. Weiner, 39 Ark. 775. The rule announced by the Supreme Court of Arkansas is in harmony with the settled doctrines of this court, and accords with sound reason. Marbury v. Brooks, 7 Wheat. 556, 577 [20 U. S. bk. 5, L. ed. 522, 528]; Brooks v. Marbury, 11 Wheat. 78, 89 [24 U. S. bk. 6, L. ed. 423, 428]; Tompkins v. Wheeler, 16 Pet. 106, 118 [41 U. S. bk. 10, L. ed. 903, 906]. There was nothing upon the face of the deed to Emerson to indicate that it was made for any other purpose than, in good faith, to make provision for the payment of certain debts held against the grantor as surviving partner; first, debts due to the preferred creditors; and then, debts held by other creditors. If the intentional omission by the grantor of certain property from his schedule, and his appropriation of it to his own use, was such a fraud as would vitiate the deed where the assignee or the preferred creditors have previous notice of such omission, that result cannot happen when they were ignorant of the fraud at the time they accepted the benefit of the conveyance.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to enter judgment on the special finding of facts in favor of the plaintiff in error.

Jurisdiction—final decree.

An affirmance by the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, at a general term, of a decree of that court at a special term, deciding a question of domicil and thereby affirming the jurisdiction of the court, is not a final decree for the purpose of an appeal to this court.

Argued, on motion to dismiss, Apr. 14, 1886. Decided Apr. 15, 1886.

APPEAL from the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia. Dismissed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. S. S. Henkle, for appellants.

Mr. A. S. Worthington, for appellee.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

When this case was called for argument a motion to dismiss was interposed, because the decree appealed from was not a final decree in the suit. The facts are these:

On the 8th of March, 1877, John F. Benjamin died in the District of Columbia, leaving a will by which he gave to his adopted daughter, Mrs. Guy H. Allen, the wife of James M. Allen, all his interest in the partnership of Bigelow and Benjamin, all debts owing to him by persons residing in the District of Columbia, and all real estate owned by him in the District of Columbia. He also gave to George C. B. Rowan $100, and to his wife all his property in Missouri, $12,000 in District of Columbia 6 per cent gold bonds, and other property. Joshua M. Ennis was named as executor, [47] so far as the property in Missouri was concerned, and George Truesdell was appointed to wind up business in the District of Columbia. Previous to the year 1874 Benjamin had resided in Missouri. During that year he went to Washington, in the District of Columbia, where he engaged in business with Otis Bigelow, and remained until his death. The will was first admitted to probate in Missouri, and letters testamentary granted to Ennis. A copy of the will and of the proof and probate thereof in Missouri were admitted to record in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, on the 5th of June, 1877, and letters testamentary granted to Truesdell of all the personal property in the District. Truesdell thereupon proceeded with the settlement of the estate in the District of Columbia, and on the 5th of January, 1880, Mrs. Allen and Rowan filed their petition in the Supreme Court of the District, setting forth that all debts had been paid, and praying that Truesdell be directed to pay to Rowan his legacy in full, and to Mrs. Allen so much of that to her as he might have in his possession. Notice of the filing of this petition was given to Truesdell, to Ennis the Missouri executor, and to the heirs of Benjamin. Truesdell and George H. Benjamin, one of the heirs, answered, and in the answer of Benjamin the defense was made that the legal domicil of John F. Benjamin at the time of his death was in Missouri, where the validity of the will was being litigated, and not in the District of Columbia, and that no distribution of the estate in the District should be ordered in this proceeding until the litigation in Missouri was ended. Upon the question of the actual domicil of the testator much testimony was taken, and on the 28th of February, 1880, the court, after full hearing, decided that his domicil "was the City of Washington, in the District of Columbia," and "that this court has original jurisdiction in the matter of his estate." An entry to this effect was made at special term, and George H. Benjamin thereupon took an appeal to the general term. Afterwards a final decree was entered, notwithstanding this appeal, approving the accounts of Truesdell, and directing him to pay over the funds in his hands as provided for in his account. This order George H. Benjamin moved to set aside, but his motion was denied, and afterwards the court at general [48] term affirmed the decree of the 28th of February, 1880, and from that decree this appeal was taken.

As was said in Bostwick v. Brinkerhoff, 106 U. S. 3 [Bk. 27, L. ed. 73], "The rule is well settled and of long standing that a judgment or decree to be final, within the meaning of that term as used in the Acts of Congress giving this court jurisdiction on appeals or writs of error, must terminate the litigation between the parties on the merits of the case, so that if there should be an affirmance here, the court below would have nothing to do but to execute the judgment or decree which had been rendered."

The effect of the appeal below from the special to the general term was to take to the general term for review only the finding of the special term upon the question of domicil. Consequently the appeal from the general term to this court brings up nothing more. The suit was for the money in the hands of Truesdell given to Rowan and to Mrs. Allen by the will, and the litigation between the parties is not ended until a decree to that effect is entered. The jurisdiction of the court to make the decree seems to have been thought to depend on the fact of the domicil of the testator in Washington at the time of his death. The finding that such was his domicil settled the disputed question of jurisdiction, but it did not decree the payment of any money, which was the only purpose of the suit. It opened the way to that end, but nothing more. If we should affirm the decree as it stood when the appeal from the special term to the general term was taken, there would be no order of the court to carry into execution. No relief had then been granted the petitioners. All the court had then decided was that it had jurisdiction and power to order the payment of the money which was prayed for.

It follows that we have no jurisdiction, and the motion to dismiss is granted.

WHITNEY ARMS COMPANY, ELI WHITNEY, Pres., ET AL.

Patent law—rejection of application—abandonment.

1. There may be an abandonment of an invention to the public, as well after an application has been rejected or withdrawn as before an application is made. Such abandonment may be proved, either by express declarations of an intention to abandon, or by conduct inconsistent with any other conclusion.

2. Upon a renewed application for a patent, the decision of the commissioner in favor of the applicant, upon the question whether the invention has been abandoned, is not conclusive, but may be contested and reviewed in a suit brought for the infringement of the patent.

3. Where the first application for a patent had been rejected and withdrawn, a delay of eight years in renewing the application, because the applicant regarded the invention as of less value than others for which he took out patents, will be held an abandonment, when the subject matter of the invention has been incorporated into the substance of many other subsequent inventions.

Argued Mar. 10, 11, 1886. Decided Apr. 19, 1886.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Connecticut.

Affirmed.

The case is stated by the court.

Messrs. J. E. Hindon Hyde and F. H. Betts, for appellants.

Mr. B. F. Thurston, for appellees.

This was a bill in equity for the infringement of letters patent granted May 7, 1872, to John W. Cochran for an improvement in breech-loading firearms, of which one of the plaintiffs was the owner, and the others were the exclusive licensees. The answer denied that Cochran was the original inventor, and alleged that his application, upon which the letters patent were issued, was made and filed in the Patent Office, on May 6, 1868; that for more than two years before that date the thing patented had been in public use and on sale with his consent and allowance; and that long prior to that date the invention had been abandoned by him to the public. A general replication was filed, and evidence taken, by which the material facts appeared to be as follows:

On January 10, 1859, Cochran filed an application for a patent for this invention, which on February 8, 1859, was rejected by the Commissioner of Patents, for want of novelty; and on February 20, 1860, was withdrawn by Cochran, and $20 refunded to him, at his request, agreeably to the Act of July 4, 1836, chap. 357, § 7. 5 Stat. at L. 120.

At various dates from November 19, 1861, to February 11, 1868, eighteen patents were granted to other persons for the same devices or their equivalents, and the defendants bought some of those patents, and afterwards manufactured firearms under them.

On May 6, 1868, Cochran filed a new application, which was rejected by the examiners, on the ground of abandonment. On June 9, [24] 1869, Mr. Commissioner Fisher, on appeal, affirmed their decision. His opinion is published in the Decisions of the Commissioner of Patents for 1869, p. 80. On appeal to the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, his decision was reversed. On July 7, 1870, he rejected the application. But on December 5, 1870, Cochran filed a formal renewal of his application, under the Act of July 8, 1870, chap. 230, § 35, and on May 7, 1872, the patent sued on was granted to him by Mr. Fisher's successor.

During the time between the applications of 1859 and of 1868, Cochran applied for and obtained twenty-two other patents, nine of them for improvements in breech-loading firearms, some of which he sold for considerable sums. He was poor and in debt; but upon the whole evidence it is quite clear that his delay in renewing the application of 1859 was not owing to want of means, but to his regarding this patent as of less value than the others.

The circuit court was of opinion that the invention had been abandoned before May, 1868, and therefore entered a decree dismissing the bill. 14 Blatchf. 94; S. C. 2 Bann. & A. 493. From that decree this appeal is taken.

The renewal of Cochran's application on December 5, 1870, was under the provision of the Act of July 8, 1870, chap. 230, § 35, which allowed any inventor whose application for a patent had been rejected or withdrawn before the passage of that Act to renew it within six months after its passage; and provided that upon the hearing of such renewed application abandonment should be considered as a question of fact. 16 Stat. at L. 202.

The rules of law which must govern this case are clearly established by the judgment of this court in Planing Machine Co. v. Keith, 101 U. S. 479 [Bk. 25, L. ed. 939]. The decision of the Commissioner in favor of the applicant, upon the question whether the invention has been abandoned, is not conclusive, but may be contested and reviewed in a suit brought for the infringement of the patent. There may be an [25] abandonment of an invention to the public, as well after an application has been rejected or withdrawn, as before any application is made. Such abandonment may be proved, either by express declarations of an intention to abandon, or by conduct inconsistent with any other conclusion. An inventor whose application for a patent has been rejected, and who, without substantial reason or excuse, omits for many years to take any step to reinstate or renew it, must be held to have acquiesced in its rejection, and to have abandoned any intention of further prosecuting his claim.

In the case at bar, the first application was both rejected by the Commissioner and withdrawn by the applicant; and the question presented is well put in the opinion of Mr. Commissioner Fisher, above referred to: "Can an inventor withdraw his application, make no effort to renew it for eight years, during which time the subject matter of the invention has been incorporated into the substance of many other subsequent inventions, and then file a new application and obtain a patent which, to support the novelty of the invention, shall relate back to the first application?" We concur with him and with the circuit court in deciding that an inventor cannot do this.

Decree affirmed.

v.

JAMES B. GRANT AND JAMES GRANT.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 25-27.)

Patent law—whether invention is anticipated is question for jury.

Where the defense to an action at law for infringement of letters patent for an improvement in furnaces for smelting ores relied on a prior publication containing an alleged description of "plaintiffs' pretended invention" and the differences were obvious in the arrangement of the parts and the relation of the basin in one, and the forehearth in the other, to the interior of the furnace, and the mode of connecting the one with the other for the purpose of drawing the metal from the furnace, so that it was not a matter of mere judicial knowledge, that these differences were either not material in any degree to the result or, if material at all, were only such as would not require the exercise of the faculty of invention, but would be suggested by the skill of an experienced workman in the application of the well known arrangements of the furnace and there was evidence of experts upon both sides of the issue presented, it was error to withdraw the case from the jury.

Argued Apr. 8, 1886. Decided Apr. 19, 1886.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Colorado. Reversed.

The case is stated by the court.

Messrs. George Harding, G. G. Symes and Francis T. Chambers, for plaintiffs in error.

Messrs. B. F. Thurston, E. T. Wells, Thomas Macon, B. T. McNeal, and Whit. M. Grant, for defendants in error.

This was an action at law to recover damages for an alleged infringement of letters patent No. 121885, issued November 28, 1871, to the plaintiffs for an improvement in furnaces for smelting lead and other ores. There were several defenses set up by way of pleas, but the two chiefly relied on were that "the plaintiffs' pretended invention" had been described "in a certain printed publication entitled 'System der Mettallurgie,' von Dr. J. B. Karsten, published at Berlin, Prussia, in 1831-2, in 5 volumes, with an atlas of plates, I, at pages 315, 316, 317, 318, 319, 320, 321 and 322, of Volume III, and pages 150 to 166, both inclusive, and 166 to 180, both inclusive, of Volume V, and figures 479, 480, 481, 482, 483, 484, 473, 474, 475 on plate XXI, and figures 850 to 868, both inclusive, of plate XLI of the atlas accompanying said work;" and secondly, that, in view of the state of the art at the date of the alleged invention, the improvement was not patentable as not requiring the exercise of invention.

The issues came on for trial before a jury, and there was a verdict for the defendants and judgment thereon, to reverse which this writ of error is brought.

It appears from the bill of exceptions that the plaintiffs read in evidence the patent sued on, the substantial part of the specifications attached to which was as follows:

"The object of this invention is to provide a novel, simple, and improved method of tapping or withdrawing lead and other metals when in a molten state, from the bottom of a smelting furnace, so that the metal may be obtained therefrom in a clean state, and also that the formation of hard matters or incrustations on the sides and bottom of the furnace may be avoided. The nature of this invention consists [27] in the use or employment of a basin of suitable dimensions, located a short distance from one side of the furnace and at a suitable elevation above the bottom of the furnace; which said basin is connected with the furnace by means of a tube which extends from the bottom of the basin to the bottom of the furnace. As the molten metal fills the lower part of the furnace it rises to the same level in the tube until it reaches the basin, from whence it may be removed as clean metal.

"To enable others skilled in the art to make and use our invention we will proceed more particularly to describe the same.

"The figure represents a sectional elevation of a portion of a smelting furnace with our improvements.

"A represents the furnace which may be of ordinary or common construction. B is a basin of suitable dimensions, located at the top of an extension built on one side of the furnace and at a suitable elevation above the bottom of the furnace. The basin may be constructed of any material suitable for receiving and holding the molten metal. Extending from the bottom of the basin B, to the bottom of the furnace A, through the above mentioned extension, is a tube C, which connects the basin with the furnace, and which may be made of iron, clay or other material suitable for the purpose.

"The metal as it melts falls to the bottom of the furnace; as the surface of the molten metal rises within the furnace it rises to the same level in the tube C until it reaches the basin B, from which it may be removed with a ladle.

"The advantages of this invention are obvious, as by this means the metal is tapped or withdrawn from the furnace free from impurities; and it will also be seen that the difficulties arising from the formation of hard matter or incrustations on the bottom or sides of the furnace, occasioned by the usual method of drawing off a large quantity of molten metal at one time, are obviated.

"Having thus described our invention, what we claim as new, and desire to secure by letters patent of the United States, is:

"The method of tapping or withdrawing [28] molten lead or other metals from a smelting furnace by means of the basin B and tube or connection C, in combination with the furnace substantially as shown and described."

The drawing referred to is as follows:

Albert Arents, one of the plaintiffs, testified to his own qualifications as an expert in the art of smelting, and also "that the obtaining of clean metal from the side of a furnace of ordinary construction automatically by the means described in the specifications in the patent was novel and useful, and a great improvement over the old method of withdrawing clean metal from smelting furnaces; that the specifications were sufficiently full, clear and precise to enable persons skilled in the art to which they appertained, to wit: the art of smelting, to construct a furnace which would produce the useful result claimed by the patent, to wit: the obtaining clean metal automatically from a smelting furnace when in operation of ordinary construction; that a furnace of ordinary construction, as it existed at the date of plaintiff's patent, as defined by the art of smelting, so far as is material to this case, consisted of an inner hearth with an open breast or sump, into which the molten masses of the furnace, when fused, collected and settled, according to their specific gravities; that the front of a smelting furnace was that part of the furnace where the slag ran and was handled by the smelter; that

The plaintiff then introduced a model on the scale of one inch to the foot, in sections, showing what a furnace of ordinary construction was at the date of the patent, as known in the art of smelting, showing the improvement of the plaintiffs and the old mode of tapping, of which the following are drawings:

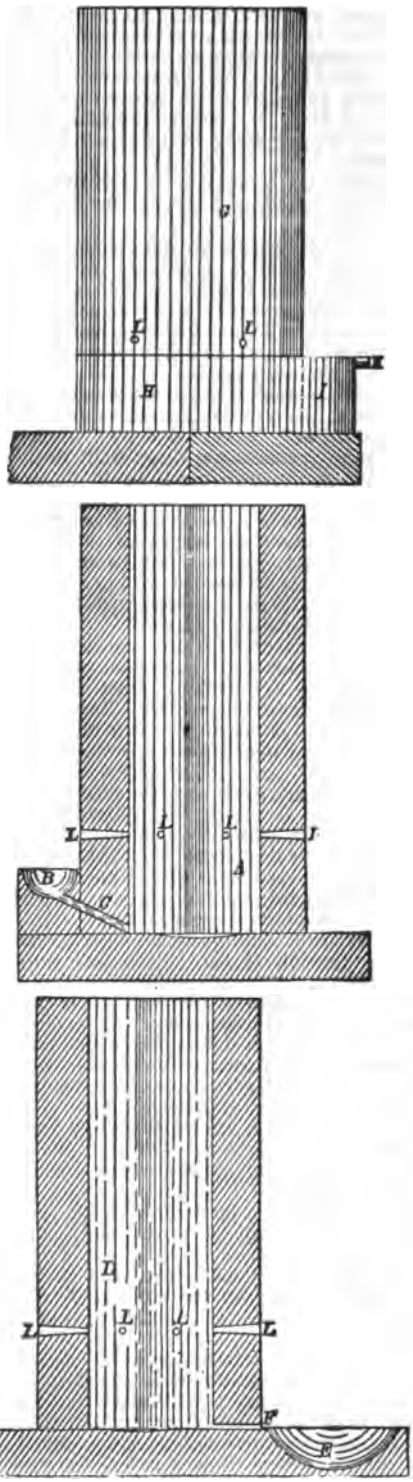
B—Basin similar to that shown in pl'ff's patent.
C—Tube connecting bottom of basin with bottom of furnace.
D—Section of same furnace.
E—Basin to receive clean metal when furnace was tapped.
F—Tap hole through which clean metal was periodically tapped by the old method into basin E.
G—Section of same furnace.
H—Inner hearth.
I—Fore hearth or sump.
K—Slag spout or exit.
L—Tuyere holes.



[30]

The plaintiffs then corroborated this testimony of Arents, by that of numerous experts, and gave evidence tending to prove infringement by the defendants, and rested their case.

The defendants put in evidence certain extracts from the text and illustrative drawings of smelting furnaces of the treatise upon Metallurgy by Dr. J. B. Karsten, published at Berlin in 1831-32, mentioned in the plea, translated as follows:

"(318) The forehearth is that part of the crucible projecting in front of the fire walls of the furnace.

"Crucible furnaces are those shaft furnaces in which the crucible is entirely on the inside. They are divided into eye-crucible furnaces and tap-crucible furnaces. The former have an eye in the front wall from which the slag flows continuously, the metal and matte being tapped off at intervals into basins.

"The tap-crucible furnaces are those in which the metal, matte and slag are all tapped off from time to time.

"Sump furnaces are those shaft furnaces in which the crucible is partly in the furnace and partly in front of the furnace. The slag runs off continuously over the fore hearth. The metal and matte are tapped off into receiving vessels or tap basins. Sometimes the sump furnaces are not provided with tap basins, and [31] the metal in them is dipped with ladles direct from the fore hearth.

"Spur or channel furnaces are shaft furnaces without a crucible. The molten contents flow through the eye directly from the furnace hearth into receiving vessels. These different furnaces can be more advantageously studied from the drawings than from written descriptions.

"(319) In some countries the crucible furnace is preferred; in others, the sump furnace. It is not advisable to use the channel furnace when clean metal is produced. With this furnace the metal is not protected from oxidation. It is used chiefly in smelting copper ores, with a view to producing copper matte.

"The drawings, figures 461 to 463, represent an eye-crucible furnace. The slag runs continuously through a hole in the front wall. The metal and matte are tapped off at intervals through a hole in the side of the crucible.

"The drawings, figures 464 to 466, represent an eye-crucible furnace, which differs from the former, in that the tap hole is in the front wall and at the bottom of the crucible.

"The drawings, figures 467 to 469, represent a tap-crucible furnace. The metal, matte and slag are tapped off from time to time into receiving basins.

"The drawings, figures 470 to 472, represent an eye-crucible similar to the one represented by drawings, figures 464 to 466; it is provided with two tap basins. The slag also passes through a basin, for the purpose of allowing the small particles of metal and matte mixed with it to settle.

"(320) The drawings, figures 473 to 475, represent a sump furnace with a covered eye, in which the brasque (a mixture of fire clay and coke dust) under the front wall divides the sump into two communicating vessels.

"The slag runs off continuously through the eye between the bottom of the front wall and the top of the brasque partition.

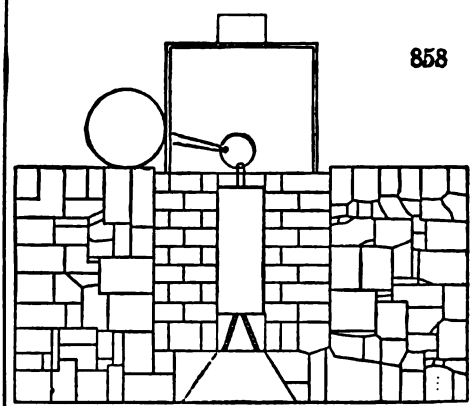
"This arrangement is used when it is desired to dip the clean metal with ladles from the fore hearth, instead of drawing it off into tap basins.

"The drawings, figures 476 to 478, represent [32] a sump furnace with an entirely open breast, in which the slag passes off immediately over the fore hearth.

"The drawings, figures 479 and 480, represent a sump furnace with a covered eye, and with a tap basin, into which the metal and matte are tapped from the fore hearth. This furnace might be regarded as a channel furnace, by simply considering the short canal, or eye, which connects the sump under the shaft with the fore hearth, as a channel. But, by means of this short canal or eye, the sump and the fore hearth stand in combination with each other as a pair of communicating tubes or vessels; consequently, it is a sump and not a channel furnace. The slag may pass through the covered eye into the fore hearth, or through an open eye above the fore hearth, the latter eye being used exclusively for the slag.

"In smelting operations, where little or no slag is produced, the upper eye is dispensed with entirely."

The following are figures 858-860 and their scale from Plate XLI of Karsten's Atlas:



The defendants also introduced experts as witnesses, whose testimony tended to prove that, as stated by one of them:

"The furnaces thus figured by Karsten are planned for withdrawing the reduced metal continuously, and as fast as possible, from the oxidizing action of the blast and the intensely heated part of the slag. So the metal is made to flow constantly outward and upward through the open eye into the fore hearth, which is made as high as the inner crucible; and generally, the clean molten metal alone is passing through this bottom eye. When much slag is formed it is run off separately by another eye placed higher up; when very little slag is produced, it accumulates for a long time on the top of the molten metal in the inner crucible, and the clean metal in the fore bay may be partially removed many times without allowing any of the slag to escape through the eye."

One of the defendants, James Grant, was called to prove that he had constructed an experimental furnace of small size, according to the description and drawing of figure 860 of Karsten's publication, and worked it successfully. A model was exhibited, the proportions and features of which are shown in the following drawings:

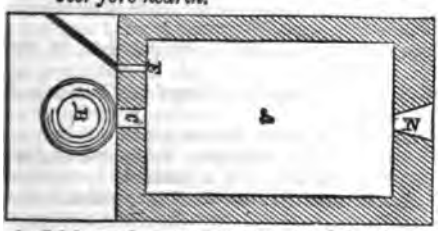
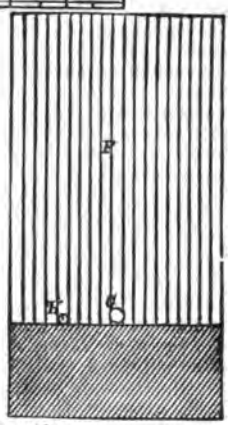
A—Horizontal section.
B—Fore hearth.
C—Open eye.
E—Slag exit made by defendants, with spout over fore hearth.



[35]



F—Front section.
G—Open eye.
H—Slag exit made by defendants.

And his testimony was supported by that of others who had seen the furnace in operation.

On the other hand the plaintiffs, in rebuttal, called expert witnesses, who testified that the plaintiffs' furnace, as described in the patent, differed materially from that described by Karsten and from the model of the one made by the defendant Grant, and who pointed out in their evidence the particulars in which that difference consisted, in the construction and arrangement of the furnace, in the principle of its operation and in the results produced.

All of the evidence on both sides having been given, the whole of which is set out in the bill of exceptions, the court, having refused to charge the jury as requested by the plaintiffs, instructed the jury to return a verdict for the defendants, which was done; and to this ruling exception was duly taken, and is now assigned for error.

The judgment entered on the verdict rendered in favor of the defendants, in pursuance of the direction of the court, can be maintained only on the ground, either that the legal identity of the furnace described by Karsten with that covered by the plaintiffs' patent was manifest as a matter of law, or that it was established as a matter of fact so conclusively by the evidence that a verdict the other way could not be supported, within the rule as stated in Randall v. Baltimore & O. R. R. Co., 109 U. S. 478 [Bk. 27, L. ed. 1003].

Clearly it was not matter of law that the specification of the plaintiffs' patent, and the publication of Karsten, taken in connection with the drawings intended in illustration, described the same thing. The differences were obvious in the arrangement of the parts, and the relation of the basin in one, and the fore hearth in the other, to the interior of the furnace, and the mode of connecting the one with the other for the purpose of drawing the metal from the furnace. So that it certainly was not a matter of mere judicial knowledge that these differences were either not material in any degree to the result or, if material at all, were only such as would not require the exercise of the faculty of invention but would be suggested by the skill of an experienced workman employed to produce the best result in the application of the well known arrangements of the furnace. It was claimed, on behalf of the plaintiffs, that the furnace described in the patent and as used by them, embodied an idea not contained in or suggested by Karsten's publication. That idea consisted in the employment of a basin to receive the molten metal, located at a suitable elevation above the bottom of the furnace, and connected with the interior of the furnace by means of a tube, so that, instead of tapping a lead smelting furnace by withdrawing the molten metal through a tap hole near the bottom, it was proposed to allow the metal to flow upward into the receiving basin under the operation of the familiar natural law that liquids will seek the same level in communicating vessels. The object to be attained by this arrangement was that clean metal, unaccompanied with slag or other impure products resulting from the operation of smelting lead ores, [37] should, after settling to the bottom of the furnace, by reason of its greater specific gravity, ascend through the connecting tube, as the mass of molten metal accumulates and rises within the furnace, into the receiving basin, and be dipped thence with a ladle. It was insisted by the patentees that no such arrangement and combination were to be found in Karsten's publication or in the furnaces depicted in his figures, and that the improvement which they constituted was not the result of mere mechanical skill, but sprung from a genuine effort of invention. And this view was supported by the opinion of many experts skilled in the art.

In our opinion this was a question of fact properly to be left for determination to the jury, under suitable instructions from the court upon the rules of law, which should guide them to their verdict. And there was evidence upon both sides of the issue sufficient to require that it should be weighed and considered by the jury in the determination of the question; and this implies that, if it had been submitted to the jury and the verdict had been for the plaintiffs, it would not have been the duty of the court to have set it aside as not supported by sufficient evidence. The court erred, we think, in withdrawing the case from the jury as it did by directing a verdict for the defendants.

For this error the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to grant a new trial; and it is so ordered.

Collectors of internal revenue—commissions—Act of 1879.

The right which collectors of internal revenue had, prior to the Act of March 1, 1879, to the one half of 1 per centum commissions on taxes collected on distilled spirits was not taken away by that Act.

Submitted Apr. 5, 1886. Decided Apr. 19, 1886.

APPEAL from the Court of Claims. Affirmed.

The case is stated by the court.

Messrs. John Goode, Solicitor-Gen., and Ed. M. Watson, for appellant.

Mr. Green B. Raum, for appellee.

By section 2 of the Act of March 1, 1879, entitled "An Act to Amend the Laws Relating to Internal Revenue" (chap. 125, 20 Stat. at L. 327), the twelfth section of the Act of February 8, 1875 (chap. 36, 18 Stat. at L. 307), was amended so as to read as follows:

"Each collector of internal revenue shall be authorized to appoint, by an instrument in writing under his hand, as many deputies as he may think proper, to be compensated for their services by such allowances as shall be made by the Secretary of the Treasury, upon the recommendation of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. Allowances shall also be made in like manner for salary and office expenses of collectors, all of which shall be in lieu of the salary and commissions heretofore provided by law; Provided, however, That the [82] salaries of collectors shall be fixed at $2,000 each per annum where the annual collections amount to $25,000 or less, and shall, by the Secretary, on the recommendation of the Commissioner, be graduated up to the maximum limit of $4,500; which latter sum shall be allowed in all cases where the collections amount to $1,000,000 or upward. * * * Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury, on the recommendation of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, be authorized to make such further allowances, from time to time, as may be reasonable, in cases in which, from the territorial extent of the district, or from the amount of internal duties collected, it may seem just to make such allowances; but no such allowance shall be made if more than one year has elapsed since the close of the fiscal year in which the services were rendered. But the total net compensation of a collector shall not in any case exceed $4,500 a year; and no collector shall be entitled to any portion of the salary pertaining to the office, unless such collector shall have been confirmed by the Senate, except in cases of commissions to fill vacancies occurring during the recess of the Senate."

By section 5 of the same Act it was provided as follows: "That section 3814 of the Revised Statutes shall be amended by striking out all after said number and substituting the following: 'The books of tax-paid stamps issued to any collector shall be charged to his account at the full value of the tax on the number of gallons represented on the stamps and coupons contained in said books; and every collector shall make a monthly return to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue of all tax-paid stamps issued by him to be affixed to any cask or package containing distilled spirits on which the tax has been paid, and account for the amount of the tax collected; and when the said collector returns to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue any book of marginal stubs, which it shall be his duty to do as soon as all the stamps contained in the book when issued to him have been used, and accounts for the tax [83] on the number of gallons represented on the stamps and coupons that were contained in said book, there shall be allowed to the collector a commission of one half of 1 per centum on the amount of such tax in addition to any other commission by law allowed, provided that the total net compensation of collectors as fixed by this title shall not be thereby increased.'"

This so-called amendment was simply a re-enactment of section 3814 without any change whatever.

While these sections were in force, to wit: during the five fiscal years beginning with July 1, 1879, and ending with June 30, 1884, William J. Landram, the appellee, was the collector of internal revenue for the Eighth District of Kentucky. During that period he received a salary as follows: for the years ending respectively on June 30, 1880, and June 30, 1883, $3,000 for each year; for the years ending respectively June 30, 1881 and June 30, 1882, $2,875 for each year; and for the year ending June 30, 1884, $4,375. During each of the years above mentioned Landram collected a large amount of taxes on distilled spirits by the sale of tax-paid stamps, on which, limiting his total net compensation for each year to $4,500, the commissions for the whole five years to which he would have been entitled, on the assumption that section 3814 of the Revised Statutes still remained in force, would amount to $4,724.78. The accounting officers of the Treasury refused to allow him this sum or any part of it. He therefore brought this suit against the United States, in the court of claims, to recover it. Upon a finding of the foregoing facts the court of claims gave him judgment for said sum, and the United States appealed.

The policy of allowing a commission of one half of 1 per cent on taxes collected from distilled spirits by the sale of tax-paid stamps was begun by the Act of July 20, 1868 (chap. 186, 15 Stat. at L. 125), which required that the taxes on distilled spirits should be paid by affixing to the packages in which they were contained the prescribed stamps, and "allowed a commission of one half of 1 per centum on the amount of the tax on spirits distilled after the passage of" that "Act in addition to any other commission by law allowed, which" should "be equally divided between the collector re- [84] ceiving the tax and the assessor of the district in which the distilled spirits were produced." This policy was continued by the Act of December 24, 1872 (chap. 18, 17 Stat. at L. 401), which, after abolishing by section 1 the office of assessor of internal revenue, provided by section 6 that the commission of one half of 1 per centum allowed by the Act of July 20, 1868, to the collector and assessor should be paid to the collector, provided that "the total net compensation of collectors" should not be thereby increased. The provisions of the Acts of 1868 and 1872 remained in force until June 22, 1874, when, having been embodied in section 3814 of the Revised Statutes, they were re-enacted. By the Act of March 1, 1879, section 3814, though still in force, was re-enacted in totidem verbis, and by the Act of May 28, 1880 (chap. 108, 21 Stat. at L. 145), entitled "An Act to Amend the Laws in Relation to Internal Revenue," the same section was repeated and re-enacted, word for word.

It is asserted by counsel for the appellee, and not disputed by counsel for appellant, that prior to the passage of the Act of March 1, 1879, ubi supra, the right of collectors of internal revenue to the one half of 1 per centum commissions on taxes collected on distilled spirits was never questioned. After June 22, 1874, the commissions were allowed and paid solely by virtue of the provisions of section 3814 of the Revised Statutes.

On the passage of the Act of March 1, 1879, the right of the collectors to commissions was for the first time disputed. It seems to us clear that this right was not taken away by that Act. When it was passed section 3814 of the Revised Statutes allowing the commissions was in force. It was a plain, unambiguous provision, whose meaning had not been doubted and which was not open to construction. Being in force, there was no reason for its re-enactment by the Act of March 1, 1879, except to express in a most unmistakable manner the purpose of Congress that it should continue in force, and should not be considered as in any way modified by that Act. This purpose Congress reiterated by repeating and re-enacting the same section in the Act of May 28, 1880. By virtue of the provisions thus enacted and re-enacted the right of the appellee to the commissions would seem to be plain.

[85] The only ground upon which the appellants try to escape this conclusion is by an argument which amounts to this: that Congress, by section 2 of the Act of March 1, 1879, intended virtually to repeal by implication that part of section 3314 of the Revised Statutes relating to collector's commissions, which, by Section 5 of the same Act, it deliberately, and word for word, re-enacted. Conceding that this argument is entitled to any weight, it is to be noted that, if the provision referred to was repealed by the same Act which re-enacted it, it was as an independent enactment, and, without change or qualification, again restored to the statute book by the subsequent Act of May 28, 1880, ubi supra, where it has remained ever since, covering more than four fifths of the period for which the appellee claims the commissions sued for in this case.

But it is not necessary to resort to the Act of May 28, 1880, to sustain the right of the appellee to any part of his commissions. It is a settled rule of construction that "One part of a statute must be so construed by another that the whole may, if possible, stand; Ut res magis valeat quam pereat," (1 Bl. Com. 89); or, as otherwise expressed, that every clause in a statute should have effect, and one portion should not be placed in antagonism to another. Brooks v. Mobile School Commissioners, 31 Ala. 227. Applying this rule to the interpretation of sections 2 and 5 of the Act of March 1, 1879, so far as they relate to the compensation of collectors, their meaning appears to be: first, that salaries shall be allowed the collectors, graded according to the amount of their annual collections, the minimum salary being $2,000 and the maximum $4,500; second, that in addition to the salary a commission of one half of 1 per centum on the taxes on spirits collected by sales of tax-paid stamps shall be allowed collectors, provided that their total net compensation shall not be more than $4,500; and third, that the Secretary of the Treasury may make further allowances, provided the limitation of $4,500 as the total net compensation of the collector is not exceeded. Thus construed, both sections of the statute are given effect without violence to the language or spirit of either. No construction of the two sections would be so incongruous and unreasonable as to hold that Congress deliberately re-enacted the provision of section 3314 allowing commissions to the collectors without meaning anything by it; for the case of the appellants cannot be sustained [86] unless we virtually expunge from the statute book, after it had, ex industria, been put there by Congress, the provision allowing to the collectors commissions on taxes collected by the sale of tax-paid spirit stamps.

Judgment affirmed.

Removal of causes—separable controversy—local prejudice.

The provision in the second subdivision of section 639, R. S., for the removal of a separable controversy and the provision in the third subdivision of the same section, for the removal of causes on the ground of local prejudice, have no relation to each other. To warrant a removal under the third subdivision it is not enough that there may be a separable controversy between parties having the necessary citizenship.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Ohio. Affirmed.

The case is stated by the court.

Messrs. Wm. M. Ramsey, Lawrence Maxwell, Jr., and Mortimer Matthews, for appellant.

Mr. C. B. Matthews, for appellee.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal under section 5 of the Act of March 3, 1875, 18 Stat. at L. 470, chap. 137, from an order of the circuit court remanding a cause which had been removed from a state court. The facts are these:

On the 14th of September, 1883, Stephen Feike brought suit in the Court of Common Pleas of Scioto County, Ohio, against the Cincinnati and Southeastern Railroad Company to collect a debt due to him from the railroad company and asking the appointment of a receiver. On the same day that the petition was filed the railroad company, then the only defendant, entered its appearance and waived both process and notice of an application for the appointment of a receiver. At the same time W. R. M'Gill, another creditor of the company, came in, and by leave of the court made himself a party defendant, and filed an answer and cross petition, in which he asked for himself the same relief that had been prayed by Feike. Immediately upon the filing of these pleadings a receiver was appointed with full power to take possession of and manage the railroad and other property of the company. On the 20th of September, R. M. Shoemaker, T. Q. Ashburn, M. Jamison, P. F. Swing, and L. W. Bishop, trustees under various mortgages of the railroad company, came in voluntarily and by leave of the court made themselves parties defendant. On the 5th of November, Shoemaker, one of the trustees, answered the petition. On the 21st of February, 1884, the Lomas Forge and Bridge Company was made a defendant and filed a cross petition, asking to be paid certain claims for supplies out of the earnings of the road.

On the 5th of June, 1884, the Cambria Iron Company, a Pennsylvania corporation, filed an answer and cross petition, by leave of the court, to recover the price of a quantity of steel rails which had been delivered to the railroad company a short time before the appointment of the receiver and used in the construction of the railroad, or to have a return of the rails with a reasonable compensation for their use. A judgment for damages was also asked, because of a refusal to accept other rails which had been contracted for and a delivery tendered. On the 15th of June, Post & Co. were admitted defendants, and they filed an answer and cross petition asking payment of an amount due them for spikes, angle bars and bolts; and on the 19th of July, D. M. Richardson filed an answer and cross petition, in which he asked payment of an amount due him for the construction of part of the road. On the 6th of January, 1885, Shoemaker & Ashburn filed an answer and cross petition for a foreclosure of the mortgage executed to them as trustees, and on the 5th of February Richardson demurred to the answer and cross petition of the Cambria Iron Company. On the 5th of August the case was referred, on motion of Feike, Richardson and Ashburn, and with the consent of all the other parties, to a master to take testimony and report upon the questions and issues raised by the pleadings. This report was filed December 10, 1885, and on the 24th of the same month the Cambria Iron Company presented a petition for the removal of the suit to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Ohio, on the ground of prejudice and local influence. This petition set forth that the Iron Company was a citizen of Pennsylvania and all the other parties to the suit citizens of Ohio. The suit was entered in the circuit court, and on the 8th of February, 1886, Ashburn, one of the parties, moved that it be remanded (1) because it was not removable, and (2) because the petition was not filed in time. This motion was granted February 10, and from an order to that effect the appeal was taken.

There is here but one suit, and that between Stephen Feike, the plaintiff, a citizen of Ohio, on one side, and the several defendants, one a citizen of Pennsylvania, and the others citizens of Ohio, on the other side. It is conceded that the petition was filed too late for a removal under the Act of 1875, and that the Iron Company is not entitled to a removal on its separate petition under the third subdivision of section 639, Rev. Stat., unless because its cross petition presents a separate controversy in the suit in which that Company alone appears as plaintiff and all the other parties as defendant. It was decided at the present term, in Jefferson v. Driver, 117 U. S. 272 [Bk. 29, L. ed. 897], that the provision for a removal of a separable controversy in the second subdivision of section 639 did not apply to removals under the third subdivision; but it is now argued that this cannot be so, because the original Local Prejudice Act of March 2, 1867, 14 Stat. at L. 558, chap. 196, was enacted as an amendment of the Removal Act of July 27, 1866, 14 Stat. at L. 306, chap. 288, which had no other purpose than to authorize the removal of separable controversies. The law which governs this subject now is all found in section 639, and it was decided in United States v. Bowen, 100 U. S. 508 [Bk. 25, L. ed. 631], that "the Revised Statutes of the United States must be accepted as the law on the subjects which they embrace as it existed on the 1st of December, 1873. When their meaning is plain, the court cannot recur to the original statutes to see if errors were committed in revising them, but it may do so when necessary to construe doubtful language used in the revision."

There is nothing of doubtful meaning in this section. It is divided into three subdivisions, all relating to the removal of suits, but each providing for a separate class. The first embraces the cases provided for in section 12 of the Judiciary Act of 1789, 1 Stat. at L. 79, chap. 20; the second is for cases in which there is a separable controversy, and the third for cases affected by prejudice or local influence. Each subdivision is complete in itself and in no way depends on any other. Each describes the particular class of suits to which it relates, and without reference to the others. The language of the third subdivision is: "When a suit is between a citizen of the State in which it is brought and a citizen of another State, it may be so removed on the petition of the latter," if he files with his petition "an affidavit that he has reason to believe and does believe that, from prejudice and local influence, he will not be able to obtain justice in such state court." This is the language substantially of the Act of March 2, 1867, 14 Stat. at L. 559, as to which it was held in Sewing Machine Cases, 18 Wall. 553 [85 U. S. bk. 21, L. ed. 914]; Vannevar v. Bryant, 21 Wall. 41 [88 U. S. bk. 22, L. ed. 476]; and Myers v. Swann, 107 U. S. 547 [Bk. 27, L. ed. 583], that there could be no removal under that Act if all the parties on one side of the suit were not citizens of different States from those on the other. In the last case it was added: "It is not enough that there be a separable controversy between parties having the necessary citizenship, nor that the principal controversy is between citizens of different States. If there are necessary parties on one side of the suit, citizens of the same State with those on the other, the circuit court cannot take jurisdiction." [58]

We see no reason for departing from the decisions which have thus been made, and the order remanding the suit is affirmed.

This is an appeal under section 5 of the Act of March 3, 1875, 18 Stat. at L. 470, chap. 137, from an order of the circuit court remanding a cause which had been removed from a state court. The facts are these:

On the 14th of September, 1883, Stephen Feike brought suit in the Court of Common Pleas of Scioto County, Ohio, against the Cincinnati and Southeastern Railroad Company to collect a debt due to him from the railroad company and asking the appointment of a receiver. There is here but one suit, and that between Stephen Feike, the plaintiff, a citizen of Ohio, on one side, and the several defendants, one a citizen of Pennsylvania, and the others citizens of Ohio, on the other side. It is conceded that the petition was filed too late for a removal under the Act of 1875, and that the Iron Company is not entitled to a removal on its separate [57] petition under the third subdivision of section 639, Rev. It was decided at the present term, in Jefferson v. Driver, 117 U. Submitted Apr. 13, 1886. Decided Apr. 19, 1886.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Iowa. Motion to dismiss, with which is united a motion to affirm. Affirmed.

The case is stated by the court.

Mr. George Crane, for defendant in error, in support of motions.

Mr. C. H. Gatch, for plaintiff in error, contra.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit was brought in a state court of Iowa by Edward K. Goodnow, a citizen of New York, against Elizabeth T. Oakley, another citizen of the same State, to recover an amount claimed to be due for taxes paid by the Iowa Homestead Company and the Dubuque and Sioux City Railroad Company, both Iowa corporations, on lands belonging to the defendant. Before the suit was begun the two corporations assigned their respective claims to Goodnow, under an agreement by which he was "to use or exercise reasonable care or diligence to enforce said claims, demands or rights of action, and, after deducting all costs and expenses in so doing, to hold the proceeds or amounts collected in trust for the use and benefit of the parties owning." A copy of this agreement was annexed to the petition as an exhibit.

On the 16th of December, 1880, which was in time, the defendant presented her petition for a removal of the suit to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Iowa, on [44] the ground that Goodnow "is only a nominal party to said suit, and has no interest therein whatsoever, but is prosecuting the same for the sole and exclusive use and benefit of the Iowa Homestead Company and Dubuque and Sioux City Railroad Company, which were, at the commencement of this suit and still are, corporations created and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the State of Iowa, each having its principal · · ice of business in said State of Iowa, which said railroad and homestead companies directed the commencement of said suit, employed counsel to prosecute the same, and are directing and controlling its prosecution."

The state court proceeded with the suit, notwithstanding the petition for removal, and gave judgment against the defendant. This judgment was affirmed by the Supreme Court of the State on an appeal, that court being of opinion that the suit had not been removed. To reverse that judgment this writ of error was brought, and Goodnow now moves to dismiss for want of jurisdiction, and with that he unites a motion to affirm.

The motion to dismiss must be denied, because a right of removal under the Act of March 3, 1875, 18 Stat. at L. 470, chap. 137, was claimed by the defendant and the decision was against the right. This presents a federal question and gives us jurisdiction; but, as the decision was in accordance with our judgment in Provident Savings L. Assur. Soc. v. Ford, 114 U. S. 635 [Bk. 29, L. ed. 261], the motion to affirm is granted. In that case it was said p. 641 [263]: "We know of no instance where the want of consideration in a transfer, or a colorable transfer of a right of action from a person against whom the defendant would have a right of removal to a person against whom he would not have such a right, has been held a good ground for removing a cause from a state court to a Federal Court. Where an assignment of a cause of action is colorably made for the purpose of giving jurisdiction to the United States court, section 5 of the Act of Congress of March 3, 1875, * * * has now given to the circuit courts power to dismiss or remand the cause at any time when the fact is made to appear. And by analogy to this law, it may perhaps, be a good defense to an action in a state court, to show that a colorable assignment has [45] been made to deprive the United States court of jurisdiction; but, as before said, it would be a defense to the action, and not a ground of removing that cause into the Federal Court."

Our attention was called in the argument to the fact that in the present case it appears that the assignee is "only a nominal party to said suit," and that the assignor "directed the commencement of the suit, employed counsel to prosecute the same, and is directing and controlling its prosecution," while in the other it was only alleged that the assignment was "merely colorable," and that the plaintiff was "not the real party in interest:" but the opinion in the other case, p. 638 [268], shows that it was further alleged that the assignment "was made without any consideration, and merely for the purpose of prosecuting and collecting" the claim for the benefit of the assignor, "and to avoid the necessity of" the assignor's "giving security for costs as a nonresident of this State, and to embarrass, and, if possible, prevent the transfer of this action to the United States Courts, and that the controtroversy * * * is in reality and in substance between the defendant" and the assignor, "who are citizens of different States." The two cases are thus substantially alike, and this is clearly governed by that. While, therefore, the courts of the United States have under the Act of 1875 the power to dismiss or remand a case, if it appears that a colorable assignment has been made for the purpose of imposing on their jurisdiction, no authority has as yet been given them to take jurisdiction of a case by removal from a state court when a colorable assignment has been made to prevent such a removal.

Under the law as it now stands, resort can only be had to the state courts for protection against the consequences of such an encroachment on the rights of a defendant.

The motion to dismiss is denied, and that to affirm granted.

[10] JOHN DORNAN, FRANCIS MAYBIN, ET AL., Trading as DORNAN, MAYBIN & COMPANY.

Patent on carpet design—description—infringement—damages.

1. A sufficient description and claim is contained in the following specification of letters patent for a design for a carpet. "The nature of my design is fully represented in the accompanying photographic illustration to which reference is made. I claim as my invention, the configuration of the design hereunto annexed, when applied to carpeting." The illustration contained a single figure or design. The claim covers the design as a whole and not any part of it as a part, and it is to be tested as a whole, as to novelty and infringement.

2. An infringement of letters patent for a design of a carpet could be committed only by making, using and selling carpets containing the patented design; and an interlocutory decree describing the profits and damages to be accounted for, as only those for infringement, is proper. The ruling in Dobson v. Hartford Carpet Co. Bk. 29, approved.

3. In a suit for the infringement of letters patent of a design for a carpet, the plaintiff must show what profits or damages are attributable to the use of the infringing design. Where the defendants' carpets were so inferior in quality that they sold them at a much less price than the plaintiffs got for their carpets, it is error to take the whole of the profit made by plaintiffs as the measure of damages, on the assumption that the whole of it was due solely to the design, and on the further assumption that the plaintiffs would have sold of their higher grade carpets a quantity equal to the cheaper lower grade carpets sold by the defendants.

4. Where in a suit for an infringement of letters patent for a design for a carpet, there was testimony of witnesses showing such infringement, with contradictory evidence also, and a piece of carpet containing the patented design and another piece alleged to infringe, were exhibited to the court, and such exhibits are not produced in the Supreme Court, no error can be predicated of the finding by the circuit court that their use was an infringement.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania. Reversed, etc.

The case is stated by the court.

Messrs. Hector T. Fenton and Richard P. White, for appellants.

Mr. L. C. Cleemann, for appellees.

This is a suit in equity brought in February, 1875, by the appellees, trading as Dornan, Maybin & Co., against the appellants, John Dobson and James Dobson in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania, for the infringement of letters patent No. 6822, for a design for a carpet, granted to Charles A. Righter, August 19, 1873, for 3½ years. The entire specification is as follows: "Be it known, that I, Chas. A. Righter, of the City of Philadelphia, County of Philadelphia, State of Pennsylvania, have invented and produced a new and original design for carpets, of which the following is a specification: the nature of my design is fully represented in the accompanying photographic illustration, to which reference is made. I claim as my invention—The configuration of the design hereunto annexed, when applied to carpeting." The photographic illustration is a six inch square, containing a single figure or design. The only defense set up in the answer is noninfringement. Issue being joined, proofs were taken, and the case was heard, and in April, 1876, a decree was made finding that the patent was valid and had been infringed, and awarding to the plaintiffs costs and an account of profits and damages before a master, and a perpetual injunction. The master made his report in April, 1882. He found that the defendants had made no profits, and stated thus the contending views of the parties, as to the proper rule of damages: "The complainants asked to have awarded to them, as damages and compensation for the injury inflicted upon them, whatever profit the defendants may have made, and also whatever loss they, the complainants, had incurred, which could be measured by the profits that would have accrued to them if they had made the exclusive sales of the carpet, deducting in such case the amount of profits, if any, made by the defendants. The defendants, however, contended that all that the complainants were entitled to was not what they, the defendants, had made or saved on the carpets, but only what they made or saved by reason of the use of the pattern, as [13] compared with what they could have made without it; and, therefore, unless they could sell the carpet bearing the design at a higher price than other carpets, whereby they made more or lost less, no profit resulted to them. They further contended that, unless it was shown by direct evidence that the complainants would have made the sales which the defendants did, had they not infringed, the fact could not be inferred." The master found that the profit of the plaintiffs consisted in the exclusive use of the invention, and in the monopoly of manufacturing for others to use; that they sold their carpets at from ten to fifteen cents a yard more than the defendants did, and made a profit, in 1874, of 18¾ per cent, and in 1875, of 10¼ per cent, their average price per yard being more than $1; that the defendants might have made an equal profit if they had asked the same prices, and the benefit, gain or advantage to them might be reasonably estimated as equivalent to the money profit they might have made; that it was to be presumed that the defendants' carpets displaced the plaintiffs' in the market; that it was proper to award to the plaintiffs an amount equal to the profits they could have made, in 1874 and 1875, on the carpets made and sold by the defendants, if the plaintiffs themselves had made and sold them; that the defendants made and sold, in 1874, 19,243¼ yards, which would have yielded, at $1 a yard, $19,243.50, on which the profits of the plaintiffs, at 18¾ per cent, would have been $3,645.97; that the defendants made and sold, in 1875, 31,280¼ yards, which would have yielded at $1 a yard, $31,280.50, on which the profits of the plaintiffs, at 10¼ per cent, would have been $3,362.65; and that, therefore, the plaintiffs had sustained $6,008.62 damages by the infringement of the patent.

The defendants excepted to the report, but the court confirmed it, and in October, 1882, rendered a decree for the plaintiffs for $6,128.79, from which the defendants have appealed.

It is assigned for error that the patent is void on its face for want of a sufficient description and claim. It was issued under the Act of July 8, 1870, chap. 230, 16 Stat. at L. 198. Sections 71, 72 and 76 of that Act provided as follows: "Sec. 71. Any person who, by his own industry, genius, efforts and expense, has invented or produced any new and original de- [14] sign for a manufacture, bust, statue, alto-relievo, or bas-relief; any new and original design for the printing of woolen, silk, cotton or other fabrics; any new and original impression, ornament, pattern, print or picture, to be printed, painted, cast or otherwise placed on or worked into any article of manufacture; or any new, useful and original shape or configuration of any article of manufacture, the same not having been known or used by others before his invention or production thereof, or patented, or described in any printed publication, may, upon payment of the duty required by law, and other due proceedings had, the same as in cases of inventions or discoveries, obtain a patent therefor." "Sec. 72. The commissioner may dispense with models or designs when the design can be sufficiently represented by drawings or photographs." "Sec. 76. All the regulations and provisions which apply to the obtaining or protection of patents for inventions or discoveries, not inconsistent with the provisions of this Act, shall apply to patents for designs."

It is contended that section 26 of the Act of July 8, 1870, applies to the present case. That section provides that before any person shall receive a patent for his invention or discovery, he shall file in the Patent Office a written description of it, and "particularly point out and distinctly claim the part, improvement or combination which he claims as his invention or discovery." It is urged that section 26 was not complied with in this case, and that the patent is void because it contains no description, and no proper claim.

But we are of opinion that the description and claim are sufficient. The purport of the description is, that what the photographic illustration represents as a whole is the invention. It is that which is claimed, when applied to carpeting. The design is a pattern to be worked into a carpet, and is within the statute. Claiming "the configuration of the design" is the same thing as claiming the design, or the figure, or the pattern. It is better represented by the photographic illustration than it could be by any description, and a description would probably not be intelligible without the illustration.

In Dobson v. Bigelow Carpet Co. 114 U. S. 439, 446 [Bk. 29, L. ed. 177], the claim of the design patent was "the design for a carpet, substan- [15] tially as shown." Objection was taken to the form of the claim. But this court said it saw no good objection to the form, and that the claim referred to the description as well as the drawing, in using the word "shown." The drawing there was a photographic illustration of the body and border of the carpet, described in the specification as representing a face view. But the description was merely, that a was an irregular, shield like figure, surrounded by a border embellished by floral decoration; that b b were two irregular figures of the same design, but having a different ground color from a, and arranged at opposite sides diagonally of each shield; that c c were tassel-like ornaments, arranged beneath the several figures a; that d were bouquets, and there were other floral ornamentations; that the border contained an inner plain stripe f, and an outer zigzag stripe g, having inwardly projecting semi-circular ornaments h; that between the stripes f and g were representations of shields resembling the shield a, and floral decorations extending over the stripe f, as shown; and that the tassel-like ornaments c were also in the border. Unaided by the illustration, probably many different designs might have been drawn, to which the description would have applied; and the description furnished no aid whatever in identifying the design. So, in the present case, the design is sufficiently identified by the illustration, without the aid of any description. In the language of section 72, before cited, the design is sufficiently represented by the photograph.

Undoubtedly the claim in this case covers the design as a whole, and not any part of it as a part; and it is to be tested as a whole as to novelty and infringement. The answer admits that Righter was the original and first inventor of the design for which the patent was granted, and does not question the novelty of the invention.

Exception is taken to the form of the interlocutory decree, in that, while it awards a recovery for the profits and damages from the infringement of the design, it orders an account to be taken of the profits of the defendants from infringing upon the exclusive rights of the plaintiffs "by the manufacture, use and sale of carpeting bearing said patented design," and of [16] the additional damages suffered by the plaintiffs "by reason of said infringements." We do not think the decree is open to the objection made. It is not like the decree in Littlefield v. Perry, 21 Wall. 205, 228 [88 U. S. bk. 22, L. ed. 577]. It directs an account of the profits from the infringement. The infringement could be committed only by making, using and selling carpets containing the patented design; but the profits and damages to be accounted for are described as only those from the infringement.

It is also contended that the weight of the evidence on the question of infringement was with the defendants. The court below found otherwise. It appears by the record that a piece of carpet, Exhibit No. 2, was introduced in evidence as containing the patented design; and another piece of carpet, Exhibit No. 3, as being the defendants' carpet, alleged to infringe. Those exhibits have not been produced on the hearing in this court, although the brief for the appellants states that the circuit court evidently decided the question of infringement with little aid other than ocular inspection of the samples. This court has not the benefit of any such aid. We find, however, in the record, testimony of a witness to the effect that, from his experience as a seller of carpets, he thinks it would be almost impossible for anyone who had not seen the two carpets together to tell them apart; and of another witness, that, in his opinion, not one customer in twenty-five would know the difference; and other testimony tending to the same result. While there is evidence contradictory of this, we cannot, in the absence of ocular inspection, take it upon ourselves to say that the circuit court erred in finding infringement.

The only remaining question is that of the amount of damages. The master and the circuit court proceeded on a view which had been adopted by that court in the three cases adjudged by it, the decrees in which were reversed by this court in Dobson v. Hartford Carpet Co. 114 U. S. 439 [Bk. 29, L. ed. 177]. The present case was decided by the circuit court before such reversal. We are of opinion that the decision cited covers all the questions involved in the case at bar, and requires that the final decree in it should be reversed. In the cases in 114 U. S., the patents being for designs for carpets, it was found that no profits had been made by the defendant, but the circuit [17] court allowed to the plaintiff, as damages, in respect to the yards of infringing carpet made and sold by the defendant, the sum per yard which was the profit of the plaintiff in making and selling carpets with the patented design, there being no evidence as to the value imparted to the carpet by the design. This court held that such award of damages was improper, and that only nominal damages should have been allowed. It is not necessary to recapitulate the views set forth in 114 U. S., which controlled that decision. The present case cannot be distinguished.

It is urged that the principle on which damages are to be computed in respect to a patent for a machine, or for an improvement in a machine, or for a process, is not applicable to a patent for a design, because, in a patent for a design, the result is patented, while in the other kind of patent the means are patented; that in the design patent there is no other way of effecting the result, while in the other there generally is; and that, therefore, in the design patent the entire profits or damages on the article containing the design are to be given, while in the other only those belonging to the particular improvement patented are to be allowed. But we think all that is here urged is covered by what was said in the cases in 114 U. S. The plaintiff must show what profits or damages are attributable to the use of the infringing design.

In the present case, the master found that the plaintiffs' profit on their carpets was a certain percentage, and assumed or presumed that the defendants' carpets, which were far inferior in quality as well as in market value, displaced those of the plaintiffs to the extent of the sales by the defendants, and held that the entire profit which the plaintiffs would have received, at such percentage, from the sale of an equal quantity of their own carpets of the same pattern, was the proper measure of their damages. The defendants' carpets were so inferior in quality that they sold them at a much less price than the plaintiffs got for their carpets, and even at those prices the defendants made [18] no profits. Under these circumstances there can be no presumption that the plaintiffs would have sold their better quality of carpets in place of the defendants' poorer quality, if the latter had not existed, or that the pattern would have induced the purchasers from the defendants to give to the plaintiffs the higher price. On the contrary, the presumption is at least equal that the cheaper price, and not the pattern, sold the defendants' carpets. There was no satisfactory testimony that those who bought the cheap carpets from the defendants would have bought the higher priced ones from the plaintiffs, or that the design added anything to the defendants' price, or promoted their sale of the particular carpet; and none to show what part of the defendants' price was to be attributed to the design.

It does not evade the force of the principle governing the case that, in arriving at the percentage of profit made by the plaintiffs on their sales, the cost was made up by computing all the items which entered into the production of their carpets. The objection is to taking the whole of that profit as the measure of damages, on the assumption that the whole of it was due solely to the design, and on the further assumption that the plaintiffs would have sold of their higher grade carpets a quantity equal to the cheaper lower grade carpets sold by the defendants.

The final decree of the Circuit Court is reversed, and the cases remanded to that court, with direction to disallow the award of damages, and to award six cents damages, and to allow to the defendants a recovery for their costs after interlocutory decree, and to the plaintiffs a recovery for their costs to and including interlocutory decree.

Field, J., I concur in the reversal of the decree, but am of opinion that the patent was invalid, and that the bill should, therefore, be dismissed.

BOARD OF LIQUIDATION OF THE CITY OF NEW ORLEANS, Plff. in Err., [136]

v.

UNITED STATES, ex rel. JUDAH HART.

(See S. C. "New Orleans Board of Liquidation v. Hart," Reporter's ed. 136-147.)

Indebtedness of New Orleans—Statutes and Constitution of the State—preferring creditors—contract between Board of Liquidation and judgment creditor—mandamus to compel issue of bonds.

1. Property of a municipal corporation undoubtedly may be appropriated, and special taxes pledged, to meet future debts created for public purposes; but the Legislature of Louisiana cannot, under the Code of that State, authorize a municipality to appropriate its entire property and revenues, except what might be required for the support of its government, to a class of existing demands over others equally entitled to payment.

2. Article 254 of the Constitution of 1879, providing for the liquidation of the indebtedness of the city and the application of its assets to the satisfaction thereof, also forbids such preference as to indebtedness in existence at the time of the adoption of that Constitution.

Holders of the floating debt of New Orleans, existing at the time of the passage of the Act of 1880, who have established its validity by judicial proceedings, cannot be excluded from sharing in the proceeds of property and funds which are, by that Act, appropriated to purchase and retire her bonds, notwithstanding the provision excepting from its benefits the floating indebtedness.

3. The relator obtained in 1882 a judgment against the City of New Orleans founded on contracts made from 1871 to 1877. In 1884 he made a compromise with the city, by which it was, in part, provided that the balance of the judgment, not otherwise provided for, should be funded under the provisions of the Act of 1884. The petition alleged that the city made no objection to the performance of the contract but that the Board of Liquidation refused to issue the bonds. Held, on a review of the constitutional and legislative provisions, that the relator was entitled to a mandamus compelling the issue of the bonds.

Submitted Jan 4, 1886. Decided Apr. 19, 1886

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Louisiana. Affirmed with instructions.

[137] Statement by Mr. Justice Field:

This was a petition in the name of the United States, on the relation of Judah Hart, a citizen of New York, for a mandamus to the Board of Liquidation of the City of New Orleans—a corporation organized under the laws of the State and having charge of the financial affairs of the city—to prepare and issue to him bonds of the city for the amount of his demand. The facts as stated in the petition and found by the court, are briefly as follows: On the 8d of March, 1882, the relator recovered judgment in the Circuit Court of the United States against the city for $121,697.18, which drew interest from its date at the rate of 5 per cent per annum. This judgment was founded on contracts for municipal purposes made from 1871 to 1877, inclusive. To review it the city sued out a writ of error from this court, but, as it did not operate as a supersedeas, the relator caused a writ of fieri facias to be issued, and levied upon certain moneys due and to become due to the city by the Canal and Claiborne Street Railroad Company and by the Orleans Railroad Company, and also upon the interest of the city in the New Orleans Sugar Shed Company and in the Orleans Sugar Sheds. Proceedings were taken to contest these seizures, but judgment was rendered in his favor, to review which the city sued out a writ of error together with a supersedeas.

[138] While these cases were pending in this court, the relator and the city entered into a compromise, by which it was agreed, among other things, that she should dismiss the writs of error, and that he should renounce his seizure of the sugar sheds, apply the bonus due and to become due by the railway companies to the payment of his judgment, and fund the balance under the provisions of the Act known as No. 67 of the Legislature of the State of 1884.

Under the writ various sums were collected, which, on the 8th of July, 1885, had reduced the judgment to $76,194.62. The relator complied with the terms of the compromise on his part, and called upon the Board to prepare and deliver to him bonds, under the provisions of Act No. 67, of 1884, for the balance due on his judgment; but the Board refused to comply with the demand.

The petition alleged that the city made no objection to the performance of this duty by the Board, but that the Board refused on its own account. The relator, therefore, prayed for an alternative writ of mandamus commanding the Board to prepare and issue the bonds of the city, pursuant to Act 67 of 1884, to the amount and value of the balance due on his judgment, and deliver them to him, and that the Board be cited to answer his demand, and that upon the hearing the writ be made peremptory.

The Board appeared and answered the petition, setting up that all the property of the city not dedicated to public use, and also the surplus of what was known as the Premium Bond Tax, were pledged, under Act No. 58, of 1882, and by previous legislation, to the payment of other bonds of the city which were outstanding, and that the Act of 1884, in so far as it directs a diversion of that property and fund, impairs the contract with the holders of those bonds, and is, therefore, unconstitutional and void.

By consent of parties, the Sun Mutual Insurance Company, as the holder of such outstanding bonds, intervened and joined with the Board in asserting the unconstitutionality of Act 67 of 1884. The court granted a peremptory mandamus as prayed, and to review that judgment the case was brought here.

Mr. Henry C. Miller, for the Board of Liquidation.

Messrs. H. J. Leovy, G. J. Leovy, E. D. White and J. P. Blair, for the Sun Mutual Insurance Company.

Mr. E. H. Farrar, for Judah Hart.

To understand clearly the position of the Board of Liquidation, and appreciate the ground of its refusal to issue the bonds, under Act No. 67 of 1884, pursuant to the terms of the compromise, it will be necessary to refer briefly to the Act of March 6, 1876, known as the Premium Bond Act, out of which the surplus of the premium bond tax arises, and to the Act of April 10, 1880, to liquidate the indebtedness of the city and create the Board of Liquidation, as well as to the Acts of 1882 and 1884.

The Premium Bond Act was an attempt to coerce creditors of the city to accept the plan proposed by her counsel for the payment of her indebtedness by withholding from them all other means of payment of their demands. The city was at the time almost in a bankrupt condition, and the sums required to meet the interest on her admitted indebtedness rendered taxation not only burdensome but oppressive. The plan was to exchange all recognized and valid bonds of the city and of Jefferson and Carrollton, which had become incorporated with her, for premium bonds to be issued under the Act. The latter were to be of the denomination of $20 each, to be dated September 1, 1875, and to bear interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum from July 15, 1875, but not payable at any designated period. That, both as to principal and interest, was to be determined by a lottery. They were to be divided into series of one hundred each. A certain number of the series was to be drawn according to a prescribed schedule; and it would depend upon the number drawn whether a bond would be paid in one year or in fifty years.

The Act forbade the levy of a tax for the payment of the principal or interest of any other bonds, repealed all laws requiring or authorizing the city to lay any such tax, and declared that it should be incompetent for any court to issue a mandamus to the officers of the city to levy and collect a tax for interest on other bonds. To meet the interest on the premium bonds and provide for other municipal wants, it further declared that a tax of only 1½ per cent per annum on the assessed value of property in the city should be levied, and that this limitation of her taxing power was a contract, not only with the holder of them, but [140] also with every resident and taxpayer, so as to authorize him to legally object to any higher rate of taxation. Under this plan premium bonds to the amount of $20,000,000 were prepared, of which a number equal to $13,263,300 was issued for other bonds. The remainder was not issued, because creditors refused to accept them. Holders of other bonds brought suits to compel the levy of a greater tax to pay them, pursuant to stipulations made, or implied at the time of their issue, that sufficient sums should be raised to meet the principal and interest on them. In those suits this court declared that the limitation upon the taxing power which the city possessed at the time the bonds were issued, and upon the faith of which they were taken, was invalid as impairing the obligation of her contract with the holders. Wolff v. New Orleans, 103 U. S. 358 [Bk. 26, L. ed. 395], and Louisiana v. Pilsbury, 105 U. S. 278 [Bk. 26, L. ed. 1095].

Subsequently the city purchased with the proceeds of certain railroad franchises premium bonds to the value of $3,567,360, and under the operation of the plan a large number was extinguished, so that when the petition of the relator was presented there remained outstanding of those bonds only $7,918,280. But, notwithstanding the reduction made at different times, the tax was levied annually for interest on the whole number prepared, thus creating an excess beyond the amount required.

The Constitution of Louisiana, adopted in 1879, ordained that the General Assembly, at its next session, should enact such legislation as might be proper to liquidate the indebtedness of the city, and to apply its assets to the satisfaction thereof. Article 254. Under this requirement, and in supposed compliance with it, the General Assembly, on the 10th of April, 1880, passed the Act known as No. 133 of that year, creating a Board of Liquidation, investing it with exclusive control of all matters relating to the bonded debt, directing it to prepare bonds to be issued for negotiation or exchange, and with them or their proceeds to retire and cancel the entire valid debt of the city, except the floating debt, previously created, and requiring the city authorities to transfer to it, as soon [141] as possible after its organization, all the property of the city, real and personal, not dedicated to public use. The Board was empowered to dispose of the property and deposit the proceeds with its fiscal agent to the credit of the "city debt fund."

Nothing in the Act was to be construed as affecting or in any manner impairing the Premium Bond Act, but the city authorities were to transfer to the Board all moneys collected on account of the tax levied in accordance with the provisions of that Act, and the Board was to apportion the proceeds and apply the same pro rata, and in the proportion which each form of bonded debt should bear to the entire amount of the city debt. Such portions as should not properly belong to the outstanding premium bonds were to be applied to pay interest on the bonds to be issued. The surplus from the collection of the debt and interest tax, or that arising from the sale of assets in the hands of the Board, after paying such interest, was to be used to purchase and retire valid bonds of the city.

This Act of 1880 did not cause the intended retirement and cancellation of the debt of the city. No bonds were issued under its provisions, and the General Assembly on the 30th of June, 1882, passed Act No. 58 of that year. It recited that litigation had hitherto resulted disastrously for the taxpayer; that the creditors of the city had indicated a desire to settle their claims equitably, and to postpone the payment of certain bonds in order to lighten the burden of taxation; and that the Constitution contemplated a definite termination of her embarrassment by special legislative enactments. It authorized her, through the Board, to extend for the period of forty years payment of all outstanding bonds other than premium bonds, at a rate of interest not exceeding 6 per cent, and to issue certificates drawing like interest for the unpaid coupons on outstanding bonds prior to the first of January, 1883, for which no judgment tax was levied, and to levy and collect a special tax to pay the interest on all bonds other than premium bonds and on the certificates for matured coupons.

The sixth section declared that all funds then, or that under existing laws might be, in the hands of the Board should be deposited with its fiscal agent and credited to the city debt fund, and that such fund should be applied [142] exclusively to the purchase of outstanding bonds or coupons and the certificates therefor, which were extended to be retired under the Act, except that the fund should first be used to pay the interest on the bonds and the certificates.

The seventh section provided that the surplus, if any, of the premium bond tax of each year, or on hand at the passage of the Act, after all the drawn series, interest and premiums thereon, exigible or due to the holders thereof had been provided for or fully paid, should also be deposited with the fiscal agent of the Board on account of the city debt fund and applied exclusively in payment of the interest on the outstanding bonds and certificates.

The tenth section declared that the Act in all its parts was to be deemed and to constitute a valid and binding contract between the State, the city, its residents, citizens and taxpayers, and the holders of the bonds extended, and that the judicial process of the State, authorized by law or in force at the creation of the bonded debt, might be resorted to, and should be recognized and applied for the enforcement of its provisions in favor of any party showing just cause of complaint for their violation. Under the Act the Board issued bonds exceeding $4,000,000, on which the interest has been paid, in part by the tax provided and in part out of the premium bond tax, there being a surplus of moneys collected by that tax beyond what was required for the interest on the premium bonds outstanding.

The Act of July 9, 1884, known as Act No. 67 of that year, amends several sections of Act No. 133 of 1880. It extends the authority of the Board, and gives it exclusive control and direction over all matters relating not only to the bonded debt, but also to the judgment debt of the city. Section 3 of the Act of 1880, as amended, provides for retiring and canceling the entire debt of the city then in the form of executory judgments, or which might thereafter become merged into them, except the floating debt or claims created for 1879, and subsequent years; and also for the preparation of bonds similar in their general character to those mentioned in the Act of 1880, to be exchanged [143] for the judgments or sold, and the proceeds applied to their payment. The fifth section, as amended, provides, with greater particularity than the original section, for transferring to the Board the property of the city not dedicated to public use, and its assets, realized and to be realized, except such assets and revenues as pertain to the administration of the city and are necessary for its support; and it authorizes and requires the Board to dispose of the same, other than stock held in corporations, on such terms and conditions as it may deem best for the interests of the city, and to apply the proceeds, first, to the payment of the interest on the bonds authorized by the Act, and, second, to their redemption and cancellation.

There is no doubt of the right of the relator under the Act of 1884 to the bonds promised in the compromise with the city. His judgment is of the class of debts which it is made the duty of the Board to retire and cancel by the exchange of the bonds provided, or by the sale of them and the application of their proceeds. The Board refuses to issue them solely on the ground that the Acts of 1882 and 1884 conflict as to the application of the property and funds of the city; the first Act applying them to the payment of the bonded debt and certificates for matured coupons specified therein, and the second to the payment of bonds issued in cancellation of executory judgments against the city.

As seen by the preceding statement, all the property and funds of the city, and the excess of the proceeds derived from the tax for the interest on premium bonds beyond what was needed, were, by the Act of 1880, pledged to pay her entire debt, except the floating debt previously created. This floating debt may have been as meritorious as the funded debt, and the duty to make provision for its payment equally binding. Why all the property and funds of the city should be appropriated to pay the latter debt, to the exclusion of the former, does not appear. The Constitution of 1879 contemplates that provision shall be made for the payment of the entire debt. It declares that the General Assembly, at its next session, "shall enact such legislation as may be proper to liquidate the indebtedness of the City of New Or-[144] leans, and to apply its assets to the satisfaction thereof;" and this means obviously the entire indebtedness in whatever form it exists, whether bonded or floating, and not merely a part of it. And the application of the assets of the city is to be in satisfaction of all the debts alike, and if not sufficient to extinguish them it is to be made in some ratable proportion. Such is, we think, the clear import of the constitutional mandate, and its purpose is in harmony with the settled law of the State, which has always recognized as sound and just the rule that the property of the debtor should, as far as practicable, be appropriated to the payment of all his debts. The Civil Code, in force since 1825, declares that "Whoever has bound himself personally is obliged to fulfill his engagement out of all his property, movable and immovable, present and future." Art. 3149. Although this provision does not in terms designate artificial persons, it embraces them within its scope. Whenever corporations, private or municipal, are permitted by the Legislature to contract debts, they are brought equally with natural persons under the dominion of this law and are alike bound by it. The Code also declares that "The property of the debtor is the common pledge of his creditors, and the proceeds of its sale must be distributed among them ratably, unless there exist among the creditors some lawful causes of preference." Art. 3150. The Supreme Court of the State, in the case of the Succession of Taylor, 10 La. Ann. 510, in speaking of this last article, said: "We do not think this article of the Code a mere idle recognition of an equitable principle, not intended to give the creditor any positive right to the property of his debtor. On the contrary, we think the whole of our legislation recognizes such an interest of the creditor in the property of the debtor as to give to the creditor the right to watch over this common pledge, and prevent the debtor himself from fraudulently parting with it."

This language was used in a case where a widow with minor children, left in necessitous circumstances, and not possessing in their own right property to the amount of $1,000, undertook as administratrix to distribute that sum to herself and children, under a statute of the State, which allows a widow, in those circumstances, to receive from the succession of her deceased father or husband that sum, or sufficient when added to their property to make [145 that sum, and requires it to be paid in preference to all other debts, except those for the vendor's privilege, and the expenses in selling property. The court held that the statute did not protect the property of the succession from creditors whose claims existed prior to its passage. The principle here asserted would undoubtedly cover the case at bar, if the appropriation of the property and funds of the city to the payment of certain claims, to the exclusion of others equally valid, had been made by her voluntary act; but being made by direction of the statute, it may be questioned whether its validity, independently of the constitutional provision, could be successfully assailed. The rule declared, however just in itself, can hardly be regarded as anything more than indicating the spirit which should control legislation in providing for the application of the property of a debtor to the discharge of his debts; although Mr. Justice Bullard of the Supreme Court of the State, in Atchafalaya R. R. & Banking Co. v. Bean, 8 Rob. (La.) 414, thought "it clear that the Legislature cannot constitutionally, by any Act subsequent to the creation of a debt, interfere to change or disturb the relation between debtor and creditor, or the relative rank of creditors inter se; and that two creditors who stood equal originally in the eyes of the law, and had an equal right to be paid, neither having any special lien or privilege over the other, must forever remain equal, notwithstanding any Act of the Legislature apparently sanctioning a different doctrine."

Property undoubtedly may be appropriated and special taxes pledged to meet future debts created for public purposes; but legislation would conflict with the spirit as well as the express letter of the Code, if it authorized a municipal body to appropriate its entire property and revenues, except what might be required for the support of its government, to a class of existing demands over others equally entitled to payment. So far as the indebtedness of the city, existing at the adoption of the Constitution of 1879, is concerned, we think the clause mentioned prohibits any such preference and appropriation. We are therefore of opinion that holders of her floating debt existing at the passage of the Act of 1880, who have established its validity by judicial proceedings—and 146] such is the position of the relator with his claim—cannot, under the Constitution of 1879, be excluded from sharing in the proceeds of property and funds which by that Act are in terms appropriated to purchase and retire her bonds. The Code recognizes, as we have seen, the justice of an appropriation of the property of the debtor for the payment of all his debts ratably. In the spirit of this equitable principle, the Constitution of 1879 required that all the debts of the city existing at that time should be provided for, and any pledge of her entire property and revenues to the payment of one class of her debts to the exclusion of others is repugnant to that instrument.

The Act of 1882 did not change the position of the relator. It authorized the renewal and extension of outstanding bonds of the city other than premium bonds, and the issue of interest-bearing certificates for matured coupons; but the provision of the Act of 1880 for transferring all the property of the city not dedicated to public use to the Board, creating a fund to purchase and retire her bonds, continued in force. It changed the application of the fund to the payment of the renewed and extended bonds and certificates for matured coupons; but it made no provision for the floating debt created previously to the Act of 1880.

The Act of 1884 amends several sections of the Act of 1880, and as amended they are to be read from their passage as parts of that Act. They provide that the property and funds of the city shall be appropriated to pay, first, interest on bonds issued to retire and cancel the debts of the city in the form of executory judgments, or which might become merged into such judgments, except the floating debt created after 1878; and second, to redeem and cancel the bonds. It does not refer to the Act of 1882; and we infer that the Legislature intended, not to supersede all the provisions of that Act for the payment of other bonds of the city, but to place on the same footing with them bonds issued for executory judgments. We must, therefore, construe it as extending the 147] appropriation made by the Act of 1882 to the payment of bonds issued for such judgments, in addition to the payment of the bonds provided for by that Act, and not as merely limiting it to the payment of such judgments.

The objectionable feature in all the previous Acts is their attempt to do partial justice, by discriminating between creditors equally meritorious, and applying the property and funds of the city to the payment of some of them in preference to others. In our opinion this cannot be done. All creditors at the time the property and funds were appropriated were entitled, for the payment of their respective claims, when legally established, to share ratably in the proceeds of the property and funds. The relator, with his judgment against the city, has a right to stand, with reference to those proceeds, on an equal footing with her other creditors, notwithstanding that by the terms of the Act of 1882 he is excluded from all participation in them; and, to enable him to do so, he can demand the bonds of the city for the balance due him, pursuant to the compromise with the municipality. With the bonds he will not have any preference over other bondholders, but will be entitled to share ratably with them in the proceeds of the property appropriated for the payment of their bonds.

The judgment ordering a mandamus is, therefore, affirmed, but with instructions to the court below to modify its directions as to the payment of the bonds issued, in accordance with this opinion.

March 13, 1877, Hon. R. W. Thompson became Secretary of the Navy, whereupon and before commencement of suit the following correspondence was had, viz.:

Navy Department, Washington,
March 16, 1877.

Gentlemen:

You are hereby notified to discontinue all [4 work by you contracted for with this Department or any Bureau thereof since March 1, 1877, until you shall be otherwise directed by the Secretary of the Navy.

Respectfully yours,
R. W. Thompson,

Hon. R. W. Thompson, March 24th, 1880.
Secretary of the Navy.

Sir: You are hereby notified that the South Boston Iron Company claims damages, interest and expenses of the United States in the sum of two hundred thousand ($200,000) dollars, by reason of the suspension by you of a certain contract made by your immediate predecessor in office (Mr. Robeson) on or about the 7th of March, 1877, which contract was for boilers to be furnished by said Company to the Navy Department of said United States, as specified in said contract, and that a suit for the recovery of the same will be commenced immediately.

Very respectfully,
Timothy Davis,

Hon. Secretary of the Navy,

Sir: I had the honor on the 24th inst. to communicate to you the claim and intentions of the South Boston Iron Company under the contracts made by your predecessor with said Company for boilers on or about the 7th and 10th of March, 1877.

I have received no acknowledgment of the receipt of said communication by you, and I have now respectfully to inquire if said communication reached you, and if you have any views to express as to said Company's claim for damages, before the commencement of a suit, as indicated in my said letter of the 24th instant.

Very Respectfully, Your Ob't Servant,
Timothy Davis,
Agent South Boston Iron Company.

Navy Department,
Washington, March 30th, 1880.

Sir: Your letter of the 24th inst. and your [42] letter of this date have been received.

Very Respectfully,
R. W. Thompson,
Secretary of the Navy.

Timothy Davis, Esq.,
Ag't South Boston Iron Co.,
Washington.

Claimant's petition was dismissed, the court of claims holding that such correspondence did not constitute a compliance with the provision of the statute then in force requiring all contracts made with the Secretary of the Navy "to be reduced to writing and signed by the contracting parties, with their names at the end thereof" and was therefore void. Claimant thereupon appealed to this court.

Mr. John C. Fay, for appellant.

Mr. John Goode, Solicitor-Gen., for appellee.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

In Clark v. U. S., 95 U. S. 539 [Bk. 24, L. ed. 518] it was decided that, to bind the United States, contracts by the Navy Department must be in writing, and signed by the contracting parties. Such, in the opinion of the court, was the effect of the Act of June 2, 1862, 12 Stat. at L. 411, chap. 93, now in force as §§ 3744–3747 and 512–515 of the Revised Statutes. An effort has been made in this case to show a contract in writing, but we agree entirely with the court of claims that the papers relied on for that purpose are nothing more in law or in fact than the preliminary memoranda made by the parties for use in preparing a contract for execution in the form required by law. This was never done, and, therefore, the United States never became bound. Within a very few days after the memoranda were made the whole matter was abandoned by the Department, and the Iron Company has neither performed any of the work which was referred to, nor has it ever been called on to do so.

The judgment is affirmed.

STATE OF NEBRASKA.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 231–233.)

Jurisdiction.

The Supreme Court of a State having denied a claim of immunity specially set up under Article V of Amendments to the Federal Constitution, this court has jurisdiction to review that decision.

On motion merely to dismiss, the merits of the question on which jurisdiction depends cannot be considered.

Submitted Apr. 12, 1886. Decided Apr. 19, 1886.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Nebraska.

On motion to dismiss.

The plaintiff in error was indicted in a state court of Nebraska, charged with murder in the first degree. Upon trial he was convicted of murder in the second degree. The Supreme Court of Nebraska awarded him a new trial. When his case was remanded to the lower court he was again placed on trial on the same indictment. To this indictment plaintiff in error filed a plea of autrefois acquit, as to the charge of murder in the first degree, setting forth the facts of his previous conviction, on said indictment, of murder in the second degree. This plea was adjudged bad by the trial court, for the reason that the former judgment had been set aside at the instance of the plaintiff in error. The question was again presented to the trial court, by way of a request for an instruction to the jury to the effect that, by reason of the previous acquittal, they could not convict the accused of murder in the first degree, which instruction was refused; whereupon the jury convicted this plaintiff in error of murder in the first degree, and the court sentenced him to be hanged. This cause was again taken to the Supreme Court of Nebraska, and these rulings, with other matters, assigned as errors, but the judgment of the lower court was by the supreme court affirmed; whereupon the present writ of error was sued out.

One of the assignments of error in the petition in error before the Supreme Court of the State of Nebraska was as follows:

The said court erred in putting the said defendant twice in jeopardy for the same offense in violation of and in disregard of Article V. of the Amendments to the Constitution of the United States, which provides: "Nor shall any [233] person be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life and limb."

Messrs. Wm. Leese, Atty-Gen. of Nebraska, J. B. Strode, J. C. Watson and W. R. Kelley, for defendant in error, in support of motion.

Messrs. Chas. O. Whedon, Chas. E. Magoon and O. P. Mason, for plaintiff in error, contra.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

This motion is denied. Bohanan set up specially an immunity from a second trial for the same offense, by reason of Article V. of the Amendments of the Constitution of the United States. This was denied him by the judgment of the supreme court of the State, and we have jurisdiction to review that decision. Upon a motion to dismiss we cannot consider the merits of the question on which our jurisdiction depends, and no motion has been made to affirm.

GEORGE CASHMAN, Appt.,

v.

AMADOR AND SACRAMENTO CANAL COMPANY ET AL.

Jurisdiction of circuit court—dismissal for collusion.

An order of the circuit court dismissing a bill in chancery, on the ground of collusion, affirmed; a written contract having been entered into between the nominal complainant, an alien, and a citizen of the same State with the defendant, which showed in express terms that the action was collusive within the meaning of section 5 of the Act of Congress, March 3, 1875.

Submitted Apr. 5, 1886. Decided Apr. 19, 1886.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of California.

Affirmed.

The case is stated by the court.

Mr. A. L. Rhodes, for appellant.

Mr. J. H. McKune, for appellees:

Cited Williams v. Nottawa, 104 U. S. 209 (Bk. 26, L. ed. 719); Hawes v. Oakland, 104 U. S. 450 (Bk. 26, L. ed. 827); Detroit v. Dean, 106 U. S. 138 (Bk. 29, L. ed. 114).

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal under section 5 of the Act of March 3, 1875, 18 Stat. at L. 470, chap. 137, from an order of the circuit court dismissing a suit, on the ground that it did not really and substantially involve a dispute or controversy properly within the jurisdiction of that court. The facts are these:

Cashman, the plaintiff, was an alien, and he owned a tract of 700 acres of land in Sacramento County, California, situated on the Cosumnes River, which it is claimed was injured by the mining débris thrown on it in the working of certain mines by hydraulic process. On the 9th of September, 1885, a bill in chancery was filed in the Circuit Court of the United States, in the name of Cashman, against the Amador and Sacramento Canal Company, a California corporation and certain other defendants, all citizens of California, to restrain them from operating their mines so as to allow the débris to be deposited on his premises. Subpenas were issued and served on some or all of the defendants, returnable on the second of November. On the return day a motion was made by some of the defendants, and among others the Amador and Sacramento Canal Company, to dismiss the suit for want of jurisdiction, and because it was commenced and prosecuted in violation of the provisions of section 5 of the Act of March 3, 1875. At the hearing of this motion it appeared, by the admission of both parties, that the County of Sacramento and Cashman had, on or before the 6th of October, 1885, entered into a contract in writing of which the following is a copy:

"Whereas, the County of Sacramento desires to restrain the miners working by hydraulic process on the Cosumnes River and using the bed thereof as a place for the deposits and wastage of the tailings and débris from their mines; and whereas, it is desired to bring such suit in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of California and in the Ninth Circuit; and whereas, George Cashman has brought, or is about to bring, such suit in said circuit court against the miners working on the Cosumnes River by hydraulic process; and whereas, the County of Sacramento is directly interested in the said suit and in the subject matter of litigation, and the same is brought for its benefit, the county being unable to sue in such court; and whereas, the County of Sacramento, by a resolution duly passed by its board of supervisors on the 22d day of September, 1885, has agreed to pay the costs and expenses of such [60] suit, and to keep the said George Cashman safe and harmless from all counsel fees, costs and charges to be paid or incurred therein:

"Now, therefore, this contract and indenture, made in pursuance of said resolution between the County of Sacramento, the party of the first part, and George Cashman aforesaid, party of the second part, witnesseth: That the party of the first part, the said County of Sacramento, does hereby stipulate, covenant and agree to supply the said George Cashman with the services of competent attorneys, to wit: A. L. Rhodes, S. C. Denson and Robert T. Devlin, to institute, conduct, and manage such suit; and does further covenant and agree to pay all the charges, costs and expenses thereof or connected therewith, and to hold and keep him, the said George Cashman, safe and harmless from any costs, counsel fees, charges or expenses to be paid or incurred in the institution, conduct and prosecution of the said suit.

"The said George Cashman, the party of the second part does hereby stipulate, covenant, and agree not to compromise, dismiss or settle the said suit without the consent of the County of Sacramento, and to allow the said county and the attorneys aforesaid in its behalf to manage and conduct the said suit, to the same extent and in the same manner as if such suit had been commenced by and was prosecuted in the name of the said County of Sacramento.

"In witness whereof the parties hereto—the party of the first by the chairman of its board of supervisors, he being by a resolution of said board passed September 22, 1885, duly thereunto authorized—have hereunto set their hands and seals this 26th day of September, 1885.

"This contract being executed in duplicate, each party retaining one.

[Seal of the Board of Supervisors of the County of Sacramento.]

"County of Sacramento,

"By L. H. Fassett,

Chairman Board of Supervisors.

"Geo. Cashman. [SEAL.]"

[61] Upon this showing, there being nothing against it, the court granted the motion. To reverse an order to that effect this appeal was taken.

It is very apparent from the face of the agreement, on which the right to the dismissal depends, that the suit was originally brought by the County of Sacramento for its own benefit, and that the name of Cashman was used with his consent, because the county could not sue in its own name in the Circuit Court of the United States. The recital shows in express terms that the suit was brought for the benefit of the county because it desired to restrain the miners from depositing the débris from their mines in the bed of the river, and it could not sue therefor in its own name in the courts of the United States. For this reason the county provided the attorneys who were to "institute, conduct and manage such suit," and it agreed "to pay all the charges, costs and expenses thereof or connected therewith, and to hold and keep * * * Cashman safe and harmless from any costs, counsel fees, charges or expenses to be paid or incurred in the institution, conduct and prosecution of the suit." And Cashman, on his part, agreed "not to compromise, dismiss or settle the * * * suit without the consent of the county, * * * and to allow the * * * county and the attorneys * * * in its behalf to manage and conduct the * * * suit to the same extent and in the same manner as if such suit had been commenced and prosecuted in the name of the county." From the very beginning the suit was and is in reality the suit of the county, with a party plaintiff "collusively made," "for the purpose of creating a case cognizable" by the Circuit Court of the United States under the Act of March 3, 1875. While, therefore, the "dispute or controversy" "involved" is nominally between Cashman, an alien, and the defendants, citizens of California, it is "really and substantially between one of the counties of California and citizens of that State, and thus not "properly within the jurisdiction" of the circuit court.

The order dismissing the suit is affirmed.

[68] COUNTY COURT OF CAPE GIRARDEAU COUNTY, MISSOURI, AND WILLIAM HAGAR ET AL., the Judges Thereof, Plffs. in Err.,

v.

UNITED STATES, ex rel. JOHN T. HILL.

(See S. C. "Cape Girardeau County Court v. Hill" Reporter's ed. 68-72.)

Municipal bonds—mandamus—municipal taxation—power of Legislature—repeal of statute.

1. Where bonds were issued by a municipal corporation under a statute requiring a levy or special tax on real estate for their payment and the Act is subsequently so amended as to require personal property to be included within the levy, a holder of the bonds overdue is entitled by proper proceedings to a writ of mandate directing the levy of the tax on both species of property.

2. The Act passed March 10, 1871, by the Legislature of Missouri amending the Act of March 23, 1868, entitled "An Act to Facilitate the Construction of Railroads in the State of Missouri" was not repealed until the passage of the Act of March 24, 1885. The omission of the Act of March 10, 1871, from the Revised Statutes did not operate as a repeal.

Argued Apr. 7, 1886. Decided Apr. 19, 1886.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Missouri. Affirmed.

The case is stated by the court.

Mr. R. B. Oliver, for plaintiffs in error:

The contract between the taxpayers of Cape Girardeau Township and the relator herein was to the effect that their real estate alone in said township should be charged with the payment of said bonds, and that the personal property therein situate should not be charged for the payment of any part of the same. With this contract in their face a majority of those voting on the proposition voted for the issuance of said bonds. Such was the construction placed upon this Act by the Supreme Court of Missouri at about the time the bonds in this suit were issued.

Missouri, ex rel. N. M. Cent. R. R. Co. v. Linn Co. Ct. 44 Mo. 511.

The principle is identical with that rule of law authorizing a city to assess benefits to the owners of lots fronting on streets, and with the creation of draining districts to relieve swamps, marshes and other low lands of their stagnant water.

The assessment is usually made with reference to the benefit to property; and it is difficult to frame or to conceive of any other rule of apportionment that would operate so justly and equally in all like cases.

The State, through its Legislature of 1868, authorized the taxpayers of Cape Girardeau Township to enter into a contract with the holders of its bonds, upon the express condition that if said township would assist in building a railroad, a benefit to the public, the State would guaranty that their real estate alone should be taxed and that their personal property should not be so taxed.

Cooley, Const. Lim. *278, and cases cited; Sloan v. Pacific R. R. 61 Mo. 24.

That the Legislature of a State can surrender its sovereign power to tax certain property, rights, or franchises is not an open question.

Dartmouth Coll. v. Woodward, 4 Wheat. 518 (17 U. S. bk. 4, L. ed. 629).

In Murray v. Charleston, 96 U. S. 432 (Bk. 24, L. ed. 470), this court in substance said: a Legislative Act which assumes to repeal any tax law in force when relator's bonds were issued, and under which he was entitled to enforce payment, is, as to him, unconstitutional and void.

Here the municipality does not seek to avoid what it has expressly promised, but in attempting by mandamus to compel the County Court to levy a tax on the personal property of the township, the creditor endeavors to make property liable to pay a debt the municipality expressly promised should not be so made liable.

The Act of 1871, if construed to make the personal property of Cape Girardeau Township liable for a debt voted with reference to the realty of the township alone, is in effect the establishment of a pecuniary demand against the personal property of the citizens of that municipal township without their consent, a consent expressly required by the State Constitution.

See Hampshire v. Franklin, 16 Mass. 76-84, cited in Cooley, Taxation, p. 484.

The power to force taxation upon the people for objects not within the ordinary scope of local government is also denied in Maine, Wisconsin, Michigan, Kansas and Illinois.

Cooley, Tax. p. 484.

Messrs. J. B. Henderson and James M. Lewis, for defendant in error:

The power of the Legislature to pass the amendatory Act of March 10, 1871, subjecting personal property to the payment of a pre-existing debt is fully settled by the adjudications of the Supreme Court of Missouri.

Mr. Justice Harlan delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a proceeding by mandamus commenced in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Missouri. The information is based upon a judgment obtained by the relator in that court April 7, 1881, for the sum of $6,659.80, the amount of certain past due coupons of bonds issued by the County of Cape Girardeau, in that State, for the payment of a subscription made by the township of the same name to the capital stock of the Cape Girardeau and State Line Railroad Company. The authority for making the subscription and issuing the bonds was a popular vote at a township election held on the 18th of April, 1869, under a statute of March 23, 1868, entitled "An Act to Facilitate the Construction of Railroads in the State of Missouri." Laws Mo. 1868, p. 92. The first section of that Act prescribes the condition upon which such elections could be ordered by the county court, and requires coupon bonds to be issued, in payment of any subscription voted, "if it shall appear, from the returns of such election, that not less than two thirds of the qualified voters of such township voting at such election are in favor of such subscription." By the second section it is made the duty of the county court, from time to time, in order to pay any subscription so voted, or [69] the interest and principal of any bond issued on account of such subscription, to "levy and cause to be collected, in the same manner as county taxes, a special tax, which shall be levied on all the real estate lying within the township making the subscription, in accordance with the valuation then last made by the county assessor for county purposes."

By an Act passed March 10, 1871, the second section of the last mentioned statute was so amended as to require this special tax to be "levied on all the real estate and personal property, including all statements of merchants doing business within the said city, town, township or county, lying and being within the township making the subscription, in accordance with the valuation then last made by the county assessor for county purposes; Provided, however, that no county, city, town or township shall ever in the aggregate subscribe a sum exceeding 10 per cent of the last annual assessment within said county, city or township." Laws Mo. 1871, p. 55.

It is averred in the information that a demand was made upon the County Court and the judges thereof to pay the said judgment, interest and costs, or that they levy and cause to be collected upon the real estate and personal property in the township subject to taxation, including merchants' licenses, a tax according to law for the purpose of paying the said judgment, interest and costs; that such demand was refused; and that the county has no property out of which the judgment, interest and costs can be made.

The return of the alternative writ of mandamus admits the right of the relator to a levy of a tax upon the real estate in the township; but to so much of the information as seeks to compel a levy upon personal property and merchants' licenses, the county makes the following defense: That the Act of March 10, 1871, was repealed by the General Assembly of Missouri in 1879, before the relator obtained his judgment; and that the County Court has not had since such repeal, and has not now, any authority to levy taxes upon personal property or merchants' licenses in the Township of Cape Girardeau for the purpose of paying relator's judgment.

[70] Upon the final hearing of the cause, it was ordered that the County Court, within thirty days after being served with a copy of the order, shall cause to be paid whatever amount of money may be in the treasury of the county to the credit of the township, applicable to the payment of the judgment herein; "said amount being whatever sum has not been heretofore paid on judgments and writs thereunder, pro rata, rendered upon coupons for which taxes have been collected for the coupons due of the same year, from which said judgments and writs, if any other than the relators in this case, unless of equal date therewith, are to be excluded in said pro rata computation."

It was further ordered and adjudged that, in default of the payment of the full amount of the principal, interest, and costs, the County Court "cause to be levied and collected, in the same manner as county taxes are levied and collected, a special tax to be assessed and levied on all the real estate and personal property lying and being within the Township of Cape Girardeau, in the said County of Cape Girardeau; and including all statements of merchants doing business within said township, for the purpose of paying the judgment of relator, or so much thereof as may remain unpaid at the time of making said levy, together with interest and costs;" that the levy so ordered and directed be made at the time of making the annual levy of taxes for state and county purposes in the year 1883; that the said special tax be extended on the regular tax book for said year, in a separate column on said book; and that it "cause the collection of said tax by suit, distraint, or otherwise, as by law required, and when collected to pay the same to the relator or his attorney of record."

[71] From that judgment the present writ of error has been prosecuted.

The plaintiffs in error concede, as they must have done, that the coupons upon which the relator obtained judgment are, in view of the decisions of this court, obligations which may be enforced by suit against the county. If any question could have been made as to their validity, it is concluded by the judgment which is the foundation of the present proceeding. The only question now before us is, whether the relator is entitled to have a tax levied upon any property other than real estate lying within the township. In behalf of the plaintiffs in error it is contended that, as the Act of 1868 only required a tax to be levied on real estate, it was beyond the power of the Legislature by subsequent enactment, after the bonds were issued, to subject any property other than real estate to taxation for the purpose of meeting this liability of the township. Such legislation, it is claimed, is in violation of the prohibition, found in both the National and State Constitutions, of laws impairing the obligations of contracts. This position cannot be maintained. There was not, within the meaning of such prohibition, any contract between the State and the township in respect either of the subscription which the latter voted, or of the bonds issued in its behalf. The township being a part of the civil government of the State established for public purposes, the powers conferred upon it were at all times subject to legislative control or modification—at least to such as was not inconsistent with the contract rights of third parties. But for the provision in the State Constitution making the assent of the voters of the township, given at an election held for that purpose, a condition precedent to the right of making a subscription, in its behalf, in aid of the construction of railroads, the Legislature could have imposed the tax without submitting the question to popular vote. The provision in the Act of 1868 subjecting real estate to the tax therein authorized was nothing more than an expression of the legislative will, and did not prevent the enlargement, in the discretion of the Legislature, of the subjects of taxation. The township having legally incurred an obligation to pay the bonds in question, it was competent for the Legislature, at any time, to make provision for its being met by taxation upon any kind of property within the township that was subject to taxation for public purposes. [72]

The only remaining point to be considered is whether the Act of 1871 was in force when this proceeding was commenced. We are of opinion that it was. It certainly had not then been expressly repealed. But it is argued that the Legislature refused to incorporate it in the Revision of 1879, and by such refusal indicated a purpose to repeal it. One answer to this argument is that it does not appear that the Legislature so refused. Its express direction, at the regular session of 1879, was that the Revised Statutes, which it then ordered to be prepared, should contain all laws of a general nature in force at the commencement of that session and "not expressly repealed, nor repugnant to the provisions" of any Act passed at that session, "and continued in force by their own provisions." Rev. Stat. Mo. 1879, § 3154. It was further declared that "All Acts or parts of Acts of a general nature, in force at the commencement of the present session of the General Assembly, and not repealed, shall be and the same are hereby continued in full force and effect, unless the same be repugnant to the Acts passed or revised at the present session." § 3161. It is not claimed that the Act of 1871 was repugnant to any Act passed at the session of 1879, when the revision was set on foot; and as it had not then been "expressly repealed," it results that it was continued in full force. And this seems to have been the view of the Legislature at a subsequent session; for, by an Act passed March 24, 1885, after the judgment below, the Act of March 10, 1871, was expressly repealed. We perceive no ground for holding that the Act of 1871 was repealed prior to the passage of the Act of 1885.

The judgment is affirmed.

HORACE S. JOHNSTON, Plf. in Err., [19]
v.
DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Municipal corporation—construction of sewers—liability of corporation to private parties—judicial and ministerial acts.

1. The acts of municipal authorities, in adopting a general plan of drainage, and determining when and where sewers shall be built, of what size and at what level, are of a quasi judicial nature, involving the exercise of deliberate judgment and large discretion, not subject to revision by a court or jury in a private action for not sufficiently draining a particular lot of land. But the construction and repair of sewers according to the general plan so adopted, are simply ministerial duties, for the negligence of which the municipality may be sued by a person whose property is thereby injured.

2. In an action against a municipality by an owner of a house and land for damages thereto from an overflow from a sewer alleged to have been knowingly constructed and continued upon an unreasonable and defective plan and of inadequate capacity for its purpose, and wrongfully permitted to become choked up, evidence was inadmissible of what, in the case of a freshet, or of a great fall of rain, would be the consequence of the difference in level between the sewer in question and another sewer connecting with it, offered with a view of showing that the plan on which the sewer had been constructed had not been judiciously selected. The evidence was incompetent as showing the plan of drainage to be injudicious and insufficient, and immaterial upon the question of negligence in the construction or repair of the sewer, or that it created a nuisance.

Argued Mar. 23, 24, 1886. Decided Apr. 19, 1886.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia. Affirmed.

Statement by Mr. Justice Gray:

This was an action against the District of Columbia by a citizen and taxpayer in Washington, to recover damages caused to his house and land fronting on Missouri Avenue, in the summer of 1877, by the overflow of foul water from a sewer in that avenue, which the declaration alleged that the defendant knowingly constructed and continued upon an unreasonable and defective plan, and of inadequate capacity for its purpose, and wrongfully permitted to become choked up. The defendant denied its liability.

The plaintiff's bill of exceptions stated that he testified that at the time alleged his house and land were overflowed and injured by foul water from this sewer; that he noticed that the water in the avenue was very deep; and that he never saw or knew of any flooding or overflow of the avenue or of his property until the sewer was constructed. The rest of the bill of exceptions was as follows:

"And to sustain further the issues joined, the plaintiff put upon the stand, as his witness, Benjamin Severson, a citizen of Washington, and an engineer by profession, who testified to the Tiber sewer being two feet lower at its base than the Missouri Avenue sewer where they meet each other; and being asked by the counsel for the plaintiff what, in his opinion, the consequence would be in case of a freshet or great fall of rain, the question was objected to by the counsel of the defendant, unless the counsel for the plaintiff stated his object in asking such question; and thereupon it appeared that it was asked with the view of showing by that witness that the plan on which the sewer had been constructed by the authorities of the [20] District had not been judiciously selected; and thereupon the testimony was objected to, and the court after argument, sustained the objection, to which ruling the plaintiff's counsel excepted."

The jury returned a verdict for the defendant, the exceptions were overruled by the court in general term, and the plaintiff sued out this writ of error.

Mr. Frank T. Browning, for plaintiff in error:

Whether the defendant should lay a sewer or not in front of plaintiff's premises, may be held to be a matter of discretion, and in determining that question, its officers may be said to be acting judicially; but having determined to lay one, their acts as to the plan thereof, and its construction in accordance therewith, are ministerial.

Mr. Justice Gray, after stating the case as above reported, delivered the opinion of the court:

The duties of the municipal authorities, in adopting a general plan of drainage, and determining when and where sewers shall be built, [21] of what size and at what level, are of a quasi judicial nature, involving the exercise of deliberate judgment and large discretion, and depending upon considerations affecting the public health and general convenience throughout an extensive territory; and the exercise of such judgment and discretion, in the selection and adoption of the general plan or system of drainage, is not subject to revision by a court or jury in a private action for not sufficiently draining a particular lot of land. But the construction and repair of sewers, according to the general plan so adopted, are simply ministerial duties; and for any negligence in so constructing a sewer, or keeping it in repair, the municipality which has constructed and owns the sewer may be sued by a person whose property is thereby injured.

The principal decisions upon the subject are collected in the briefs of counsel, and generally, if not uniformly, support these propositions. The leading authorities are the judgments of the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, delivered by Mr. Justice Hoar, in Child v. Boston, 4 Allen, 41, 51–53, and of the Court of Appeals of New York, delivered by Chief Justice Denio, in Mills v. Brooklyn, 32 N. Y. 489, 495–500.

In Barnes v. District of Columbia, 91 U. S. 540, 556 [Bk. 23, L. ed. 440, 445], it was said that in Rochester White Lead Co. v. Rochester, 3 N. Y. 463, "The city was held liable because it constructed a sewer which was not of sufficient capacity to carry off the water draining into it. The work was well done; but the adoption and carrying out of the plan was held to be an act of negligence." But this was clearly a mistake; for in the Rochester Case the fact was distinctly found that the insufficiency of the culvert to carry off the water was owing, not merely to the smallness of its size, but to "the want of skill in its construction;" 3 N. Y. 465; and the case was distinguished on that ground in Mills v. Brooklyn, 32 N. Y. 499. The question in judgment in Barnes v. District of Columbia, as well as in Weightman v. Washington, 1 Black, 39 [66 U. S. bk. 17, L. ed. 52], was of municipal liability, not for an injury to property by a sewer, but for a personal injury to a traveler by a want of repair in the highway, a question not now before us. In Barton v. Syracuse, 36 N. [22] Y. 54, also cited for the plaintiff, the ground of action was not the plan of constructing the sewer, but the neglect to keep it in repair.

In the present case, the only evidence offered by the plaintiff, which was excluded by the court, was evidence of what, in the case of a freshet or of a great fall of rain, would be the consequence of the difference in level between the sewer in question and another sewer connecting with it; and this evidence, as the plaintiff's counsel avowed, was offered "with the view of showing that the plan on which the sewer had been constructed by the authorities of the District had not been judiciously selected."

The evidence excluded was clearly inadmissible for the only purpose for which it was offered. As showing that the plan of drainage was injudicious and insufficient, it was incompetent. As bearing upon the question whether there was any negligence in the actual construction or repair of the sewer, or the question whether the sewer was so constructed as to create a nuisance upon the plaintiff's property, it was immaterial. The instructions given to the jury are not reported and must be presumed to have been accurate and sufficient.

Judgment affirmed.

GUILLAME REUSENS.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 49–54.)

Practice—security on supersedeas.

A motion to require plaintiff in error to furnish additional security, not because plaintiff's condition has changed since the security was taken, but because another surety ought to have been required before the attachment was discharged, will not be granted, as this was one of the facts existing at the time the security was accepted, and not open to consideration on review.

Submitted Apr. 12, 1886. Decided Apr. 23, 1886.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York. Motion for additional security on the supersedeas. Denied.

This action was commenced in the Supreme Court of the State of New York, in February, 1884, by the defendant in error against the plaintiff in error, to recover a sum of money.

On or about the 6th day of February, 1884, the defendant in error obtained a warrant of attachment against the property of the plaintiff in error; and the sum of $30,000, then on de- [50] posit in the American Exchange National Bank to the credit of the plaintiff in error, was levied on by the sheriff to secure said claim, interest and costs.

On or about the 20th day of February, 1884, the plaintiff in error served an undertaking, for the purpose of discharging said attachment, pursuant to sections 687 and 688 of the Code of Civil Procedure of the State of New York.

The undertaking given by the plaintiff in error in this case was not an undertaking with two sureties as provided in section 688 of the New York Code, but was one executed by the Fidelity and Casualty Company of New York, pursuant to the Act of the Legislature of the State of New York, passed June 13, 1881, being chapter 486 of the Laws of 1881, entitled "An Act to Facilitate the Giving of Bonds Required by Law."

It was allowed by one of the justices of the Supreme Court of the State of New York, against the protest and objection of the plaintiff in error on or about the 23d day of February, 1884.

The Fidelity and Casualty Company of New York, that gave this undertaking, did so under a special rule of the Supreme Court of the State of New York, adopted by said court after the passage of the above Act of 1881.

Thereafter a general demurrer to the complaint of the plaintiff in error was interposed by the defendant in error; and when the issues of law raised thereby, were upon the day calender of said supreme court for trial, the case was removed into the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York upon the petition of the plaintiff in error.

On or about the first day of December, 1884, an argument was had upon the demurrer before the circuit judge, and he rendered a decision in favor of the defendant in error upon said demurrer, but granted leave to the plaintiff in error to answer the said complaint. Reusens v. Mexican N. Const. Co. 22 Fed. Rep. 522.

Thereafter the plaintiff in error answered the complaint, and on or about June 3, 1885, the action was tried, and a verdict was rendered in favor of the defendant in error for the sum of $27,708.05, and on or about August 12, 1885, judgment was entered against the plaintiff in error for the sum of $28,062.86.

Subsequently a writ of error was allowed, and a citation was issued to the defendant in error, returnable on the second Monday of October, 1885.

The bond which was given by the plaintiff in error and approved at the time the writ of error was allowed, is a bond with two sureties in the sum of $5,000.

Mr. Michael H. Cardozo, for defendant in error in support of motion.

Messrs. Joseph H. Choate and T. F. H. Meyer, for plaintiff in error, contra.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

This motion is denied on the authority of Jerome v. M'Carter, 21 Wall. 17 [88 U. S. bk. 22, L. ed. 515]. Neither the circumstances of the case, nor of the parties, nor of the sureties on the bond have changed since the security was taken. All these things are now as they were then.

We do not understand the case of Nichols v. MacLean, 98 N. Y. 458, to decide that the guaranty by the Fidelity and Casualty Company of New York, of the undertaking of the Mexican National Construction Company for a discharge of the attachment, is void because signed by one surety and not by two, but only that it need not have been accepted by the judge as [54] sufficient security. It was accepted, however, and the attachment was discharged. It stands, therefore, as security for the payment of the judgment, and the judge, when he took the supersedeas bond, acted with reference to a judgment which was "otherwise secured" within the meaning of Rule 29, and could be governed accordingly. The present motion is not made because the condition of the Fidelity Company has changed since the security was taken, but because another surety ought to have been required before the attachment was discharged. This was one of the facts existing at the time the security was accepted, and, therefore, under the rule in Jerome v. M'Carter, not open to consideration here for the purposes of a review of the action of the judge who fixed the amount.

Denied.

Conveyance absolute in terms—sufficiency of parol evidence to show that it was intended as security for a debt.

1. If a conveyance is made in fee, with a covenant of warranty, and there is no defeasance, either in the conveyance or in a collateral paper, parol evidence to show that it was intended to secure a debt and to operate only as a mortgage must be clear, unequivocal and convincing, or the presumption that the instrument is what it purports to be must prevail.

2. The evidence in the present case examined, and held insufficient to entitle the complainant to relief under the rule.

Argued Apr. 13, 14, 1886. Decided Apr. 26, 1886.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Michigan. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. C. I. Walker, for appellant:

Parol testimony is admissible to prove that a deed absolute on its face was intended as a mortgage.

Wadsworth v. Loranger, Harr. Ch. 113; Emerson v. Atwater, 7 Mich. 12; Tilden v. Streeter, 45 Mich. 533; Hurst v. Beaver, 50 Mich. 612; Ferris v. Wilcox, 51 Mich. 105; Russell v. Southard, 12 How. 139 (53 U. S. bk. 13, L. ed. 927); Babcock v. Wyman, 19 How. 289 (60 U.S. bk. 15, L. ed. 644); Villa (Alexander) v. Rodriguez, 12 Wall. 323 (79 U. S. bk. 20, L. ed. 406); Peugh v. Davis, 96 U. S. 332 (Bk. 24, L. ed. 775); 1 Jones, Mort. § 285.

The burden of proof is upon the party seeking to show a deed absolute to be a mortgage, and the testimony must be clear.

Howland v. Blake, 97 U.S. 624 (Bk. 24, L. ed. 1027); Tilden v. Streeter, 45 Mich. 533; 1 Jones, Mort. § 335.

If the evidence shows that in fact the deed was given as security for a pre-existing debt, or for advances made or to be made, or for both, it is to be treated as a mortgage, irrespective of its form.

Whether it was given as security, to use the language of Judge Swayne, "is the very hinge of the controversy."

Russell v. Southard, Villa (Alexander) v. Rodrigues and Peugh v. Davis, supra; 2 Jones, Mort. § 1039.

In determining the question whether a deed is to be construed as a mortgage, the adequacy of the consideration is an important element.

Russell v. Southard, 12 How. 148 (53 U.S. bk. 13, L. ed. 931), and cases cited; Peugh v. Davis, supra.

So also are the confidential relations between grantor and grantee.

Babcock v. Wyman, 19 How. 296 (60 U. S. bk. 15, L. ed. 647).

So also are the necessities of the borrower.

Russell v. Southard, 12 How. 158 (53 U. S. bk. 13, L. ed. 935).

A promise to repay is not essential to constitute a deed a mortgage.

Russell v. Southard, supra, and cases above cited.

The fact that the grantee is to have the entire management of the property does not prevent the deed becoming a mortgage.

Babcock v. Wyman, supra; Emerson v. Atwater, 7 Mich. 12.

The cases cited by the district judge to sustain the decree are cases where it was held that the deed was not intended as a security, and they are therefore not applicable.

Baker v. Thrasher, 4 Denio, 493; McCauley v. Porter, 71 N. Y. 177.

If the deed was intended as a security, the right to redeem attaches thereto, even if the grantor at the time agrees to release this right of redemption.

1 Jones, Mort. § 251; 2 Jones, Mort. § 1039.

Messrs. Harrison Geer and Ashley Pond, for appellee:

A deed absolute in form will not be decreed to be a mortgage, unless the testimony is entirely plain and convincing beyond reasonable controversy.

The complainant must show that the effect prima facie due to the deed is not the effect equitably due to it; and unless the proof is entirely clear and convincing, the writing will be held to express correctly the intention of the parties.

Howland v. Blake, 97 U. S. 626 (Bk. 24, L. ed. 1027); Case v. Peters, 20 Mich. 308; Tilden v. Streeter, 45 Mich. 540.

All parol testimony to establish a trust or to make a conveyance absolute upon its face a mortgage should be clear, and even then should be received with great caution.

Corbitt v. Smith, 7 Iowa, 60; Kent v. Lasley, 24 Wis. 654; Smith v. Orsever, 71 Ill. 185; Hyatt v. Cochran, 37 Iowa, 309; Gardner v. Weston, 18 Iowa, 533; Noel v. Noel, 1 Iowa, 423.

Under the Statutes of Michigan, and the decisions of its supreme court, trusts in lands cannot be created by parol.

Howell, Ann. Stat. §§ 5569, 5573, 6179; Newton v. Sly, 15 Mich. 395; Jackson v. Cleveland, 15 Mich. 94; Palmer v. Sterling, 41 Mich. 218: Sanderson v. Graves, 18 Eng. Rep. 864; L. R. 10 C. P. 234.

The allegations of the bill would not, if true, make this deed an equitable mortgage.

In the case of Baker v. Thrasher, 4 Denio, 493, an agreement similar to the one under consideration, although in writing, was held not to constitute a mortgage.

See also McCauley v. Porter, 71 N. Y. 173; 41 Cal. 28; 9 Pacific Rep. 547; Freer v. Lake, 2 West. Rep. 924; 107 Ill. 276.

There is no claim made by Cadman that Peter was guilty of any fraud in obtaining this deed. He claims that the fraud consists in his refusal to execute the trust and that this trust may be established by parol; but this would be a clear violation of the statute.

Rasdall v. Rasdall, 9 Wis. 376; Lathrop v. Hoyt, 7 Barb. 59.

Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 25th of October, 1875, by a warranty deed, dated and acknowledged on that day, Charles C. Cadman and his wife, of Detroit, Michigan, conveyed to William Peter, of Toledo, Ohio, in fee, land in Newaygo County, Michigan, amounting to $8\frac{1}{16}$ sections, or 5,400 acres, the consideration named in the deed being $20,000. On the same day, by a mortgage dated and acknowledged on that day, Peter mortgaged the same land to Cadman, to secure the payment to Cadman of $10,000 in four months, and $10,000 in six months, from that date, with interest at 8 per cent, according to four promissory notes of $5,000 each, of that date, executed by Peter to Cadman. The deed and the mortgage were both of them recorded in October, 1875.

On the first of April, 1881, Cadman filed a bill in equity against Peter, in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Michigan, and an amended bill on the 23d of April, 1881. The latter contains the following allegations: About the year 1874 or 1875, Cadman became indebted to Peter in $10,000, for money borrowed, Peter making his two notes, for $5,000 each, with interest at 7 per cent per annum, payable to Cadman, to be by him indorsed, and used to obtain money for Cadman's benefit, which was done. The notes were renewed from time to time, Cadman paying up the accrued interest at each renewal, until October 25, 1875. On that day, Cadman owned the 5,400 acres of land above mentioned, covered [74] with pine timber and valued at upwards of $40,000, and was anxious to procure money, and applied to Peter to furnish him with $20,000 more, and the negotiations with Peter culminated in the following agreement: Peter agreed to loan to Cadman $20,000 more, by making two notes of $10,000 each. Cadman was to execute to Peter a deed of the land, as security for the entire $30,000. Peter was to hold the land until such time as it might be sold at a profit or for a greater sum than could be then realized, and, when such time should come, was to sell the land in the most advantageous manner possible, and out of the proceeds was to pay himself the $30,000, and interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent per annum, and the taxes which he should have paid on the land, and should divide the surplus, if any, paying over to Cadman one half, and retaining the other half to recompense himself for his labor; trouble and expense in selling the land. Cadman received and used the notes for $20,000, and the transaction was intended to operate as a security from Cadman to Peter for the repayment of the $30,000 and interest, and was so considered by both of the parties. At the time of the agreement and conveyance, the financial affairs of the country were greatly depressed, and land valuable chiefly for its standing pine timber was not in great demand, and both parties knew that an adequate price therefor could not then be obtained, but also knew that within a short time such land would greatly appreciate in value, and that, by continuing to hold the land until it should rise in value, they would be able to dispose of it at a price much beyond $30,000. Cadman had estimates of the timber standing on the land, and alleges that there was upwards of 40,000,000 feet at the time, worth not less than $60,000, and now worth, if none had been cut, from $80,000 to $120,000. During two years last past the property has become valuable, and it could, at any time during the past 18 months, have been readily sold for a sum sufficient to pay all of Cadman's indebtedness to Peter, and all moneys Peter may have expended for taxes. Cadman, on the ——— day of ———, 1878, applied, by letter, from San Francisco, California, to Peter, for an accounting of his doings in the matter, and received a reply that the land had not yet been sold, [75] and consequently no account could be rendered. On the 4th of February, 1881, he again applied to Peter to settle the matter in some way, and Peter then ignored and repudiated the entire transaction, and stated to Cadman that he knew of no unsettled transaction between them, except an indebtedness of $10,000 from Cadman to Peter. Cadman thereafter offered to pay Peter $30,000 and interest, and any sums paid by Peter for taxes or other proper expenses, and requested Peter to release the security, and deed the land back to Cadman. Cadman offers to pay any sum that may be found due from him to Peter. The bill waives an answer on oath. It prays for an accounting as to what is due from Cadman to Peter; and for a decree that the deed was an equitable mortgage, intended by the parties as a security for money loaned and expenses to be incurred about the land, and that Cadman be permitted to redeem the land on paying to Peter the money which shall be found equitably due to him; and that then Peter may be directed to convey the land to Cadman. There is also a prayer for general relief.

The answer contains the following averments Peter made the two notes for $5,000 each, to the order of Cadman, to enable him to obtain money for his individual benefit, but at an earlier date than that stated in the bill. The land conveyed was not, at the time, valued at $40,000. There were no negotiations between Cadman and Peter which culminated in the agreement set forth in the bill, and Peter never made any such agreement. The deed was not received as security for money. At the time Peter received it the affairs of the country were greatly depressed, and the land was valuable chiefly for the pine timber standing on it and was not in great demand, and an adequate price for it was difficult to be obtained, and this fact was known to both parties, and it was expected by both of them that it would appreciate in value, but that was a matter which should not affect Cadman, as he was in no way to have any interest in the land after the sale and the deed to Peter were made. The property has become valuable since Peter purchased it from Cadman, but he does not hold it to secure any indebtedness from [76] Cadman to him. Cadman did not, at any time in 1878, apply to Peter by letter for an accounting of his doings in the matter, and did not receive a reply that the land had not been sold and consequently no account could be rendered. On the 25th of October, 1875, Peter purchased the land from Cadman for $20,000, the price agreed on between them and which was a fair price therefor at the time, and the sum has long since been paid. After the purchase Cadman never claimed to have any interest in the land until a short time before the bill was filed.

The answer also contains a demurrer to the bill, as not stating a cause of action warranting the relief prayed.

Issue being joined, proofs were taken, and, on a hearing, the bill was dismissed, in June, 1882. The decision (12 Fed. Rep. 368) announced these propositions: The agreement set forth in the bill is inconsistent with a right to redeem, it being stated as an agreement under which Peter was to hold the land until he should sell it, and then share in any profit from the sale. Under that agreement, even if it was valid, the deed cannot be turned into a mortgage, although the execution of the agreement, if valid, might be compelled, when the land could be sold at a considerable profit. If the agreement is obnoxious to the statute which declares that no trust concerning or in any man- [78] ner relating to land shall be created by parol, it cannot be enforced specifically nor employed to turn the deed into a mortgage. The agreement, if valid, would make Cadman a beneficiary under the deed, and create a trust in Peter concerning or relating to land, and, not being in writing and properly signed, is void under the Statute of Frauds.

But the grounds of the conclusion reached were stated thus: under the evidence Cadman is not entitled to relief, conceding the bill to state a good case.

1. The conveyance was absolute on its face, for an expressed consideration of $20,000. To overcome the effect of the deed, and turn it into a mortgage, the evidence must be clear and convincing, beyond reasonable controversy.

2. Peter gave back to Cadman a mortgage, of the same date as the deed, to secure the payment of the notes for $20,000 given for the purchase price. The mortgage was accepted and speaks for both parties, as a contemporaneous writing expressing their intention, and adding to the effect of the deed, as evidence that there was an absolute sale.

3. On January 21, 1876, Cadman wrote to Peter that he had drawn on the latter, at one day's sight, for $5,000, to take up at a bank a note of $5,000 made by Peter, due that day, which Cadman was unable to get extended by renewal. That note and another like it, due that day, were continuations of the $10,000 accommodation notes mentioned in the bill, which were in fact made in 1872. This $10,000 of paper is alleged by Cadman to have been secured by the deed. Peter had sent to Cadman two new notes to retire the two then coming due, and Cadman says, in his letter, that he had lodged one of the new notes as collateral to the draft. The draft, a copy of which is in the record, directs the amount to be charged to Cadman's account. Peter, on January 22, 1876, replied to Cadman thus: "I accepted your draft this morning. What do you think of making a draft on me at one day for $5,000? I do not have the money to pay this draft. This shows for itself how my notes are peddled in Detroit. I have told you before that my credit will suffer from such transactions. You say you did this to save my good name. This is a most cruel assertion to me under the circumstances, as I derive no benefit from it. Let me know at once if I must raise the money to pay this draft. I have $5,000 to pay to your bank the same day. I want you to send me something to show that [79] the two notes and this draft are for your benefit, and for you to pay it in case I should be taken away, which we are all liable to be. My estate should have something to show—in fact, I myself should have it." Peter would not have written thus, if the $10,000 of notes were for him to pay, and if, three months before, Cadman had given him security for the amount; nor would he have asked Cadman to give what he had no right to ask from him. To the above letter Cadman replied, on January 24, 1876: "I am sorely mortified and grieved that this should be the case, but I am entirely powerless to act. I think I can get the money on the other note in time to recall your acceptance. * * * I shall try and get the money, but if I do not, you can draw on me at three days' sight, and I will get the money in meantime on the note. I hardly know what to do. I will do anything in my power. I will send you my notes or anything I have." Cadman would not have acquiesced in Peter's demand for something to show that Cadman was to pay the paper, and that it was all for his benefit, unless Cadman so understood the fact. On January 30, 1876, Cadman having come to the end, wrote to Peter thus: "I return your note, $5,000, herein. I cannot use it, except to discredit you still more. I have resigned; am a ruined man. * * * I owe so much money outside that I cannot stand the pressure. * * * My family have gone into the country to board, and I am ruined and penniless. I console myself, in your case, that the great bargain you made in the Newaygo lands will, in some great measure, compensate you for the loss you must incur, for I cannot take care of the acceptance due early in February." This was an acceptance by Cadman of a draft on him by Peter, drawn January 28, for

$5,000, at three days' sight, to pay the $5,000 draft of Cadman at one day's sight which Peter had accepted January 22. Peter having paid that draft, and there still being one $5,000 note out against him, he would lose $10,000 by Cadman, having the land to represent the $20,000 of notes given for it, which had not matured. This last letter cannot be reconciled with Cad-
[80] man's version of the transaction as to the deed. At such a crisis in his affairs, with the transaction so recent, if he had a beneficial interest in the Newaygo lands, they being, as he now says, then worth $60,000, as against $30,000 of notes from Peter, he would not have dwelt on the great bargain Peter had made, as a matter of congratulation to Peter and consolation to himself, but would rather have taken consolation from the fact that he still had an interest in this valuable property. If the property, ample as Cadman now says it was, even at its value at that time, to secure to Peter the $30,000, was in fact merely a security to Peter for the $30,000, the idea of talking to Peter of loss was absurd. But if Peter owned the lands, had bought them at a bargain, and was likely to make by selling them a profit greater than $10,000, then the loss of the $10,000 by Cadman was properly called a loss to be compensated for out of a profit in selling the Newaygo lands for more than Peter had paid for them.

These are the considerations which induced the circuit court to dismiss the bill. They seem to us of controlling weight. It is not necessary to enlarge on them. The rule in cases of this kind is well settled. If the conveyance is in fee, with a covenant of warranty, and there is no defeasance, either in the conveyance or in a collateral paper, parol evidence to show that it was intended to secure a debt, and to operate only as a mortgage, must be clear, unequivocal and convincing, or the presumption that the instrument is what it purports to be must prevail. Howland v. Blake, 97 U. S. 624 [Bk. 24, L. ed. 1027]; Coyle v. Davis, 116 U. S. 108 [Bk. 29, L. ed. 583]; Case v. Peters, 20 Mich. 298, 303; Tilden v. Streeter, 45 Mich. 533, 539, 540.

[120] UNITED STATES, Plff. in Err.,

v.

NASHVILLE, CHATTANOOGA AND ST. LOUIS RAILWAY COMPANY.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 120-126.)

United States as trustee—when not barred by Statute of Limitations.

1. The Federal Government, asserting rights vested in it as a sovereign, is not bound by any statute of limitations unless Congress has clearly manifested its intention that it should be so bound.

2. The right of the United States to sue on bonds and coupons, purchased before the Statute of Limitations had commenced to run against the right of any holder to sue thereon, with money received from the sale of lands ceded to the Chickasaw Nation of Indians, is not barred by the Statute of Limitations of the State of Tennessee.

Argued Apr. 15, 1886. Decided Apr. 26, 1886.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Middle District of Tennessee. Reversed.

Statement by Mr. Justice Gray:

This action was brought July 6, 1880, in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Middle District of Tennessee, upon coupons owned and held by the United States, for interest payable at different dates from July 1, 1861, to January 1, 1866, on bonds made and delivered by the defendant to the State of Tennessee on July 1, 1851, and July 1, 1852, and payable to bearer in thirty years after date.

The defendant filed two pleas: First. That the United States held the coupons, not in its own right as the Government of the United States, but as trustee for certain beneficiaries, namely, the Chickasaw Indians, a nation of people, and that the cause of action accrued to the United States more than six years before this suit was brought. Second. That the United States was the holder of the coupons, not in its own right, but as such trustee, from January 10, 1866, until January 20, 1878, at which last date it ceased to hold them as trustee, and became the owner thereof in its own right; and that the cause of action accrued more than six years before that date.

To each of these pleas the United States filed a demurrer, which was overruled by the court, and issue was joined on the pleas.

By the Treaty of October 20, 1832, between the United States and the Chickasaw Nation of Indians, which provided for the removal of the Chickasaws to the west of the Mississippi, they ceded to the United States all their lands east of the Mississippi; and the United States agreed [121] that those lands should be surveyed and sold, like other public lands, and the proceeds, deducting expenses, paid over to the Chickasaw Nation. The eleventh article of that Treaty contains the following provisions:

"The Chickasaw Nation have determined to create a perpetual fund, for the use of the Nation forever, out of the proceeds of the country now ceded away. And for that purpose they propose to invest a large proportion of the money arising from the sale of the land in some safe and valuable stocks, which will bring them in an annual interest or dividend, to be used for all national purposes, leaving the principal untouched, intending to use the interest alone. It is therefore proposed by the Chickasaws, and agreed to, that the sum to be laid out in stocks as above mentioned shall be left with the Government of the United States, until it can be laid out under the direction of the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, in such safe and valuable stock as he may approve of, for the use and benefit of the Chickasaw Nation. The sum thus to be invested shall be equal to at least three fourths of the whole net proceeds of the sales of the lands; and as much more as the Nation may determine, if there shall be a surplus after supplying all the national wants." "At the expiration of fifty years from this date, if the Chickasaw Nation shall have improved in education and civilization, and become so enlightened as to be capable of managing so large a sum of money to advantage, and with safety, for the benefit of the Nation, and the President of the United States with the Senate, shall be satisfied thereof, at that time, and shall give their consent thereto, the Chickasaw Nation may then withdraw the whole or any part of the fund now set apart to be laid out in stocks or at interest, and dispose of the same in any manner that they may think proper at that time, for the use and benefit of the whole Nation; but no part of said fund shall ever be used for any other purpose than the benefit of the whole Chickasaw Nation." 7 Stat. at L. 381, 382, 385.

[122] In the Treaty between the United States and the Chickasaw Indians of May 24, 1834, article 11, "It is stipulated that the Government of the United States, within six months after any public sale takes place, shall advise them of the receipts and expenditures, and of balances in their favor; and also, at regular intervals of six months after the first report is made, will afford them information of the proceeds of all entries and sales. The funds thence resulting, after the necessary expenses of surveying and selling and other advances which may be made are repaid to the United States, shall from time to time be invested in some secure stocks, redeemable within a period of not more than twenty years; and the United States will cause the interest arising therefrom annually to be paid to the Chickasaws." 7 Stat. at L. 454.

By the Treaty of June 22, 1852, article 2, "it is agreed that the remnant of the lands so ceded and yet unsold shall be disposed of as soon as practicable, under the direction of the President of the United States, in such manner and in such quantities as, in his judgment, shall be least expensive to the Chickasaws and most conducive to their benefit." The fifth article of this Treaty is as follows:

"The Chickasaws are desirous that the whole amount of their national fund shall remain with the United States, in trust for the benefit of their people, and that the same shall on no account be diminished. It is therefore agreed that the United States shall continue to hold said fund, in trust as aforesaid, and shall constantly keep the same invested in safe and profitable stocks, the interest upon which shall be annually paid to the Chickasaw Nation; Provided, that so much of said fund as the Chickasaws may require for the purpose of enabling them to effect the permanent settlement of their tribe, as contemplated by the Treaty of 1834, shall be subject to the control of their General Council." 10 Stat. at L. 974, 975.

At the trial the following facts were proved and admitted: The bonds with the coupons annexed, mentioned in the declaration, were purchased in 1852 by the United States, acting as trustee for the Chickasaw Indians, under and [123] pursuant to the Treaties aforesaid, with the trust fund therein mentioned, and were thenceforth held by the United States for the purposes of that trust until on or after July 20, 1878, when the United States, by virtue of the Act of July 20, 1878, chap. 359, 20 Stat. at L. 233, accounted with the Chickasaw Indians for the coupons sued on and interest thereon, and the United States has since claimed title to the same in its own right. The bonds and coupons were at first in the care and custody of the Secretary of the Treasury under authority of law, and afterwards of the Secretary of the Interior under the Act of July 27, 1868, chap. 248, 15 Stat. at L. 222, until after June 10, 1876, when, pursuant to the Act of June 10, 1876, chap. 122, 19 Stat. at L. 58, they were turned over to the Treasurer of the United States, and have ever since been in his custody. The coupons sued on were clipped from these bonds, and have never been paid. The bonds, as well as the coupons payable at later dates, were paid by the defendant as they became payable.

Upon these facts, the circuit court instructed the jury that the plaintiff's right of action was barred by the Statute of Limitations of Tennessee (Code of 1858, § 2775), the jury returned a verdict for the defendant, and the plaintiff excepted to the instruction and sued out this writ of error.

Mr. Wm. A. Maury, Asst. Atty-Gen., for plaintiff in error.

Mr. Edward H. East, for defendant in error:

If the United States should buy or otherwise become the owner or holder of commercial or negotiable paper already barred by the Statute of Limitations, as between the original parties, its title being derivative, it would get no better right of action than the assignor could give; and it would take the paper subject to all legal defenses existing at the time of the transfer.

U. S. v. Buford, 3 Pet. 30 (28 U. S. bk. 7, L. ed. 591); Lambert v. Taylor, 10 Eng. Com. Law 293, also reported in 4 Barn. & C. 138; Wood, Lim. 90; Ang. Lim. p. 88, § 40.

It is admitted that the United States' right of action cannot be barred by any statute of limitations passed by any State, though it be named therein.

U. S. v. Thompson, 98 U. S. 486 (Bk. 25, L. ed. 194).

In all cases in which the United States brings an action in its own name, and solely in its own interest, the maxim nullum tempus applies. In all cases in which it brings an action in its own name, nominally as trustee, and it is not the real and sole owner or beneficiary, then the statute does not apply.

Wood, Lim. 91, 92; Miller v State, 38 Ala. 600; Ang. Lim. pp. 28, 33, § 41; Moody v. Fleming, 4 Ga. 115.

The maxim nullum tempus does not apply in a case in which the overeign or State has some pecuniary interest, and not the entire interest.

U. S. v. McKenzie, 2 Brock. 393; Bank of Tenn. v. Dibrell, 3 Sneed, 380.

In the case presented the only question of any difficulty is whether the relation of the United States to this fund prevented the running of the statutes. That the Government held these bonds and coupons as trustee, for the benefit of the Chickasaw Indians, there can be no doubt. While the United States made the Treaty with the Indians in its sovereign capacity, yet as trustee, collecting and investing the bonds, it was not acting as sovereign, but performing a duty which any citizen may perform. It would be a difficult matter to confound the position of political sovereign with that of a trustee of a fund. The latter nowhere belongs to the duties of a sovereign. A government may accept the position of a trustee, as it may that of a common carrier or a banker; yet whenever it does so, it disrobes itself of its sovereignty, and of the maxims which attach thereto.

It cannot be said that the Indians were the grantees of the Government in any such manner as to bring the case within the principles announced in England, extending the maxim to the grantees of the Crown, as in Doe v. Roberts, 13 M. & W. 520, and Lee v. Norris, Cro. Eliz. 331.

The Government did not own the land which constituted the consideration for the trust; it belonged to the Indians. It did not grant the bonds, but bought them as trustee with the surplus funds of the Indians arising from the sale of the lands, and which remained after deducting expenses; and its relation to the fund was that of a pure and simple trustee, and no other.

In all the cases in which the State was the grantor of an equity and held the legal title, and in which it was held that the statute did not run, it was because the State held the relation of grantor or vendor to a vendee, and had promised to convey upon conditions.

It is settled beyond doubt or controversy—upon the foundation of the great principle of public policy, applicable to all governments alike, which forbids that the public interests should be prejudiced by the negligence of the officers or agents to whose care they are confided—that the United States, asserting rights vested in it as a sovereign government, is not bound by any statute of limitations, unless Congress has clearly manifested its intention that it should be so bound. Lindsey v. Miller, 6 Pet. 666 [31 U. S. bk. 8, L. ed. 538]; United States v. Knight, 14 Pet. 301, 315 [39 U. S. bk. 10, L. ed. 465]; Gibson v. Chouteau, 13 Wall. 92 [80 U. S. bk. 20, L. ed. 534]; United States v. Thompson, 98 U. S. 486 [Bk. 25, L. ed. 194]; Fink v. O'Neil, 106 U. S. 272, 281 [Bk. 27, L. ed. 196].

The nature and legal effect of any contract, indeed, are not changed by its transfer to the United States. When the United States, through its lawfully authorized agents, becomes the owner of negotiable paper, it is obliged to give the same notice to charge an indorser as would be required of a private holder. United States v. Barker, 4 Wash. C. C. 464, and 12 Wheat. 559 [25 U. S. bk. 6, L. ed. 728]; United States v. Bank of Metropolis, 15 Pet. 377, 392, 398 [41 U. S. bk. 10, L. ed. 774]; Cooke v. United States, 91 U. S. 389, 396, 398 [Bk. 28, L. ed. 287]. It takes such paper subject to all the equities existing against the person from whom it purchases at the time when it acquires its title; and cannot therefore maintain an action upon it, if at that time all right of action of that person was extinguished, or was barred by the Statute of Limitations. United States v. Buford, 3 Pet. 12, 30 [28 U. S. bk. 7, L. ed. 585]; King v. Morrall, 6 Price, 24.

[126] But if the bar of the statute is not complete when the United States becomes the owner and holder of the paper, it appears to us, notwithstanding the dictum of Cowen, J., in United States v. White, 2 Hill (N. Y.) 59, 61, impossible to hold that the statute could afterwards run against the United States. Lambert v. Taylor, 4 B. & C. 138; S. C. 6 D. & R. 186.

In the present case, the United States bought the coupons sued on, and the bonds to which they were annexed, long before any of them became payable, or the Statute of Limitations had begun to run against the right of any holder to sue thereon. The money with which they were bought was money received by the United States from the sale of lands ceded to it by the Chickasaw Nation of Indians. Those lands, the money received from their sale, and the securities in which that money was invested, were held by the United States, in trust, to be applied for the benefit of those Indians, in performance of the obligation assumed by the United States by treaties with them. The securities were thus held by the United States for a public use in the highest sense, the performance of a quasi international obligation; and they continued to be so held until that obligation had been performed and discharged, after which they were held by the United States, like all other property of the Government, for the ordinary public uses. Van Brocklin v. Tennessee, 117 U. S. 151, 158 [Bk. 29, L. ed. 845].

The necessary conclusion is that the Statute of Limitations of Tennessee never ran against the right of action of the United States upon these coupons, either while the United States held them in trust for the Indians, or since it has held them for other public uses; and that the decision of the circuit court was erroneous.

This case does not present the question, what effect the Statute of Limitations may have in an action on a contract in which the United States has nothing but the formal title, and the whole interest belongs to others. See Maryland v. Baldwin, 112 U. S. 490 [Bk. 28, L. ed. 822]; Miller v. State, 38 Ala. 600.

Judgment reversed and case remanded, with directions to set aside the verdict, and for further proceedings in conformity with law and with this opinion.

Citizenship of corporations—lease of railroad for ninety-nine years—breach of covenants—equity jurisdiction—power of railroad corporation to lease—to make guaranty contract—construction of charters—Statutes of Illinois—of Indiana—effect of execution of void contract.

*1. In the case of an existing railroad corporation organized under the laws of one State, which is authorized by the laws of another State to extend its road into the latter, it does not become a citizen of the latter State by exercising this authority, unless the statute giving this permission must necessarily be construed as creating a new corporation of the State which grants this permission.

2. Where a lease of a railroad for ninety-nine years contained covenants for the payment of monthly installments of rent, to keep the road in repair, and to keep accounts of all matters connected with its business, as affecting the amount of rent to be paid, which covenants were guarantied by other parties than the lessee, a bill which shows failure to pay rent, depreciation of the road, and combination of the guarantors and lessee to divert the earnings of the road to the benefit of the guarantors, presents a case of equitable jurisdiction when it prays for specific performance of the obligations of the lease. In such a case a suit at law on each installment of rent as it falls due is not an adequate remedy.

3. Unless specially authorized by its charter, or aided by some other legislative action, a railroad company cannot by lease or other contract turn over to another company for a long period of time its road and all its appurtenances, the use of its franchises, and the exercise of its powers; nor can any other railroad company, without similar authority, make a contract to run and operate such road, property and franchises of the first corporation. Such a contract is not among the ordinary powers of a railroad company, and is not to be inferred from the usual grant of powers in a railroad charter. Thomas v. Railroad Co. Bk. 25, reaffirmed.

4. The Act of the Illinois Legislature of February 12, 1855, is a sufficient authority on the part of the St. Louis, Alton and Terre Haute Company to make the lease sued on in this case.

5. But if the other party to the contract, the Indianapolis and St. Louis Company, had no such authority, the contract is void as to it; and if the other Companies had no power to guaranty its performance, it is void as to them, and cannot give a right of action against them.

6. An examination of the Statutes of Indiana and of the decisions of its courts fails to show, in the one or the other, any authority for an Indiana railroad company to make such a contract as that between the principal contracting Companies in this case.

8. Nor is any authority found in the charters of any of these guarantying Companies, or of the laws of the States under which they are organized, to guaranty the performance of such a contract as this, with the parties to it and the road which it relates to being outside the limits of these States, and having no direct connection with their roads.

8. The doctrine that acts may be done and property change hands under void contracts which have been fully executed, with which courts will not interfere, is sound; but any relief in such cases must be based on the invalidity of the contract, and not in aid of its enforcement. While the plaintiff in this case might recover in an appropriate action the rental value of the use of its road against the lessee Company, the other defendants who had received nothing, but had been paying out money under a void contract, cannot be compelled to pay more money under the same contract.

By Mr. Burke:

The question of the ultimate liability of the guarantors depends upon the corporate power and capacity of an Indiana railroad company by its president and secretary to enter into a contract with a view of promoting its business, by which for a century to come the guarantors undertake that a railroad connecting with one of the guarantors will pay $450,000 per annum, and maintain, equip and operate for that period a railroad running across the State of Illinois, from the east line of the State to East St. Louis on the west line.

We maintain that this contract is in excess of the corporate powers of the several corporations and each of them, parties thereto, and that their officers in entering into such a contract clearly exceeded their authority, and that the lessor company at the time the contract was entered into well knew that the officers of the guarantor companies, in entering into the contract, exceeded their powers, and that the contract was clearly ultra vires. This view is sustained by the following considerations:

There is no Statute of Indiana or of any other State authorizing the guarantors or either of them to enter into such a contract.

The Statutes of Indiana under which the guarantors were incorporated, define specifically the powers of railroad companies, and the powers conferred are to construct their roads between the points named in their charters, and maintain and operate them and receive the revenues. To these granted powers may be added such incidental powers as are necessary to the proper and beneficial use and enjoyment of the powers expressly granted; and it has been repeatedly decided by the courts of Indiana and by this court that such corporations possess no other powers.

It is a general rule that corporations without statutory authority cannot enter into contracts as guarantors or sureties for the debt, default or miscarriage of another.

Davis v. Old Colony R. R. Co. 131 Mass. 258; Pearce v. Madison & I. R. R. Co. 21 How. 441 (62 U. S. bk. 16, L. ed. 184); Madison, W & M. Plank Road Co. v. Watertown & P. Plank Road Co. 7 Wis. 59; Central Bank v. Empire Stone D. Co. 26 Barb. 23, also 30 Barb. 421; Bank of Geneses v. Patchin Bank, 3 N. Y. 309; Ætna Bank v. Charter Oak L. Ins. Co. 50 Conn. 167; Lafayette, etc. Bank v. St. Louis S. Co. 2 Mo. App. 299.

The amount involved in the guaranty, $45,000,000, and probably as much more for equipping, maintaining and operating the railroad the length of the time, ninety-nine years, the fact that lessor's road was remote from the lines of the guarantors and nearly all, if not all, located in another State, all suggest that such a contract should be entered into only when expressly authorized by statute and by the observance of such formalities, including the approval of stockholders, as the statute requires.

Nothing can be clearer than that the entering into such a contract is not an implied power of a railroad company. It involves the pledge of money and means of the company for purposes not contemplated by its charter, and for a time and to an amount so great as to involve the solvency of the guarantors, and possibly, if not probably, deprive them of the means to maintain and operate their own roads and discharge their duties to the public as common carriers.

It is a rule of universal application where a corporation has undertaken to do that which under no circumstances it has the corporate power to do that the corporation is not bound, and that it may interpose such want of powers as a defense.

Green Bay & M. R. R Co. v. Union S. Co. 107 U. S. 100 (Bk. 27, L. ed. 413); Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 13 Pet. 519 (38 U. S. bk. 10, L. ed. 274); Miners Ditch Co. v. Zellerbach, 37 Cal. 543; Beach v. Fulton Bank, 3 Wend. 573; Rock River Bank v. Sherwood, 10 Wis. 230; Minor v. N. Y. & N. H. R. R. Co. 53 N. Y. 368.

The contract of guaranty is clearly beyond the corporate powers of the guarantors. The power to make such a guaranty is nowhere expressly granted, nor is it implied from any of the granted powers. The only excuse for making such a guaranty was an anticipated increase of business; but as we have seen this will not justify the officers of the company itself in assuming obligations not authorized by its charter. Contracts beyond the corporate powers of a corporation are uniformly held invalid.

Vandall v. South San F. Dock Co. 40 Cal. 83; Bellmyer v. Marshalltown, 44 Iowa, 564; Weckler v. First Nat. Bank, 42 Md. 581; St. Louis v. Weber, 44 Mo. 547; Matthews v. Skinner, 62 Mo. 329; Brooklyn Gravel R. Co. v. Slaughter, 33 Ind. 185; East Anglian R. Co. v. Eastern

Co. R. Co. 11 C. B. 775, and 78 Eng. C. L. 775; Monument Nat. Bank v. Globe Works, 101 Mass. 57; Chamber v. Faltner, 65 Ala. 454; 50 Ind. 85.

So long as the principle laid down by this court in Green Bay, etc. R. R. Co. v. Union, etc. Co. supra, is recognized that "The charter of a corporation read in connection with the general laws applicable to it is the measure of its powers; and a contract manifestly beyond those powers will not sustain an action against the corporation," the contract in question must be held void. To hold otherwise would conflict with the rule as stated by Chief Justice Taney, in Bank of Augusta v. Earle, supra, "that a corporation can make no contracts and do no acts except such as are authorized by its charter."

To hold the contract binding would conflict with the rule stated in Thomas v. West J. R. R. Co. 101 U. S. 71 [Bk. 25, L. ed. 950], that corporations possess such powers as are expressly granted, and such incidental powers as are necessary to carry into effect and properly enjoy those which are expressly granted, and that they do not possess any other powers. The power to make a contract that another railroad will, during a century to come pay $45,000,000 of rent, and maintain and operate a railroad during that time cannot be said to be one of the powers incident to the power to construct and operate a railroad under the Statutes of Indiana.

There is nothing in the point that the lessee has enjoyed the use of the railroad, and that, therefore, the guarantors must pay without regard to their power to make the contract.

The answer to this claim is obvious:

1. The occupation of the lessee is referable to the lease, and

2. In all cases where the performance or execution of the contract changes the rights of the parties and creates an obligation upon an executed contract where none existed on an executory contract, the performance or execution must be of the contract itself, to which the party to be charged is a party, and the performance must have been accepted by that party in pursuance of the contract.

In the nature of the case there could not be and has not been any performance by any party of the contract of guaranty. The guarantors are not parties to the lease. They are parties to the contract of guaranty only, and the only thing to be performed by any party to that contract is to pay any damages resulting from the default of the I. & St. L. Railroad Company to pay the rent and maintain and operate the railroad according to the terms of the lease.

The contract of guaranty stands to-day as it did when made. It was then and is now an executory contract to stand as surety or guarantor of another's obligations.

In all cases where performance changes the case the recovery is upon the performance itself, and is in the nature of an action for money or property received.

The guarantors here have received nothing.

By Mr. Dye:

The question is whether railroad corporations, under the laws of Ohio and Indiana, have the power to subject their capital, which they hold under their charters for the purpose of maintaining and operating their own roads, and for the benefit of their stockholders and the public, to the liabilities of another corporation incurred in the maintenance and operation of another railroad in another State.

The charter of a corporation, in connection with the general laws applicable to it, is the measure of its powers; and a contract manifestly beyond these powers will not sustain an action against the corporation.

Every person who enters into a contract with a corporation is bound at his peril to take notice of the legal limits of its capacity, especially where all Acts of incorporation are deemed public Acts; and every corporation organized under general laws is required to file in the office of the secretary of the Commonwealth a certificate showing the purposes for which the corporation is constituted.

Equity has no jurisdiction to enforce a contract of guaranty, where there is neither fraud nor mistake, and there is a full and complete remedy at law.

"Where a corporation has received nothing in money or property, it cannot be held liable upon an agreement to share in or to guaranty the profits of an enterprise which is wholly without the scope of its corporate powers, upon the mere ground that conjectural or speculative benefits were believed by its officers to be likely to result from the making of the agreement, and that the other party has incurred expenses upon the faith of it."

These are cross appeals from a decree of the Circuit Court for the District of Indiana.

The suit was brought in that court by a bill in chancery, filed by the St. Louis, Alton and Terre Haute Railroad Company, alleging that it was a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Illinois, and a citizen of that State, against the Indianapolis and St. Louis Company, a corporation similarly organized under the laws of the State of Indiana, and a citizen of that State, and against the other corporations mentioned in the bill as citizens of Indiana, or of other States than the State of Illinois.

[295] A final decree was rendered in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $664,874\frac{79}{100}$, with costs, and an injunction against several of the defendants, from which both complainant and defendants in the court below have appealed.

1. The first question arising on the record is that of the jurisdiction of the Circuit Court of the Indiana District as founded on the citizenship of the parties.

This question was raised at an early stage of the controversy by a distinct plea to the jurisdiction, and was overruled by the court. Afterwards, and before the decree, the defendant corporations who had filed this plea withdrew it, and desired to have the case decided on the merits.

As it is not competent to any parties to confer jurisdiction on the circuit court by a waiver of objections to it, the question is one which lies at the threshold of any further proceeding, and must be decided.

The objection arises out of the admitted fact that the Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad Company is a corporation organized under a Statute of Indiana and is a necessary party to the suit, and the assumption that the St. Louis, Alton and Terre Haute R. R. Co. is organized under laws of both Illinois and Indiana, and is, therefore, a citizen of the latter State, as is its principal opponent in the controversy.

The complainant company owns a road extending from the Mississippi River, opposite St. Louis, to Terre Haute, Indiana, of which only a very few miles—ten or twelve—are within the State of Indiana. The controversy grows out of a lease of this road by the complainant Company to the Indianapolis and St. Louis Company. As the complainant Company was chartered originally by the State of Illinois, and is undoubtedly a citizen of that State, and in that character would have the right to sue the other Companies in the Circuit Court for Indiana, do the other facts in the case defeat this right by making it also a citizen of Indiana?

It does not seem to admit of question that a corporation of one State, owning property and doing business in another State by permission of the latter, does not thereby become a citizen of this State also. And so a corporation of [296] Illinois, authorized by its laws to build a railroad across the State from the Mississippi River to its eastern boundary, may by the permission of the State of Indiana extend its road a few miles within the limits of the latter, or, indeed, through the entire State, and may use and operate the line as one road by the permission of the State, without thereby becoming a corporation or a citizen of the State of Indiana. Nor does it seem to us that an Act of the Legislature conferring upon this corporation of Illinois, by its Illinois corporate name, such powers (to enable it to use and control that part of the road within the State of Indiana) as have been conferred on it by the State which created it, constitutes it a corporation of Indiana. It may not be easy in all such cases to distinguish between the purpose to create a new corporation which shall owe its existence to the law or statute under consideration, and the intent to enable the corporation already in existence under laws of another State to exercise its functions in the State where it is so received. The latter class of laws is common in authorizing insurance companies, banking companies and others to do business in other States than those which have chartered them. To make such a company a corporation of another State the language used must imply creation or adoption in such form as to confer the power usually exercised over corporations by the State or by the Legislature, and such allegiance as a state corporation owes to its creator. The mere grant of privileges or powers to it as an existing corporation, without more, does not do this and does not make it a citizen of the State conferring such powers.

In a case where the corporation already exists, even if adopted by the law of another State and invested with full corporate powers, it does not thereby become such new corporation of another State until it does some act which signifies its acceptance of this legislation and its purpose to be governed by it.

We think what has occurred between the State of Indiana and this Illinois corporation falls short of this.

The origin of this corporation was a special Act of the Illinois Legislature of January 28, 1851, chartering the Terre Haute and Alton [297] Railroad Company to construct a road from the state line near Terre Haute to Alton; and by an Act of the Indiana Legislature, passed a few days later, this Illinois corporation was permitted to extend its road through Indiana to Terre Haute. Some changes took place in the name and power of this company by statutes of Illinois, but none which affected its powers derived from the Indiana Statute of February 11, 1851.

But the property of the corporation was sold out under foreclosure of a mortgage to Robert Bayard, Samuel J. Tilden, Russell Sage, and others, who, under an Act of the Illinois Legislature, reorganized the purchasers into the corporation called the St. Louis, Alton and Terre Haute Railroad Company, which is the present Company, and which, by the Illinois Statute, succeeded to all the franchises of the original Terre Haute, Alton and St. Louis Company. As these included all the powers necessary to operate the few miles of the road in Indiana under the Act of February 11, 1851, it was unnecessary to seek an Act of incorporation from that State. It appears, however, that Bayard, Tilden and their associates, did file in the office of the Secretary of State of Indiana a certificate of the organization of the new Company, with the names of the first directors of it who were to serve until 1868; and it is argued that this made the St. Louis, Alton and Terre Haute Company a corporation of the State of Indiana. A critical examination of this certificate renders it very doubtful whether that was its purpose, but rather indicates that it was intended to secure and perpetuate the rights granted to the Terre Haute and Alton Company by the Act of February 11, 1851. At all events, no evidence exists of the agreement of the new Illinois Company to accept of or act under this attempt at organization under Indiana laws. They never held an election for directors of the Indiana corporation, if one existed, and they never in any other manner recognized the existence of an Indiana corporation of the same name.

Without going into the question whether the plaintiff in this case, if it were clearly a corporation of both States, could maintain this suit in the circuit court under the decisions in this court, we are satisfied that, with reference to [298] its right to sue as a citizen of Illinois, it is not, also, a corporation and citizen of Indiana under the facts found in this record.

As regards the asserted existence of the Indianapolis and St. Louis Company, under the law of Illinois, by which it is asserted to be a citizen of the same State with plaintiff, the objection is the same as that which was overruled in Chicago & N. W. R. R. Co. v. Whitton, 13 Wall. 270 [80 U. S. bk. 20, L. ed. 571], and in Muller v. Dows, 94 U. S. 444 [Bk. 24, L. ed. 207].

2. The next objection to the decree is that the bill does not present a case for equitable relief, and should have been dismissed for want of jurisdiction in chancery.

To understand the force of this proposition clearly, it is necessary to make a statement of the case as made by the bill.

It seems that in May, 1867, the St. Louis, Alton and Terre Haute Railroad Company, plaintiff in the bill, had nearly completed and was operating, from Terre Haute to St. Louis by way of Alton, a road about one hundred and eighty-nine miles long. From Terre Haute to Indianapolis (about seventy miles) a corporation had been organized under the laws of Indiana to build a road, and probably had built the whole or a part of it. Indianapolis was then a railroad center of importance, from which roads ran to Chicago and other lake towns, and to Louisville, Cincinnati and other towns on the Ohio River, and to all the principal cities of the Atlantic Coast.

At St. Louis the Terre Haute and Alton road connected with the railroad system west of the Mississippi River.

Several of these railroad companies whose traffic was east of Indianapolis, and all of whom had connection, direct or indirect, with that city, were desirous of reaching St. Louis with their business, and made proposal to the complainant Company for the purpose of accomplishing this result. The companies who executed the agreements to secure this purpose, all of whom were made defendants to the bill, were the Indianapolis, Cincinnati and Lafayette Railroad Company, the Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne and Chicago Railway Company, the Pennsylvania Company, the Bellefontaine Company, the Cleveland, Columbus and Cincinnati Company, and the Cleveland, Painesville and Ashtabula Company.

Their proposition was that the Indianapolis [299] and Terre Haute Company should lease, for a period of ninety-nine years, the part of complainant's road between St. Louis and Terre Haute, and thus with its own road make a continuous line between Indianapolis and St. Louis, and the other companies agreed to guaranty the payment of the rent and performance of the other obligations of the Terre Haute and Indianapolis Company. And it was also agreed that if this company refused to execute this operating contract, the defendants might procure some other company to build the seventy miles of road from Indianapolis to Terre Haute, and execute the agreement in place of the Terre Haute and Indianapolis Company, and in like manner they would guaranty the performance of its obligations in the lease.

What occurred was that the Terre Haute and Indianapolis Company refused to execute the contract of lease, and another corporation was organized, under the influence and control of these guarantying companies, to build the seventy miles of road between Indianapolis and Terre Haute, and the line of road between Indianapolis and St. Louis was thus made complete. This company was called the Indianapolis and St. Louis R. R. Co., and it executed the contract of lease with the complainant company September 11, 1867. At the same time, the guarantying companies, except the Pennsylvania Company, executed a new guaranty as a substitute for the former. The averments of the bill, however, bring in the Pennsylvania Company as defendant, by alleging that, in its lease of the Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne and Chicago road, it bound itself to perform the obligation of this latter company as one of the guarantors, and that, by signing the original contract of guaranty for the Terre Haute and Indianapolis Company, it bound itself to the same guaranty for any road substituted in its place, and, by the further averment, that the Indianapolis and St. Louis Company, which did enter into the contract of lease, was in reality but the creature of the companies who signed the original contract of guaranty, the Pennsylvania Company included.

[300] This contract of lease between the complainant Company and the Indianapolis and St. Louis Company lies at the foundation of all claim for relief in this suit. It is a carefully drawn instrument of nineteen articles. It leases out complainant's road from St. Louis to Terre Haute, and a short connecting line of four miles to Alton, for the period of ninety-nine years, and it provides for the absolute control of this road by the Indianapolis and St. Louis Company, called party of the first part, during this period; for its being kept in repair by that Company; for the payment of a rent by that Company to the party of the second part, the St. Louis, Alton and Terre Haute Company, which should be regulated by the gross income derived from the use of the road, but in no event to be less than $450,000 per annum.

Some of these articles of agreement and parts of others important to the issues before us are as follows:

"Art. I. The said party of the first part shall, will and may manage, operate and carry on the business of a certain railroad belonging to the party of the second part, and known as the principal or main line of the St. Louis, Alton and Terre Haute Railroad, extending from Terre Haute, in the State of Indiana, to East St. Louis or Illinoistown, in the said State of Illinois, and also a certain branch thereof belonging to the party of the second part, and extending from a point on the said main line to Alton, in the said State of Illinois, for and during the period of ninety-nine years, from the first day of June, in the present year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-seven, upon and subject to the terms and conditions of this indenture, and all and singular the provisions herein contained.

"Art. II. The said party of the first part shall and will, within a reasonable time hereafter, finish and put in good order and condition, any and all unfinished portions of said main line of railroad, or of said Alton branch thereof, and any and all parts or portions of either said main line or said branch which may be in inferior condition or out of repair; and thereafter, at [301] all times during the said period of ninety-nine years, the said party of the first part, its successors and assigns, shall and will keep the said main line of railroad, and the said Alton branch thereof, in the order and condition of first class western railroads, making from time to time all needful repairs, replacements, improvements of and additions to the same, at the proper cost and expense of the said party of the first part, without deduction or abatement, from the moneys hereinafter provided to be paid to the party of the second part; and the said party of the first part shall and will expend, for improvements and equipments upon the said line of railroad, in addition to the ordinary expenses of operation, repair and replacement, a sum not less in the aggregate than $500,000 before the thirty-first day of December, in the year one thousand eight hundred and sixty-eight.

"Art. III. The said party of the first part shall, and may, for and during the term aforesaid, use and apply to and for the business of said main line and branch railroads any and all depots, stations, station-houses, car-houses, freight-houses, wood-houses and other buildings, and all machine-shops and other shops, and all depot grounds and other lands adjacent to the said main line and branch railroad, or either of them, or used or acquired for use in connection therewith, including certain depot grounds at East St. Louis aforesaid." * * *

Article V authorizes the lessee Company to fix all rates of fare for freight and passengers, with a provision for the protection of other companies not material here.

"Art. VI. The said party of the first part, keeping and performing all and singular the terms, provisions and conditions of these presents, and making the payments hereinafter required, shall and may, at all times during the period of ninety-nine years aforesaid, demand, collect and receive any and all fares, charges, freights, tolls, rents, revenues, issues and profits of the said main line of railroad extending from [302] Terre Haute to East St. Louis aforesaid, and of the said branch thereof to Alton aforesaid.

"Art. VII. The party of the first part shall, in each and every year of the term of ninety-nine years, pay or cause to be paid to the party of the second part, in the manner and at the times hereinafter provided, 80 per cent of the gross earnings of the said railroad from Terre Haute to East St. Louis, and the branch thereof to Alton, until such gross earnings for such year shall amount to the aggregate sum of $2,000,000, and 25 per cent of any excess over $2,000,000, until the whole earnings for such year shall amount to $3,000,000, and 20 per cent of any excess over $3,000,000 of gross earnings for such year and such percentage of the gross earnings for each such year shall be paid over without any deduction, abatement, or diminution for any cause whatever; every demand or claim accruing or to accrue to the party of the first part being hereby declared to be chargeable on that portion of the gross earnings which the said party is, by the next succeeding article hereof, empowered to retain as therein provided; but it is hereby expressly agreed that the aforesaid payments shall amount, in each and every year, to at least $450,000, which is hereby agreed upon as a minimum for each and every year, and it is to be paid absolutely, without reference to the percentage which it forms of the gross earnings of such year, and without leaving or creating any claim or charge upon the earnings of any future year.

"Art. XV. The said party of the first part shall and will, during the whole period of ninety-nine years aforesaid, keep just, full and true accounts of any and all business which shall or may be done upon the said main line of railroad, and the said Alton branch thereof, or upon either or any part of either thereof, and of all moneys earned or received from or on account of such business, and shall render to the [303] party of the second part, monthly during such period, a detailed approximate statement of such business, showing the receipts and disbursements on account thereof, and shall also, annually, to wit: on or before the first day of March in each year, account to and with the party of the second part for any and all moneys earned or received as aforesaid for and during the year terminating with the 31st day of December preceding the time of such accounting, and the president of the party of the second part, or an agent duly authorized by the board of directors, shall at all reasonable hours and times during the term aforesaid, have the right to examine and inspect, and there shall be produced and exhibited to them, any and all books of account wherein shall be entered, or which shall purport to contain, any entry or statement relating to the business done on said main line and branch railroads, or on any part of either thereof during the term aforesaid, and any and all vouchers relating to such business, and shall also have the right to take transcripts from and copies of such entries or statements and of such vouchers."

The following is the contract of guaranty, signed by the other railroad companies on the same day that the foregoing lease was signed by the two principal companies, the reference to the operating contract of the 17th May, 1867, being to the one prepared for the Indianapolis and Terre Haute Company which it refused to execute. The recitals are omitted, and only the language descriptive of the contract of guaranty is given:

"Now, therefore, this indenture witnesseth, That for and in consideration of the premises, and of the sum of one dollar to each of them duly paid, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, the said parties of the first, second and third parts to these presents, for themselves, their successors and assigns, have covenanted, promised and agreed, and by these presents do covenant, promise, agree and guaranty to and with the said party of the fourth part, its successors and assigns, that the said Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad Company shall and will at all times hereafter keep, observe and perform all and singular the covenants, conditions and provisions of the said operating contract, bearing date on the 17th [304] day of May, in the year of our Lord, 1867, and of the said instrument bearing even date herewith, by which the said Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad Company has assumed, adopted or become liable to carry out the said operating contract according to the true intent and meaning thereof; Provided, nevertheless, That all the obligations of the parties of the first, second and third parts hereto, created or intended to be created hereby, shall be several and not joint, and as to each of them for the equal third part of any and all damages which may arise from any default of the said Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad Company, its successors or assigns in the premises, or for any breach of this agreement by the said parties of the first, second or third parts thereto."

The bill charges, as violations of the contract of lease, that the Indianapolis and St. Louis Company has for some time past failed to pay the rent as fixed at the minimum of $450,000 per annum; that it is insolvent, and is in many other respects in default in regard to its obligations under the operating contract; that it has not kept the road adequately furnished with equipments, but has allowed it to run down and depreciate, and has resorted to the use of leased cars and equipments, instead of purchasing and owning the same, and the road is not in the order and condition of a first class western road, as required by said contract, and that the money which should go to pay complainant is used to pay for the leased cars; that the rails have become worn and the track out of repair. It is also alleged that the lessee's road is covered by a large mortgage, to secure bonds held chiefly, if not altogether, by the guarantying companies, and, in fact, by means of their ownership of the stock and bonds of that company, they are drawing from it the money which should go to pay complainant's rent and to purchase rolling stock and repair the road. It is then alleged that suits for the installments of rent as they fall due, and judgments at law against all the defendants, would be no adequate remedy That to do this or resume possession and control of complainant's road for nonperformance, would not be sufficient for that purpose. That complainant has a contract with the defendants more valuable than would be the resumption of the pos-[305] session of the road in its depreciated condition, both in respect to the road and equipments and the traffic over it, so largely diminished by construction of the road of the Indianapolis and St. Louis Company to the Mississippi River at St. Louis by that company, and by the other defendants, on a line nearly parallel to complainant's road, and not far from it.

The prayer for relief is that the Indianapolis and St. Louis Company be required specifically to perform its obligations in all the respects mentioned, and that, in default thereof, the guarantying defendants be required to do so, and that the latter companies be required to perform, by paying such of the installments of minimum rent as the lessee company fails to do as they fall due; that the companies be enjoined from receiving from the Indianapolis and St. Louis Company interest on its bonds held by them while it is in arrears for rent, and also enjoined from selling these bonds· and that a receiver be appointed to take such a per cent of the gross earnings of the company as may be necessary to pay the rent due complainant.

We have been thus minute in showing the breaches of the contract alleged in the bill, the condition of the parties as to ability to perform, and the relief sought, because it is said that an action at law for the unpaid rent, as often as the installments become due, is an adequate remedy, and is all that the defendants are liable for. But we cannot concur in this view of the matter.

If the contracts are valid contracts, and the complainant has the rights which are guaranteed to it under them, such relief is very inadequate. To sue for every monthly installment of rent, even if the principal and the guarantors can be sued jointly, is almost equivalent to a denial of justice. If the contract is to continue and the road to be run by the lessee company, which is insolvent, a monthly resort to a suit at law against the guarantors is destructive of the substantial right of the plaintiff under the contract. Having a valuable contract in regard to the operation of the road for a great many years to come, plaintiff cannot be compelled to forfeit it and resume possession and sue for all its damages in one action, because this would best serve the purposes of the solvent guarantors.

[306] The Indianapolis and St. Louis Company agreed to keep the road, its rolling stock and its equipment in good condition, equal to a first class western railroad. The plaintiff has a right to have this done specifically, and is not bound to bring action after action for damages at every stage of this depreciation. These suits would be vexatious, unsatisfactory, expensive, and the relief would be inadequate.

A clause in the contract requires the lessee to keep regular accounts of all the matters essential to complainant's rights. The examination of these accounts by a master is eminently appropriate, rather than by a jury. The relief granted by the decree, of enjoining the guarantying companies from collecting the interest on the bonds of the Indianapolis and St. Louis Company while it is insolvent and in arrears, can only be given in a court of equity.

In short, the numerous questions, the complex issues raised in the case can only be satisfactorily tried in a court of equity, and that court alone can give full, adequate and complete remedy for the grievances of plaintiffs growing out of the violation of this contract, and adjust the extent and nature of that relief among the parties to it.

We are of opinion, therefore, that if the complainant is entitled to any relief on the facts of the case, it is in a court of equity as distinguished from a court of law.

3. It is objected that the contract of lease between the two primary parties to that contract, the lessor and the lessee company, was one which they had no power to make, and that, still less, had the other defendant companies authority to guaranty its performance by the latter.

In the consideration of this question no reference will be had to any want of regularity in the proceedings attending the execution of these agreements, nor to the absence of any such authority as the boards of directors could have given to the officers of the companies who signed the contracts. It is here a question pure and simple as to how far the authority to execute these contracts is sustained by the corporate powers which the law has vested in these companies.

A case very much like the present one, as it [307] relates to this point, was before us some six years ago, and the opinion in it establishes for this court the main principles on which the inquiry must proceed.

In that case a railroad company in New Jersey had leased its road, franchises and property for a period of twenty years, yielding as in this case complete control of it all to the lessees and receiving as rent one half the gross sum collected by the lessees from the operation of the road. The agreement contained a condition that the railroad company might at any time terminate the contract and take possession of its property. But in that event they should pay to the lessees the value of the lease for the remaining period of the twenty years to which the lease extended. The company exercised this option, took possession of its road, and the suit was brought to recover on this covenant. Thomas v. West Jersey R. R. Co. 101 U. S. 71 [Bk. 25, L. ed. 950].

The decision turned upon the power of the company under its corporate authority to make the lease. The plaintiffs in error, who were the lessees, insisted that a corporation may, as at common law, do any act which is not either expressly or impliedly prohibited by its charter, although, where the act is unauthorized, a shareholder may enjoin its execution, and the State may, by proper process, forfeit the charter. To this the court responded:

"We do not concur in this proposition. We take the general doctrine to be in this country, though there may be exceptional cases and some authorities to the contrary, that the power of corporations organized under legislative statutes is such and such only as those statutes confer. Conceding the rule applicable to all statutes, that what is fairly implied is as much granted as what is expressed, it remains that the charter of a corporation is the measure of its powers, and that the enumeration of those powers implies the exclusion of all others."

The reports of decisions in the English courts were very fully examined, as will be seen by reference to cases cited in counsels' briefs, and many of them specially referred to in the opinion; also several cases in this court and in the state courts of this country.

It is not expedient here to go again over the ground there considered, as we are of opinion [308] now, as we were then, that the great preponderance of judicial decisions supports the proposition above stated.

It has been distinctly recognized, and repeated in this court in the case of the Green Bay & M. R. R. Co. v. Union Steamboat Co. 107 U. S. 98 [Bk. 27, L. ed. 413].

It is cited with approval in the Supreme Court of Massachusetts in the case of Davis v. Old Colony R. R. Co. 131 Mass. 258.

This latter opinion is a very full and able review of all the important decisions on that subject, and sustains very clearly the main propositions.

In this court the principle is completely covered by the decision of the case of Pearce v. Madison & I. R. R. Co. etc. 21 How. 441 [62 U. S. bk. 16, L. ed, 184], decided in 1858. In that case the defendant companies, whose road at one end of it terminated on the Ohio River, had purchased a steamboat to be used on that river in connection with their freight and passenger traffic, and had given notes for the purchase money. In a suit on these notes this court ruled that they were void for want of any authority in the companies to buy the boat, or to engage in the carrying trade on the river.

The opinion delivered by Mr. Justice Campbell cites several of the English cases relied on in Thomas v. R. R. Co. and in Davis v. Old Colony R. R. Co., above referred to, and concludes with the observation that "the opinion of the court is, that it was a departure from the business of the corporation, and that their officers exceeded their authority." This doctrine had been previously asserted with great force in the case of York & Maryland

Line R. R. Co. v. Winans, 17 How. 30 [58 U. S. bk. 15, L. ed. 27].

These are all cases in which railroad companies were parties, and their powers, as regulated by their charters, were the matters mainly considered. There are many other cases of the highest authority where railroad corporations are held to the doctrine laid down in Thomas v. R. R. Co.; Eastern Counties Railway v. Hawke, 5 H. L. Cas. 331, 371–381; Ashbury Railway Carriage and I. Co. v. Riche, L. R. 7 H. L. 653; McGregor v. Dover & Deal R. 18 Q. B. 618; East Anglian Railway v. Eastern Counties R. 11 Q. B. 775.

We think it may be stated, as the just result of these cases and on sound principle, that, unless specially authorized by its charter, or aided by some other legislative action, a railroad company cannot, by lease or any other contract, turn over to another company, for a long period of time, its road and all its appurtenances, the use of its franchises, and the exercise of its powers; nor can any other railroad company without similar authority make a contract to receive and operate such road, franchises, and property of the first corporation; and that such a contract is not among the ordinary powers of a railroad company, and is not to be presumed from the usual grant of powers in a railroad charter.

We must, therefore, proceed to inquire if any such powers have been given to the Railroad Companies engaged in this transaction.

There is found in the record a copy of an Act of the Illinois Legislature, approved February 12, 1855, of which the following is the first section:

"Sec. 1. Be it enacted by the People of the State of Illinois represented in the General Assembly, That all railroad companies incorporated or organized under, or which may be incorporated or organized under the authority of the laws of this State, shall have power to make such contracts and arrangements with each other, and with railroad corporations of other States, for leasing or running their roads, or any part thereof, and also to contract for and hold in fee simple, or otherwise, lands or buildings in this or other States for depot purposes; and also to purchase and hold such personal property as shall be necessary and convenient for carrying into effect the object of this Act."

Though it might be said that this Act only authorizes Illinois railroad companies to become lessees, we think it must be conceded that this enactment authorized the St. Louis, Alton and Terre Haute Railroad Company, which we have already said was exclusively an Illinois corporation, to enter into the lease or operating contract found in the record.

But if the other party to the contract, the Indianapolis and St. Louis Company, had no such authority, the contract of lease is void as to it, and if the other companies had no power to guaranty its performance, it is void as to them; and the capacity of the complainant to make this contract does not make it valid as against those which had not such capacity, and cannot give a right of action on it against them. In the case of Thomas v. Railroad Company [supra], the lessees were natural persons with no disability to contract, but they were held to have no remedy on their contract, because it was not binding on the other party for want of a similar power to make the contract.

An Act of the Legislature of Indiana of December 18, 1865, is relied on as by implication conferring this power. Section 8 is as follows:

"Sec. 8. In case any railroad or part thereof shall have been or shall hereafter be leased, conveyed, or mortgaged to any other railroad company and shall be in the possession of such other company, under such lease, conveyance, or mortgage, the road, or part thereof, so leased, conveyed, or mortgaged, shall, during the continuance of such possession, be assessed, for taxation, as the property of the company having such possession in the same manner as if it were a part of the road of such lessee, grantee, or mortgagee, under its own charter; and such lessee, grantee, or mortgagee, shall, during the continuance of such possession, have all the rights and be subject to all the duties and liabilities in relation to the road, or parts thereof, so held, which are created by this Act, and both its property and the road, or parts thereof, so held, with its fixtures and the property used in operating the same, shall be liable for the payment of such taxes, in the same manner as railroad property is, in other cases, made liable for taxes properly assessed against the same." 3 Ind. Stat. 420, 421.

It will be seen at once that this is a statute for the collection of revenue, and that to make sure of the payment of taxes due on railroad property the Legislature has undertaken to provide that in cases where the possession has passed out of the corporation which owns it or has the title, it shall be paid by the persons having that possession. Hence, in enumerating this latter class it speaks of property leased then or thereafter, or conveyed or mortgaged, and makes the holder liable during the continuance of such possession for the taxes.

This precise question, only more strongly presented, in favor of the affirmance of the lease by the Act of the New Jersey Legislature, was decided in Thomas v. West Jersey R. R. Co. 101 U. S. 85 [Bk. 25, L. ed. 950]. The statute in that case having direct relation to the company which had made the invalid lease, passed after the lease was made and in operation, declared it should "be unlawful for the directors, lessees or agents of said railroad to charge more than three cents per mile for carrying passengers," and the proviso said "that nothing contained in this Act shall deprive the railroad company or its lessees of the benefit of the provisions of another Act," relative to fares on other railroads in the State.

This court said that, though "it might be fairly inferred that the Legislature knew that the road was operated under the lease in that case, it was not important for the purpose of that Act to decide whether this was done under a lawful contract or not." "The Legislature was determined that whoever did run the road, and exercise the franchises conferred on the company, and under whatever claims of right this was done, should be bound by the rates of fare established by that Act. * * * It is not by such an incidental use of the word lessees, in an effort to make sure that all who collected fares should be bound by the law, that a contract unauthorized by the charter and forbidden by public policy is to be made valid and ratified by the State."

So here the mention of lessees as possible holders of the possession of railroad property neither implies that they are lawfully so, or that such an absolute transfer of road, appurtenances, franchises, powers and their control as the one found in this case, is authorized by law, nor, though it may be in operation, does it give sanction to or create such a law.

The following section of the Act of February 28, 1853, of the Indiana Legislature is relied on as authorizing this contract:

"Sec. 3. Any railroad company heretofore organized or which may hereafter be organized [312] under the general or special laws of this State, and which may have constructed or commenced the construction of its road, so as to meet and connect with any other railroad in an adjoining State at the boundary line of this State, shall have the power to make such contracts and agreements with any such road constructed in an adjoining State, for the transportation of freight and passengers, or for the use of its said road, as to the board of directors may seem proper." R. S. Ind. 1881, § 3973.

We cannot see in this provision any authority to make contracts beyond those which relate to forwarding by one company the passengers and freight of another, on terms to be agreed on, and possibly for the use of the road of one company in running the cars of the other over it to its destination without breaking bulk.

In the case of the Board of Commissioners of Tippecanoe County v. Lafayette, M. & B. R. R. Co. 50 Ind. 110, this same statute was relied on as supporting the authority to make the lease then under consideration. But the Supreme Court of Indiana said: "That Act is to authorize railroad companies to consolidate their stock with the stock of other railroad companies in this and in an adjoining State, and to connect their roads with the roads of said companies, * * * the title nowhere mentions a lease or a sale. Indeed, the words to connect their roads with the roads of other companies, would seem to exclude such a conclusion. To connect one road with another does not fairly mean to lease or to sell it."

This was said in a case where the whole question turned on the power of one railroad company to make, and the other to receive, a lease of the road.

It is cited in the brief of counsel for complainant as sustaining the doctrine that in Indiana the right of railroad companies to lease their roads to other companies is recognized by the judiciary of that State. We think it proves the opposite. The lease in that case was held void as being ultra vires. All the arguments of the court are based on the proposition that [313] the corporation can do no valid act unauthorized by statute, and can make no contract in contravention of public policy. And while it says: "We do not decide that railroad companies cannot become lessors or lessees of other railroad companies, for the purpose of running their lines in conjunction, facilitating commerce, travel and transportation, or for any legitimate purpose for which railroad companies are organized, and there is much in the legislation of the State favoring this view and many decisions sustaining the advancing enterprise of the country," it adds: "But all such contracts must come within the powers of the corporation, must not exceed the powers of the agency that makes them, must not violate the rights of stockholders or contravene public policy." We look in vain in this latest decision of the State for any assertion of the proposition that, by the laws of that State or by the decisions of its courts, there exists any law by which one railroad company can, by lease or by any other contract, make an absolute surrender of its road and its franchises to another. And yet that was the question under discussion, and because the lease in that case contained a clause of perpetual renewal, and in effect amounted to a sale, the court held it ultra vires. What practical difference is there between this and a lease with the same powers for ninety-nine years?

If that decision does no more, it at least leaves this court free to follow its own views of the powers conferred by the Indiana law in regard to this subject on its railroad corporations.

Lastly, it is said that in Indianapolis & St. L. R. R. Co. v. Vance, 96 U. S. 450 [Bk. 24, L. ed. 752], this court decided that this same contract was binding on the Indianapolis and St. Louis Company.

That was done on the ground that the latter company was made a corporation of the State of Illinois by the Act of that State of March 11, 1869, and was using that part of the present plaintiff's road lying within the State of Illinois, under that contract. In reference to its liability to pay the taxes on that part of the plaintiff's road, it was held to be an Illinois corporation, and bound under the Illinois Statute by the contract of lease now under consideration.

But we have just shown that the Indianapolis and St. Louis Company was an Indiana corporation when this contract of lease was made, which was two years before it became an Illinois corporation by the Act of 1869. The present suit is against it as an Indiana corporation, [314] otherwise it could not be maintained. The validity of the contract depends on its power as an Indiana corporation to make it at the time it was made. It had none then, and no Act of the Indiana Legislature has ratified it since. That suit was founded on an Illinois contract between Illinois corporations to collect Illinois revenue, and was in no sense governed by Indiana law, but by the law of Illinois.

As regards this lease in a suit against the Indiana corporation, organized under its laws by the name of the Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad Company, in the Circuit Court of the United States for that District, we must hold it to be void for want of power in the defendant company to make it.

We have been thus careful in our examination into the power of the lessor and lessee companies in the contract of lease, because if the lease itself is void the contract of the other companies must be equally so. A contract to perform for the Indianapolis and St. Louis Railroad Company obligations which it was forbidden to assume, and which it had no authority to assume, must itself be void. There is no power shown in any of these companies to accept a lease of the complainant such as the one in the present case, and perform its conditions, and they cannot, therefore, become parties to such a contract with a road outside the State which chartered them any more than the principal company. If these guarantying companies had executed the original contract of lease it would have been void for want of authority from the Legislature of Indiana, or of any other State by whose laws they are incorporated or endowed with corporate power. No such power is shown in them to lease roads beyond their own States.

Indeed, while there may be a just claim of authority for some kind of running arrangement between two connecting roads under the Indiana Statutes, there is no connection between the plaintiff's road and any road of a guarantying company. The connection even by traffic is remote. These companies might as well have assumed the power to loan them money, or to indorse their notes, or any other [315] commercial transaction, as to guaranty the performance of a void contract by one company to another.

It may not be amiss to cite one or two cases in which this power to guaranty the contract of one corporation by another is more directly in point. Among these are Coleman v. Eastern Counties R. Co. 10 Beav. 1; Madison & W. Plank Road Co. v. Watertown & P. Plank Road Co. 7 Wis. 59.

In the first of these cases, under the powers contained in the Acts of Parliament, the Eastern Counties Railway Company and the Eastern Union Railway Company had formed a railroad from London to Manningtree, a place about ten miles from the Port of Harwich. The directors of these companies conceived that it would add to the traffic and profits of the railway if a steam packet company could be formed communicating between Harwich and the northern ports of Europe, and they accordingly took proceedings for the establishment of such a company. It was intended that the railway companies should guaranty to the shareholders in the steam packet company a dividend of 5 per cent per annum upon their paid up capital until the dissolution of that company, and that then the whole paid up capital should be paid by the railway companies to the shareholders of the packet company in exchange for a transfer of its assets.

On a bill by a shareholder of the railway company to enjoin, it was held by the Master of the Rolls, Lord Langdale, that no such contract was within the power of the railway companies, and further proceedings in the matter were enjoined.

Among other things, that learned Judge said that "If there is one thing more desirable than another, after providing for the safety of all persons traveling on railroads, it is this: that the property of the railway companies shall be itself safe; that a railway investment shall not be considered a wild speculation, exposing those engaged in it to all sorts of risks, whether they intended it or not. Considering the vast property which is now invested in railways, and how easily it is transferable, perhaps one of the best things that could happen would be that the investment should be of such a safe [316] nature that prudent persons might without improper hazard invest their moneys in it. Quite sure I am that nothing of that kind can be approached if railway companies should be at liberty to pledge their funds in support of speculations not authorized by their legal powers, and which might very possibly, to say the least, lead to extraordinary losses on the part of the railway company." This became a leading case in England where its doctrines have been steadily followed. It is cited with approval in Pearce v. Madison & I. R. R. Co. 21 How. 441 [62 U. S. bk. 15, L. ed. 184.]

In the case of Madison & W. Plank Road Co. v. Watertown & P. Plank Road Co. 7 Wis. 59, the former company, in order to aid the latter company to build a plank road, which was a continuation of the road of the former, agreed to guaranty a loan made to the Watertown Company. After the road was built the Madison Company refused to pay on the default of the Watertown Company. The Supreme Court held that the Madison Company had no corporate power to guaranty the payment of the debt of the other company; and, when pressed with the argument that, by the building of the road, the Madison Company had received the benefit which had induced it to guaranty the debt, the court said it was a contract ultra vires and could not be enforced.

We are of opinion that the guaranty of the obligations of the lease on the part of the Indianapolis and St. Louis Company by the other defendants is void.

4. It is argued, in support of the decree that, though the contract of lease may be void, so that no action could originally have been sustained upon it, there has been for ten years such performance of it, in the use, possession and control of plaintiff's road and its franchises, by the defendants, that they cannot now be permitted to repudiate or abandon it. That it now presents one of a class of cases which hold that where a void contract has been so far executed that property has passed under it and rights have been acquired under it, the courts will not disturb the possession of such property or compel restitution of money received under such a contract.

Undoubtedly there are such decisions of courts of high authority, and there is such [317] a principle, very sound in its application to appropriate cases. But we understand the rule in such cases to stand upon the broad ground that the contract itself is void, and that neither what has been done under it, nor the action of the court, can infuse any vitality into it. Looking at the case as one where the parties have so far acted under such a contract that they cannot be restored to their original condition, the court inquires if relief can be given independently of the contract, or whether it will refuse to interfere as the matter stands. We know of no well considered case where a corporation, which is party to a continuing contract which it had no power to make, seeks to retract and refuses to proceed further, can be compelled to do so. As was said in Thomas v. Railroad Co. (a case so often in point here), "Having entered into the agreement it was the duty of the company to rescind or abandon it at the earliest moment. This duty was independent of the clause in the contract which gave them the right to do it. Though they delayed its performance for several years, it was nevertheless a rightful act when it was done. Can this performance of a lawful duty, a duty which it owed to the stockholders of the company and to the public, give to plaintiffs a right of action? Can they found such a right on an agreement void for want of corporate authority and forbidden by the policy of the law? To hold that they can is, in our opinion, to hold that any act performed in execution of a void contract makes all its parts valid, and that the more that is done under a contract forbidden by law the stronger is the claim to its enforcement by the courts."

Whatever may be said in regard to the Indianapolis and St. Louis Company, there is wanting in the case of the guarantying companies one of the strongest reasons usually urged in support of the estoppel, as it is sometimes called, namely: that the recalcitrant party has received the money or the property of the other. For, so far from these guaranty companies having received of the plaintiff any money or property, they are the parties who have been paying money and the plaintiff receiving it for rent of its road. They are not, therefore, estopped on any principles of that [318] doctrine from ceasing to pay money on an illegal contract because they have heretofore done so. On the contrary, as we have already said, the duties of these directors to their stockholders is to cease to perform a contract to which they were never bound.

We do not decide the question whether the Indianapolis and St. Louis R. R. Co. cannot be compelled to pay the plaintiff for the use of its road, though the contract be void. Whether it would be so liable on a quantum meruit admits of doubt. It is unnecessary to decide this, because that company has submitted to the decree of the circuit court in favor of plaintiff for that rent, by failing to give bond and perfect its appeal from that decree.

That part of the decree must stand, as no appeal from it has been prosecuted.

The decree against the other defendants, appellants here, is for the reasons given reversed, and the case remanded to the Circuit Court, with directions to dismiss the bill as to them.

Mr. Justice Bradley, dissenting:

I dissent from the judgment of the court in this case, and will very briefly state my reasons for dissenting.

The St. Louis, Alton and Terre Haute R. R. Company, the lessor, had full authority to make the lease of its road and works which is brought in question in the cause. The Indianapolis and St. Louis Railway Company, the lessee, assumed to have power to take the lease, and had such power in Illinois by the effect of the laws of that State, and was supported in its assumption of power by the implications of several Statutes of Indiana. If these implications were not sufficiently strong to amount to a grant of power, still, they were sufficient to show that the Legislature of Indiana understood the power as existing and acquiesced in it. The other railroad companies, parties to the suit, who guarantied the performance of the lease and its covenants on the part of the lessor, had the power to do so by the laws of Illinois, and [319] the engagement of guaranty on their part was a contract entered into by them in furtherance of their through business to and from St. Louis and the States west of the Mississippi. The whole arrangement, in fact, was devised by them for the purpose of facilitating and increasing their business as integral parts of great trunk lines; which in the absence of interstate regulations of commerce made by Congress, are of the greatest utility in the business of the country.

To hold that the railroad companies of the country thus situated cannot, without acting ultra vires, make business arrangements beyond the limits of their own tracks in a country situated and divided up into States as ours is, it seems to me, is to take a very contracted view of the powers and duties of these public institutions. According to the doctrine of the court, a New York or Pennsylvania company could not even have a ticket or freight agent in St. Louis for the purpose of soliciting freight and passengers to be carried on the trunk line of which it forms a part. It could not hire an office for such an agent, or, if it did, it could not be held responsible for the rent. This is carrying the doctrine of ultra vires to what seems to me, an absurd extent. It is following out the English notions on that subject, which always seemed to me inapplicable to our situation and circumstances, however well suited to that compact and homogeneous country—homogeneous in government and jurisdiction. All the principal railroads in England extend across the entire country from London, in different directions, to the sea. In this country, as Congress declines to charter through lines across the States, the State Governments themselves charter local roads, limited by the boundary lines of the State. In order to give the country through facilities at all, these state roads are obliged to unite their lines, and make what is called a trunk line. The necessities of the country require it. Yet, according to the logic of the decision in this case, this is all ultra vires.

Look at it. One of our great trunk lines, extending from West to East, is composed, say, of five connected railroads, forming together a continuous line, working together under a contract which regulates their mutual rights and obligations in the management of the business [320] and the distribution of its joint receipts. All this is ultra vires and void! One of the links of the chain is a ferry which, in consideration of extra accommodations afforded for the business of the line, is guarantied a certain sum per annum. The guaranty is ultra vires and void!

Is this law? It may be English law; but is it American law? I cannot believe it. We must not shut our eyes to the fact that new circumstances and conditions, of themselves, require and produce a modification of old rules, or the application of new ones.

This narrow doctrine has already been discarded by the courts, and by this court. It has become settled law that a railroad company at one end of a trunk line may enter into contracts for the transportation of passengers and goods to any part of the line, hundreds of miles beyond its own track; and will be held liable for the fulfillment of such contracts. And yet, according to the doctrine of the opinion in this case, this is ultra vires.

But this is not all. The contract has been performed on the part of the lessor company, and the lessee and its guarantors have enjoyed the benefit of it. With what face can they now refuse to pay what they agreed to pay? With what face can they plead incapacity to contract? This is not a suit to compel the specific performance of the contract in future; but to compel the payment of the money earned by past performance of the contract. It seems to me that the Companies concerned are estopped to deny their liability to make this payment. It is the Companies themselves who make the plea, not their stockholders.

In several national bank cases, where the banks have loaned money on mortgages of land, contrary to the express prohibition of the Act of Congress, and ultra vires, we have enforced the contract, leaving it to the government to call the banks to account for acting outside of their chartered powers.

Why should not the same rule be applied to railroads, if it is thought they have exceeded their powers; especially when no stockholder complains of the company's action, and the object of the suit is, to compel them to pay for a [321] benefit actually received?

In every aspect in which the case can be viewed, it seems to me that the decree of the circuit court was not only just and right, but in accordance with sound principles of American law, and ought to be affirmed.

I am authorized to say that Mr. Justice Harlan agrees with me in opinion.

[62] JUAN S. HART, Admr., of the Estate of SIMEON HART, Deceased,

v.

UNITED STATES.

Section 7, Act of Congress, June 25, 1868—effect of pardon.

A pardon granted by the President, prior to the passage of section 3480, Revised Statutes, to one who promoted the late rebellion, "for all offenses committed by him arising from participation, direct or implied, in the rebellion," did not authorize the payment of a claim to such person, which originated prior to April 13, 1861, and was forbidden by such section to be paid; and where such claim was referred by the Secretary of War to the Court of Claims, that court properly decided that it had no jurisdiction further than to find the facts.

Argued Mar. 25, 1886. Decided Apr. 26, 1886

APPEAL from the Court of Claims. Affirmed. The case is stated by the court.

Mr. John J. Weed, for appellant.

Mr. John Goode, Solicitor-Gen., for appellee.

Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court:

Section 7 of the Act of Congress, approved June 25, 1868, chap. 71 (15 Stat. at L. 76), enacted as follows: "It shall and may be lawful for the head of any executive department, whenever any claim is made upon said department involving disputed facts or controverted questions of law, where the amount in controversy exceeds $3,000; or where the decision will affect a class of cases or furnish a precedent for the future action of any executive department in the adjustment of a class of cases, without regard to the amount involved in the particular case; or where any authority, right, privilege, or exemption is claimed or denied under the Constitution of the United States, to [63] cause such claim, with all the vouchers, papers, proofs and documents pertaining thereto, to be transmitted to the Court of Claims, and the same shall be there proceeded in as if originally commenced by the voluntary action of the claimant; * * * Provided, however, That no case shall be referred by any head of a department unless it belongs to one of the several classes of cases to which, by reason of the subject matter and character, the said Court of Claims might, under existing laws, take jurisdiction on such voluntary action of the claimant. And all the cases mentioned in this section which shall be transmitted by the head of any executive department, * * * shall be proceeded in as other cases pending in said court, and shall, in all respects, be subject to the same rules and regulations and appeals from the final judgments or decrees of said court therein to the Supreme Court of the United States shall be allowed in the manner now provided by law. The amount of the final judgments or decrees in such cases so transmitted to said court, where rendered in favor of the claimants, shall in all cases be paid out of any specific appropriation applicable to the same, if any such there be; and where no such appropriation exists, the same shall be paid in the same manner as other judgments of said court:" These provisions are now embodied in sections 1063, 1064 and 1065 of the Revised Statutes.

Under them the Secretary of War, on the 14th of October, 1878, transmitted to the Court of Claims the claim of Henry B. Hart, as the assignee of Simeon Hart. Thereupon, on the 9th of January, 1874, Simeon Hart, for the use of Henry B. Hart, filed in that court a petition, claiming to recover from the United States $50,891.52. In July, 1874, the United States filed a plea setting up a counterclaim of $9,000 against Simeon Hart, and in August, 1874, a plea setting up a bar by a six years' limitation after the first accruing of the claim. In December, 1874, Simeon Hart having died, the suit was revived in the name of A. B. Hyde, as his administrator. In January, 1877, the claimant demurred to the plea of the Statute of Limitations; and the demurrer was sustained. 12 Ct. of Claims, 319. On the 9th of May, 1877, [64] the claimant filed an amended petition, to which, three days afterwards, the United States filed a traverse, and a plea setting up a bar by a six years' limitation. In October, 1878, the claimant replied to the plea of counterclaim, that the $9,000 had been paid by Simeon Hart. In November, 1879, the United States, by leave of court, filed a special demurrer to the petition and the amended petition, but it was overruled. In June, 1880, James P. Hague, as administrator of Simeon Hart, and successor of Hyde, was substituted in place of Hyde, as claimant. At the same time the claimant filed an amended petition, praying that any assignment of the claim to Henry B. Hart be treated as void; and withdrawing items four and five of the claim contained in the original petition.

The case was then heard on the evidence, and on the 7th of June, 1880, the court filed its findings of fact and conclusion of law, and an opinion (15 Ct. of Claims, 414) whereby the petition was dismissed, and a judgment to that effect was entered on that day. In January, 1881, a motion for a new trial was granted, and the case was reheard, on additional evidence, and, on the 16th of May, 1881, the court filed its findings of fact and conclusion of law, and an opinion (16 Ct. of Claims, 459) whereby the petition was dismissed, and a judgment to that effect was entered on that day, from which the claimant appealed. Since the appeal Juan S. Hart, as administrator in place of Hague, has been substituted as appellant.

The findings of fact, on the second hearing, which are quite voluminous, are set forth at length in the report in 16 Ct. of Claims. Those which are material, in the view we take of the case, are as follows: on the 3d of March, 1861, Simeon Hart was residing at El Paso, Texas, and was in active sympathy with those who were inciting to rebellion. In April, 1861, he joined the insurgents, and then and afterwards furnished them with supplies, money, and means of transportation to carry on their invasion and campaign into New Mexico. On the 3d of November, 1865, the President granted to him a full pardon and amnesty for all offenses committed by him arising from participation, direct or implied, in the rebellion. Hart claimed [65] certain sums as due to him for flour, corn and forage delivered to the United States before April 13, 1861, and certain sums for flour, corn and forage delivered after that date. There is nothing due from the United States to the claimant for flour delivered after April 13, 1861; and the United States paid to Hart, or his assignees, for flour alleged to have been delivered after April 13, 1861, but never delivered, more than the amounts claimed as due for corn and forage, those payments being made partly in cash and partly by retaining and charging against him the $9,000 so set up as a counterclaim.

The Court of Claims applied to those demands of the claimant which accrued before April 13, 1861, the provisions of Joint Resolution No. 46, approved March 2, 1867 (14 Stat. at L. 571), now embodied in section 3480 of the Revised Statutes, and which was as follows: "Until otherwise ordered, it shall be unlawful for any officer of the United States Government to pay any account, claim, or demand against said Government, which accrued or existed prior to the 13th day of April, A. D. 1861, in favor of any person who promoted, encouraged, or in any manner sustained the late rebellion; or in favor of any person who, during said rebellion, was not known to be opposed thereto, and distinctly in favor of its suppression; and no pardon heretofore granted, or hereafter to be granted, shall authorize the payment of such account, claim, or demand, until this resolution is modified or repealed: Provided, That this resolution shall not be construed to prohibit the payment of claims founded upon contracts made by any of the departments, where such claims were assigned or contracted to be assigned prior to April first, 1861, to creditors of said contractors, loyal citizens of loyal States, in payment of debts incurred prior to March first, 1861."

It was urged before the Court of Claims that the pardon and amnesty granted by the President to Hart, on the third of November, 1865, "for all offenses committed by him arising from participation, direct or implied, in the rebellion," operated to set aside the provisions of the Joint [66]
Resolution as to him and his claims. The court held otherwise. Its view was that Hart was guilty of numerous acts for which he could, on conviction, have been punished in his person and his property, and that the pardon freed him from liability for those offenses; that his disability to receive from the United States a debt due to him was not a consequence attached to or arising out of any such offense; that it grew out of the fact stated in the Joint Resolution that he had been a public enemy; that every disability which a state of war imposed upon him was removed by the cessation of the war; that it needed no pardon to effect that result; that, as the pardon conferred on him no new right, so the Joint Resolution did not take from him anything which the pardon had conferred; that it did not, like the legislation considered in United States v. Klein, 13 Wall. 128 [80 U. S. bk. 20, L. ed. 519], attempt to prescribe to the judiciary the effect to be given to a pardon, in regard to a matter to which the pardon extended, but merely forbade certain debts to be paid until Congress should otherwise order; that a creditor of the United States can only be paid in accordance with the provision of the Constitution (art. 1, sec. 9, subd. 7) which declares that "No money shall be drawn from the Treasury, but in consequence of appropriations made by law;" that by this Joint Resolution Congress had declared, by law, that this claimant should draw no money from the Treasury, and that no general appropriation should extend to his claim; that, therefore, no executive department could consider the claim; that the Act of 1868 did not extend to claims covered by the Joint Resolution; and that, as the claim in question could not be paid, the Court of Claims had no jurisdiction to proceed to judgment in regard to it, on the reference made. The views of the court were set forth at greater length in the opinion, and its conclusion was, that as to all items which accrued prior to April 13, 1861, it was its dut to decline to take jurisdiction further than t find the facts.

As to the items for flour and corn and forag furnished after April 13, 1861, the court held on the facts it found, that there was nothin due to the claimant for flour delivered after that date; and that the United States had paid Hart, or his assignees, for flour alleged to have been delivered after that date, but never deliv- [67] ered, more than the amounts now claimed to be due for corn and forage.

We are of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Claims was right. In approving, as we do, the reasons above recited as assigned by that court, for the view it took on the question of the pardon, we do not depart, in the least, from what was held, on the subject of pardons, in the cases of Ex parte Garland, 4 Wall. 333 [71 U. S. bk. 18, L. ed. 366]; Armstrong's

Foundry, 6 Wall. 766 [73 U. S. bk. 18, L. ed. 882]; United States v. Padelford, 9 Wall. 531 [76 U. S. bk. 19, L. ed. 788]; United States v. Klein, 13 Wall. 128 [80 U. S. bk. 20, L. ed. 519]; and Carlisle v. United States, 16 Wall. 147, 151 [83 U. S. bk. 21, L. ed. 426]. If the Joint Resolution had said nothing on the subject of a pardon, no pardon could have had the effect to authorize the payment, out of a general appropriation, of a debt which a law of Congress had said should not be paid out of it. The pardon cannot have such effect ascribed to it merely because the Joint Resolution says that it shall not have such effect. It was entirely within the competency of Congress to declare that the claims mentioned in the Joint Resolution should not be paid till the further order of Congress. It is now within its competency to declare that they may be paid, in like manner as, by the Act of March 3, 1877, chap. 105 (19 Stat. at L. 362), it provided that section 3480 of the Revised Statutes, which is the Joint Resolution in question, should not apply to payments to be made out of a general appropriation made by that Act to pay mail contractors for mail service performed in certain States in 1859, 1860 and 1861, and before they "respectively engaged in war against the United States."

As to the claims which accrued after April 13, 1861, we see no reason to question the correctness of the judgment.

[196] IRON SILVER MINING COMPANY, Plf. in Err.,

v.

ELGIN MINING AND SMELTING COMPANY ET AL.

Mining law—Act of 1872—right of patentee of surface lode to follow vein laterally—parallelism of end lines.

Under the Act of Congress of 1872 (R. S. § 2320 et seq.) parallelism of the end lines of a surface location is essential to the existence of any right in the locator or patentee of a surface lode mining claim to follow the vein outside of the vertical planes drawn through the side lines. His lateral right by the statute is confined to such portion of the vein as lies between such planes drawn through the end lines and extended in their own direction; that is, between parallel vertical planes. It can embrace no other portion.

Argued Mar. 26, 29, 1886. Decided Apr. 26, 1886.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Colorado. Affirmed.

Statement by Mr. Justice Field:

This is an action to recover possession of certain mining ground in Lake County, Colorado. The plaintiffs in the court below, the defendants in error here, assert title to the premises under a patent of the United States for what is known as the "Gilt Edge Claim," of which they are a part. In the original complaint they asserted title by conveyance from the original [197 locators. A patent to them having been subsequently granted, they filed an amended complaint setting up its issue, and that it conveys to them a fee simple title.

The complaint avers that the defendant, the Iron Silver Mining Company, on the 25th of June, 1882, by means of drifts, inclines and tunnels entered without right upon a portion of the Gilt Edge Claim, which it has since wrongfully withheld from the plaintiffs to their damage of $50,000; and that it has excavated, carried away, and converted to its own use, since such entry, gold, silver and lead ores belonging to them, of the value of $50,000. They therefore pray judgment for the premises and damages for their wrongful detention, and for the ores taken.

The defendant in its answer denies the several allegations of the complaint, and sets up as an affirmative defense that, under a patent of the United States, bearing date May 24, 1877, it is the owner in fee and entitled to the possession of a surface lode mining claim also situated in Lake County, Colorado, called the "Stone Claim," containing nine acres and $\frac{18}{100}$ of an acre of land, more or less, and of a vein, lode or ledge therein, extending the length of the claim from north to south 1,500 feet throughout its entire depth, although it enters adjoining lands; that the vein, lode or ledge contains iron, lead and silver in large quantities; that the top, apex and outcrop of it are found in the surface claim throughout its entire extent; that its true strike is north and south, with a dip to the east at an angle of fifteen degrees below the plane of the horizon; that the vein, lode or ledge on its dip, within vertical planes drawn downward, with its end lines continued in their own direction, that is, in the direction of the dip, passes through and beyond the east vertical side line of the surface claim and location into and under the Gilt Edge Surface Claim. And the defendant admits that underneath the surface of the Gilt Edge Claim it has followed and mined upon the Stone vein, lode or ledge; and avers that, by reason of the facts above set forth, it had the right so to do, and denies that it has otherwise interfered with the Gilt Edge Claim or any part of it.

The plaintiffs in their reply deny the material allegations of the answer. By stipulation the [19 case was tried by the court without the intervention of a jury. On the trial the plaintiffs produced in evidence a patent of the United States to them for the Gilt Edge Claim, in the usual form of patents for lode mining claims, and the defendant admitted that they were invested with the title to the property which the patent conveyed; that it had entered underneath the surface of that claim at a point east of the Stone Surface Claim; and was engaged in mining and in carrying away lead and silver ores when the action was commenced.

It was agreed that plat "A" (given below) correctly represents the shape and relative positions of the Gilt Edge Mining Claim and of the Stone Mining Claim, and that the lines on the figures of the Stone Claim, from No. 5 to 6 and from 1 to 14, are the two end lines of the surface claim, so called by the locator thereof, and in the plat accompanying the application for the patent.

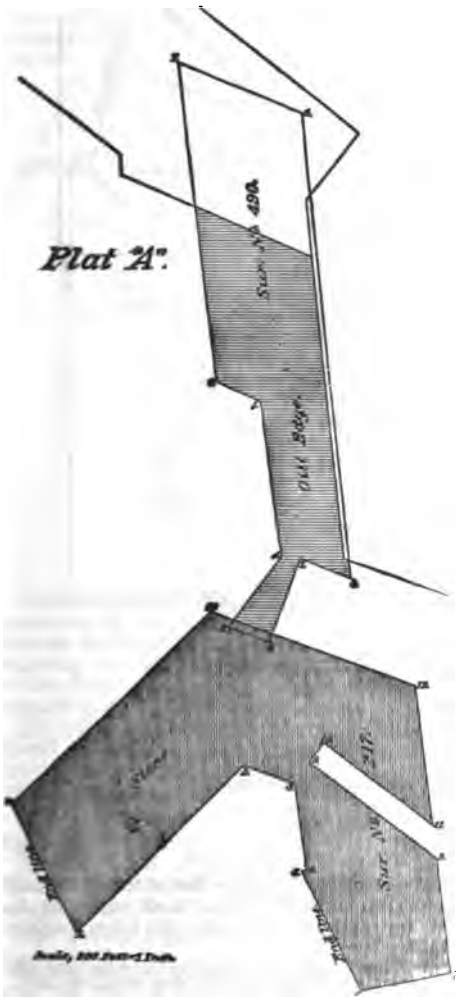
It was also agreed that plat "B" (given below) is a correct copy of the plat of the Gilt Edge Claim contained in the patent thereof, which also shows its relative position to the Stone Claim, the latter being marked Sur. No. 217.

[199]



And thereupon the plaintiffs rested. The defendant then introduced in evidence a patent for the Stone Claim, bearing date May 24, 1877, issued to one Alvinus B. Wood; and it was admitted that, by divers mesne conveyances, the defendant holds title in fee to the premises described in it.

The patent gives a full and minute description by metes and bounds of the surface claim, containing nine acres and $\frac{16}{100}$ of an acre of land, more or less, and embracing 1,500 linear feet of the Stone lode along the course thereof. Its granting clause is as follows:

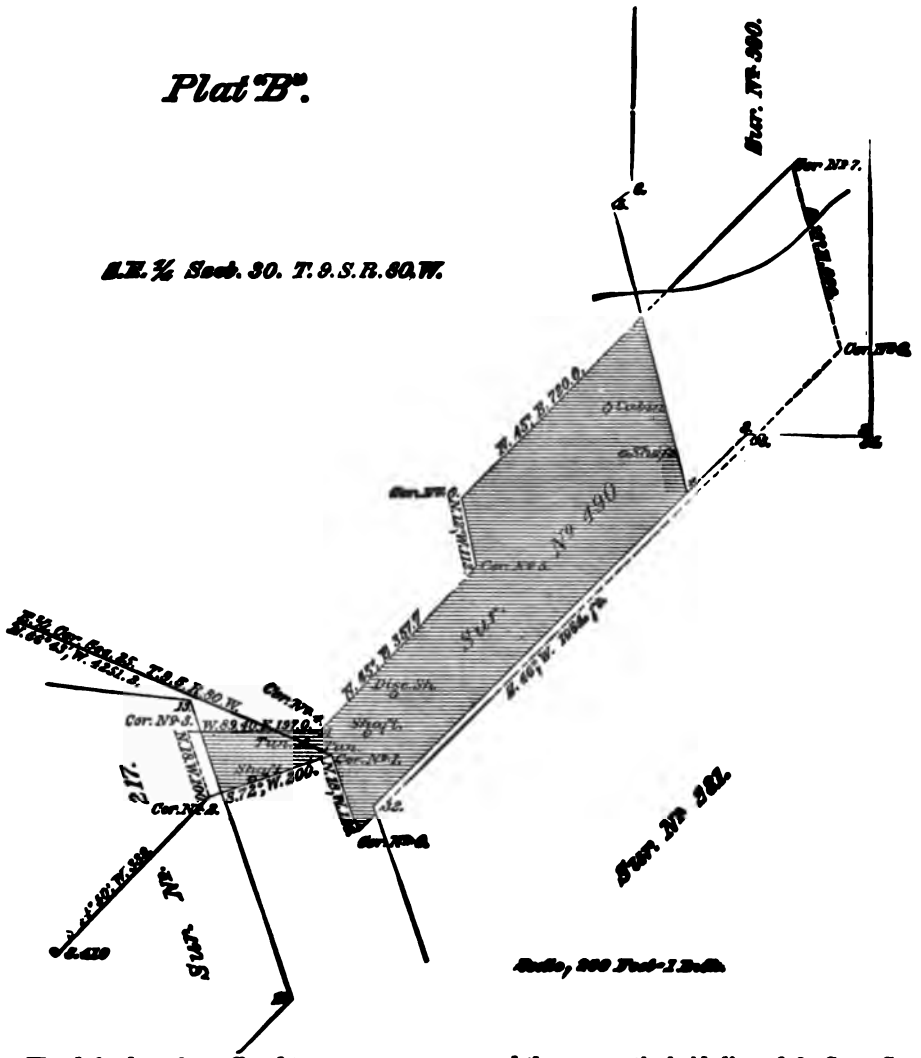
"Now, know ye, that the United States of America, in consideration of the premises and in conformity with the said Revised Statutes of the United States, have given and granted, and by these presents do give and grant, unto the said Alvinus B. Wood, and to his heirs and assigns, the said mining premises hereinbefore described as lot No. 217, embracing a portion of the unsurveyed public domain, with the exclusive right of possession and enjoyment of all the land included within the exterior lines of said survey not herein expressly excepted from these presents, and of fifteen hundred (1500) linear feet of the said Stone vein, lode, ledge or deposit, for the length hereinbefore described, throughout its entire depth, although it may enter the land adjoining; and also of all other veins, lodes, ledges or deposits, throughout their entire depth, the tops or apexes of which lie [201] inside the exterior lines of said survey at the surface extended downward vertically, although such veins, lodes, ledges or deposits, in their downward course, may so far depart from a perpendicular as to extend outside the vertical side lines of said survey; Provided, That the right of possession hereby granted to such outside parts of said veins, lodes, ledges or deposits, shall be confined to such portions thereof as lie between vertical planes drawn downward through the end lines of said survey at the surface, so continued in their own direction that such vertical planes will intersect such exterior parts of said veins, lodes, ledges or deposits; And provided further, That nothing in this conveyance shall authorize the grantee herein, his heirs or assigns, to enter upon the surface of a mining claim owned or possessed by another: To have and to hold said mining premises, together with all the rights, privileges, immunities and appurtenances, of whatsoever nature, thereunto belonging, unto the said Alvinus B. Wood, and to his heirs and assigns forever; subject, nevertheless, to the following conditions and stipulations:

"First. That the grant hereby made is restricted to the land hereinbefore described as lot No. 217, with fifteen hundred (1500) linear feet of the Stone vein, lode, ledge or deposit for the length aforesaid, throughout its entire depth as aforesaid, together with all other veins, lodes, ledges or deposits throughout their entire depths as aforesaid, the tops or apexes of which lie inside the exterior lines of said survey.

"Second. That the premises hereby conveyed, with the exception of the surface, may be entered by the proprietor of any other vein, lode, ledge or deposit, the top or apex of which lies outside the exterior limits of said survey, should the same in its downward course be found to penetrate, intersect, extend into or underlie the premises hereby granted, for the purpose of extracting and removing the ore from such other vein, lode, ledge or deposit.

"Third. That the premises hereby conveyed shall be held subject to any vested and accrued water rights for mining, agricultural, manufacturing or other purposes, and rights to ditches and reservoirs used in connection with such water rights as may be recognized and acknowledged by the local laws, customs and [202] decisions of courts.

"Fourth. That in the absence of necessary legislation by Congress the Legislature of Colorado may provide rules for working the mining claim or premises hereby granted, involving easements, drainage and other necessary means to its complete development."



The defendant then offered to prove:

(1) That the Stone vein, lode or ledge mentioned in patent is a vein, lode or ledge of rock in place bearing iron, lead and silver in large quantities, and is valuable on account thereof.

(2) That the top, apex and outcrop of the vein, lode or ledge exist, and are found in the Stone Surface Claim through its entire extent from north to south between walls of rock in place, a limestone foot wall, and a porphyry hanging wall.

(3) That the true strike of the vein, lode or ledge is north and south, and has a dip to the east at an angle of 15° below the plane of the horizon.

(4) That the vein, lode or ledge, on its dip within vertical planes drawn downward through the end lines of the vein, lode, or ledge, so existing and found within the Stone Surface Mining Claim, and continued in their own direction, viz.: in the direction of the dip of the vein, lode or ledge, passes through, out of, and beyond the east vertical side line of the Stone Surface Claim and location into lands adjoining, to wit: into and under the said Gilt Edge Surface Claim.

(5) That while the defendant admits that underneath the surface of the Gilt Edge Surface Claim it has followed and mined in and upon the Stone vein, lode or ledge, by reason of the facts and premises above set forth, it had a right so to do, and that it has not otherwise in any way interfered with said Gilt Edge Claim, or any part thereof.

To which plaintiffs objected, on the ground that the proffered proof would not be a defense to the action nor tend to establish a defense thereto; and that by reason of the surface form or shape of the Stone Claim its owners had no right under the laws of the United States or otherwise to follow the lode alleged to exist therein in its downward course beyond the lines of the claim and into plaintiffs' claim; and that no part of the Gilt Edge Claim or the mineral or lode within it was within vertical [203] planes drawn downward through the end lines of the Stone Claim and continued indefinitely in their own direction.

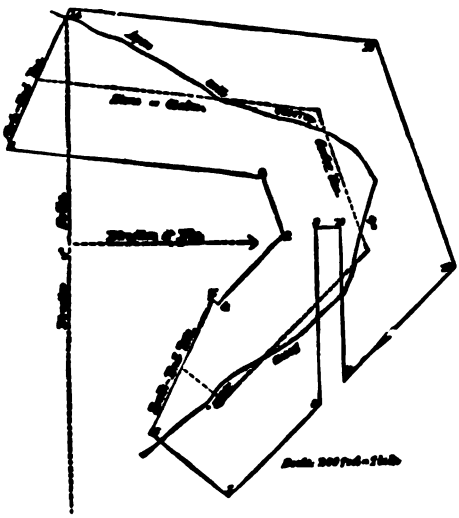
The court sustained the objection and excluded the evidence offered, to which ruling the defendant excepted.

The following diagram, showing the shape of the Stone Claim, its exterior lines, its center line, and the line of the apex of the vein, as alleged by the defendant, was also put in evidence:



[204] Another diagram of the Stone Claim was introduced in evidence, but as it was similar to the one above, with the exception of the lines showing the course of the apex, the direction of the strike and the dip of the vein, it is not important to exhibit it in this statement.

No other evidence was offered. The court found the issues for the plaintiffs, and judgment was entered in their favor, to review which the case was brought here.

Messrs. Walter H. Smith and G. G. Symes, for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. T. M. Patterson, C. S. Thomas, M. B. Carpenter and Amos Steck, for defendants in error.

Mr. Justice Field delivered the opinion of the court:

The question presented for our decision is one of great interest to miners on the public lands, and with respect to it much difference of opinion exists. This difference has arisen from a consideration, on the one hand, of what would properly be called the true end lines of a claim upon a lode of a specified length and width, after it has been opened by explorations, and its general course and direction are seen; and a consideration, on the other hand, of the statute requiring the location of a claim to be distinctly marked on the ground, so that its boundaries may be readily traced. Such location often precedes any extended explorations, and is therefore made without accurate knowledge of the course and direction of the vein. When a vein has been discovered, the rules of miners and the legislative regulations of mining States and Territories generally allow some specified time for explorations before the location is definitely marked. But miners discovering a lode are sometimes in such haste to locate their claim, and mark its extent and boundaries on the surface, that they omit to make sufficient explorations to guide them aright in measuring the ground and fixing its end lines. Hence efforts are not infrequently made to change those lines when the true course and direction of the vein are ascertained by subsequent developments. [205]

The framers of the Statute of 1872 evidently proceeded upon the theory that a claim on a lode, following its outcroppings on the surface for the distance allowed, with a definite extension on each side of the middle of the vein, would generally take the form of a parallelogram. It provided that the length of a claim, subsequently located, whether by one or more persons, should not exceed fifteen hundred feet; that its extension on each side of the middle of the vein at the surface should not exceed three hundred feet; and that its end lines should be parallel to each other. R. S. § 2320. A section of the lode within vertical planes drawn downward through the lines marked on the surface was designed as the grant to the original locator; but as the vein in its downward course might deviate from a perpendicular and pass out of the side lines, the right was conferred to follow it outside of them, but within planes through the end lines drawn vertically downward, and continued in their own direction. The language of that statute, as carried into the Revised Statutes, is as follows:

"The locators of all mining locations heretofore made, or which shall hereafter be made, on any mineral vein, lode or ledge, situated on the public domain, their heirs and assigns, where no adverse claim exists on the 10th day of May, 1872, so long as they comply with the laws of the United States, and with state, territorial and local regulations not in conflict with the laws of the United States governing their possessory title, shall have the exclusive right of possession and enjoyment of all the surface included within the lines of their locations, and of all veins, lodes, and ledges throughout their entire depth, the top or apex of which lies inside of such surface lines extended downward vertically, although such veins, lodes or ledges may so far depart from a perpendicular in their course downward as to extend outside the vertical side lines of such surface locations. But their right of possession to such outside parts of such veins or ledges shall be confined to such portions thereof as lie between vertical planes drawn downward, as above described, through the end lines of their locations, so continued in their own direction that such planes will intersect such exterior parts of such veins or ledges. And nothing in this section shall authorize the locator or possessor of a vein or lode which extends in its downward course beyond the vertical lines of his claim to enter upon the surface of a claim owned or possessed by another." R. S. § 2322. [206]

This section appears sufficiently clear on its face. There is no patent or latent ambiguity in it. The locators have the exclusive right of possession and enjoyment of "all the surface included within the lines of their locations," and the location, by another section must be distinctly marked on the ground so that its boundaries can be readily traced. R. S. § 2324. They have also the exclusive right of possession and enjoyment "of all veins, lodes, and ledges throughout their entire depth, the top or apex of which lies inside of such surface lines extended downward vertically, although such veins, lodes or ledges may so far depart from a perpendicular in their course downward as to extend outside the vertical side lines of said surface locations." The surface side lines extended downward vertically determine the extent of the claim, except when in its descent the vein passes outside of them, and the outside portions are to lie between vertical planes drawn downward through the end lines. This means the end lines of the surface location, for all locations are measured on the surface.

The difficulty arising from the section grows out of its application to claims where the course of the vein is so variant from a straight line that the end lines of the surface location are not parallel, or, if so, are not at a right angle to the course of the vein. This difficulty must often occur where the lines of the surface location are made to control the direction of the vertical planes. The remedy must be found, until the statute is changed, in carefully making the location, and in postponing the marking of its boundaries until explorations can be made to ascertain, as near as possible, the course and direction of the vein. In Colorado the statute allows for this purpose sixty days after notice of the discovery of the lode. Then the location must be distinctly marked on the ground, and [207] thirty days thereafter are given for the preparation of the proper certificate of location to be recorded. Erhardt v. Boaro, 113 U. S. 527, 533 [Bk. 28, L. ed. 1113]. Even then, with all the care possible, the end lines marked on the surface will often vary greatly from a right angle to the true course of the vein. But whatever inconvenience or hardship may thus happen, it is better that the boundary planes should be definitely determined by the lines of the surface location than that they should be subject to perpetual readjustment according to subterranean developments made by mine workings. Such readjustment at every discovery of a change in the course of the vein would create great uncertainty in titles to mining claims. The rule, whatever hardship it may work in particular cases, should be settled, and thus prevent, as far as practicable, such uncertainty.

If the first locator will not or cannot make the explorations necessary to ascertain the true course of the vein, and draws his end lines ignorantly, he must bear the consequences. He can only assert a lateral right to so much of his vein as lies between vertical planes drawn through those lines. Junior locators will not be prejudiced thereby, though subsequent explorations may show that he erred in his location.

The provision of the statute, that the locator is entitled throughout their entire depth to all the veins, lodes or ledges, the top or apex of which lies inside of the surface lines of his location, tends strongly to show that the end lines marked on the ground must control. It often happens that the top or apex of more than one vein lies within such surface lines, and the veins may have different courses and dips, yet his right to follow them outside of the side lines of the location must be bounded by planes drawn vertically through the same end lines. The planes of the end lines cannot be drawn at a right angle to the courses of all the veins if they are not identical.

It is also a fact of importance, that the Land Department has, since the Act of 1872, followed the end lines as marked on the surface, and has limited the extra lateral right of patentees by vertical planes drawn down through such end lines; as in the patent to Wood in this case. Any decision that the department erred in that respect, and that the rights of the patentees [208] were different, would disturb titles derived from such patents, and lead to great confusion and litigation. If it is expedient to change the rule, legislative action should be invoked, as it would operate only in the future, and not judicial decision which would affect past cases as well.

This view of the controlling effect of the end lines of the surface location is also sustained by the decision of this court in the Flagstaff Case, Mining Co. v. Tarbet, 98 U. S. 463 [Bk. 25, L. ed. 253]. There the court said that "The most practicable rule is to regard the course of the vein as that which is indicated by surface outcrop, or surface explorations and workings;" and that "it is on this line that claims will naturally be laid, whatever be the character of the surface, whether level or inclined," and that the end lines of the claim, properly so called, "are those which are crosswise of the general course of the vein on the surface." The court suggested that the law might be imperfect in this respect, and that perhaps the true course of the vein should correspond with its strike or the line of a level run through it; but it added that this "can rarely be ascertained until considerable work has been done, and after claims and locations have become fixed."

Under the Act of 1866, parallelism in the end lines of a surface location was not required; but where a location has been made since the Act of 1872, such parallelism is essential to the existence of any right in the locator or patentee to follow his vein outside of the vertical planes drawn through the side lines. His lateral right by the statute is confined to such portion of the vein as lies between such planes drawn through the end lines and extended in their own direction; that is, between parallel vertical planes. It can embrace no other portion.

The exterior lines of the Stone Claim form a curved figure somewhat in the shape of a horseshoe, and its end lines are not and cannot be made parallel. What are marked on the plat as end lines are not such. The one between numbers 5 and 6 is a side line. The draughtsman or surveyor seems to have hit upon two parallel lines of his nine sided figure, and, apparently for no other reason than their parallelism, called them end lines. [209]

We are, therefore, of opinion that the objection that, by reason of the surface form of the Stone Claim, the defendant could not follow the lode existing therein in its downward course beyond the lines of the claim, was well taken to the offered proof. Besides, if the lines marked as end lines on the plat of that claim can be regarded as such lines of the location, no part of the Gilt Edge Claim falls within vertical planes drawn down through those lines continued in their own direction. In either view of the location of the Stone Claim, the rejected proof would have established no defense. The premises in controversy are admitted to be under the surface lines of the Gilt Edge Claim eastward from the defendant's claim, and the plaintiffs were therefore entitled to recover them.

Judgment affirmed.

Mr. Justice Gray did not hear the argument nor take any part in the decision of this case.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite dissenting:

I cannot agree to this judgment. In my opinion the end lines of a mining location are to be projected parallel to each other and crosswise of the general course of the vein within the surface limits of the location, and whenever the top or apex of the vein is found within the surface lines extended vertically downwards, the vein may be followed outside of the vertical side lines. The end lines are not necessarily those which are marked on the map as such, but they may be projected at the extreme points where the apex leaves the location as marked on the surface.

Mr. Justice Bradley concurs.

[109] SOUTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,

v.

PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA.

Removal of causes—controversy arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States.

In an action by a State to recover money claimed to be due as taxes, where the right to recover was made, by the pleadings, to depend: (1) on the power of the State to tax the franchises of the corporation derived from the Acts of Congress, which were especially referred to, as well as the property used in connection therewith; and (2) on the effect of article 14 of the Amendments of the Constitution on the validity of the statutes under which the taxes sued for were levied, the defendant had the right to remove the cause to the federal court, under the Act of March 3, 1875, on the ground that the action "is a suit at law, of a civil nature and arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States."

Submitted Dec. 11, 1886. Decided Apr. 26, 1886.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of California. Reversed.

The case is stated by the court.

Messrs. George H. Smith and S. W. Sanderson, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. R. M. Widney, for defendants in error.

This is a suit brought by the State of California, in one of its own courts, against the Southern Pacific Railroad Company to recover $31,470.58 claimed to be due for taxes. The Railroad Company answered the complaint, setting up, among others, the following defenses:

1. That under and by virtue of the Acts of Congress of July 27, 1866, 14 Stat. at L. 292, chap. 278; March 3, 1871, 16 Stat. at L. 573, chap. 122, and May 2, 1872, 17 Stat. at L. 59, chap. 182, the defendant "became, and ever since has been, a federal corporation, and has held its franchises and exercised all its corporate powers under the Government of the United States;" or "if, by virtue of the several Acts of Congress * * * referred to, it did not become a federal corporation, yet it holds under the Government of the United States all the corporate powers and franchises granted to it by the said several Acts of Congress as the trustee for the government, and for the governmental uses and purposes specified in said Acts;" "that the Government of the United States has never given to the State of California the right to lay any tax upon the franchise, existence, or operations of defendant;" that the "value of all the franchises held and corporate powers exercised by defendant under said Acts of Congress" were included in the valuation of the property of the Company upon which the taxes sued for were assessed, and that by reason of the premises the taxes are illegal and void.

2. That the property of the Company, for which the taxes sued for were levied, was and is incumbered by a mortgage securing an indebtedness of the Railroad Company, exceeding $8,000 a mile, and that it was valued for taxation without deduction on account of such incumbrance, because such was the requirement of the statute with respect to railroad Corporations owning railroads within the State, and [111] operated in more than one county; and this corporation was and is of that class.

3. That the statute under which the taxes were levied is repugnant to article XIV of the Amendments of the Constitution of the United States, inasmuch as it deprives railroad corporations of the State operated in more than one county of the equal protection of the laws: (1) by providing that the property of such corporations shall be valued for taxation to them without deduction on account of mortgage incumbrances, while the mortgaged property of other corporations and of natural persons is taxed to its owner only on its value after the value of the mortgage has been deducted; and (2) by failing to provide a tribunal for the correction of errors in the valuation of the property of such railroad corporations for taxation, when such a tribunal is provided for all other corporations and for natural persons.

4. That the statute is still further repugnant to the same Amendment, because it deprives such corporations of their property without due process of law, there being no provision for notice to them of a time, place or tribunal for a hearing in defense of their rights in the valuation of their property for taxation.

Upon the filing of this answer, the Railroad Company presented its petition, accompanied by the necessary security, for the removal of the suit to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of California, under the Act of March 3, 1875, 18 Stat. at L. 470, chap. 137, on the ground that the action "is a suit at law of a civil nature and arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States." This petition was filed in time. The state court proceeded with the suit, notwithstanding the petition, and gave judgment against the Railroad Company for the full amount of the tax and the statutory penalty. From this judgment the Corporation appealed to the supreme court, where the only question presented for decision was "Whether the Federal Constitution and the Act of Congress authorized a removal of an action from a state to a federal court, brought by a State to recover taxes levied under its laws [112] on the property of a being created by its power, in one of its own courts." This question was decided against the Corporation, and the judgment of the court below affirmed. To this judgment of affirmance the present writ of error was brought, on the allowance of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the State.

In New Orleans, M. & T. R. R. Co. v. Mississippi, 102 U. S. 141 [Bk. 26, L. ed. 98], it was decided that a suit brought by a State in one of its own courts against a corporation of its own creation can be removed to the Circuit Court of the United States, under the Act of March 3, 1875, if it is a suit arising under the Constitution or laws of the United States, although it may involve questions other than those which depend on the Constitution and laws. The case of Ames v. Kansas, 111 U. S. 449 [Bk. 28, L. ed. 482], is to the same effect; and in Starin v. New York, 115 U. S. 257 [Bk. 29, L. ed. 388], it was stated, as the effect of all the authorities on the subject, that if, from the questions involved in a suit, "it appears that some title, right, privilege or immunity on which the recovery depends will be defeated by one construction of the Constitution or a law of the United States, or sustained by the opposite construction, the case will be one arising under the Constitution or laws of the United States, within the meaning of that term as used in the Act of 1875; otherwise not."

Applying these rules, which must now be considered as settled, to the present case, it is apparent that the court below erred in deciding that the suit was not removable; for it distinctly appears that the right of the State to recover was made by the pleadings to depend: (1) on the power of the State to tax the franchises of the Corporation derived from the Acts of Congress which were specially referred to, as well as the property used in connection therewith; and (2) on the effect of art., XIV of the Amendments of the Constitution on the validity of the statutes under which the taxes sued for were levied. The first depended on the construction of the Acts of Congress, and the second on the construction of the constitutional Amendment. If decided in one way the State might recover, if in another it would be defeated, at least in part. The right of removal does not depend upon the validity of the claim set up under the Constitution or laws. It is enough if the claim involves [113] a real and substantial dispute or controversy in the suit. In this case there can be no doubt about that. The Circuit Court of the United States for the District of California has already decided more than once, in other cases involving precisely the same questions, that the statute on which the recovery depends was unconstitutional and void, and some of these cases are now pending here on writs of error. Already much time has been devoted in this court to their argument under special assignments.

The judgment of the supreme court is reversed and the cause remanded, with directions that it be sent back to the Superior Court of Los Angeles County for removal to the Circuit Court of the United States, in accordance with the prayer of the petition filed for that purpose.

Judgment reversed.

LUCY C. FREEMAN ET AL.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 97-109.)

Statute of Limitations—partnership accounts—indebtedness of firm to surviving partner—statute does not run against surviving partner in possession of firm assets—lien of surviving partner on assets.

1. Where real estate was in fact partnership assets, and the interest of heirs and the right to dower therein were subject to the lien of partnership debts, but dower was actually assigned nearly three years before the filing of a bill to enforce the lien, the court refused to disturb the assignment.

2. Where real estate held as partnership assets is sold under a decree and purchased by a firm creditor who thereupon cancels his indebtedness, and such sale is subsequently held void, its incidents and consequences are also void.

3. A surviving partner in possession of partnership property, real or personal, has a right to hold it until the debts of the firm are paid, including any existing indebtedness to him; nor will his neglect to wind up the concern relieve the partnership assets in his hands from the lien of the partnership debts, nor permit the Statute of Limitations to run in favor of the heirs of the deceased partner so as to enable them to obtain an interest in the property without payment of the indebtedness.

Submitted Jan. 11, 1886. Decided Apr. 26, 1886.

APPEAL from the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of Mississippi. Reversed.

The case is stated by the court.

Mr. William L. Nugent, for appellants.

Messrs. Frank Johnston and J. E. McKeighan, for appellees.

Mr. Justice Bradley delivered the opinion [98 of the court:

This case was commenced by bill in equity filed in the court below in July, 1882, by Pattie A. Clay and Brutus J. Clay, her husband, citizens of the State of Kentucky, against Lucy C. Freeman and C. L. Freeman, her husband, and David I. Field, citizens of the State of Missouri. As the bill was dismissed on demurrer, and the appeal is from the decree of dismissal, it is necessary to state its principal allegations. The facts alleged are substantially as follows:

In 1855 Christopher I. Field (of whom the complainant, Pattie A. Clay, is only child and heir at law) and his brother, David I. Field (of whom the defendant, Lucy C. Freeman, is the widow, and the defendant, David I. Field, is only child and heir at law), jointly purchased a plantation in Bolivar County, Mississippi, called the Content Place, for the purpose of carrying it on in partnership, under an agreement by which said David was to possess, manage and control the partnership property for the firm, and the partners were to be equally interested in the property and business. They were also equally to bear losses and expenses, and to share equally the profits realized; but Christopher, being a man of large wealth, did not have the same necessity for calling upon the firm profits as David did. The style of the partnership, as advertised by the partners, was David I. Field & Co., or D. I. Field & Co. The plantation and its equipment of slaves and implements cost from $60,000 to $70,000, the lands alone costing about $54,000. Of this capital Christopher advanced $15,541.26 more than David, which advance was made in the years 1856, 1857, 1858 and 1859, and four partnership notes were executed by David and delivered to Christopher as evidence of these advances, which notes were as follows, namely:

1. "$7, 385$\frac{81}{100}$. On or before the first day of January, 1858, the concern of David I. Field & Co. will be owing C. I. Field the sum of seven thousand three hundred and eighty-five $\frac{81}{100}$
[99] dollars for money advanced the concern for payment for the Leach land and cash advanced for the purchase of negroes in K'y in the summer of 1856, and to bear six per cent interest from maturity, or when due. This 23d Dec'r., 1856. "D. I. Field & Co. [seal.]"

2. "The concern of David I. Field & Co. is owing to C. I. Field the sum of five thousand six hundred and sixty-six and two thirds dollars (it being that amount advanced by him of payment to Kirk, balance on concern note due him 1st day of January last); he is to be paid six per cent for said amount from date until paid. This 20th March, 1857.

"David I. Field & Co."

[On this note is indorsed a credit as follows: "$243.50. Rec'd on the within note the sum of two hundred and forty-three $\frac{50}{100}$ dollars on settlement of articles purchased at D. I. Field's sale of personal property by C. I. Field and D. I. Field & Co., this 1st day January, 1861.

"C. I. Field."]

3. "Due C. I. Field, or order, the sum of eleven hundred dollars ($1,100), it being money this day advanced by paying to Wm. Kirk, through his draft on Hewitt, Norton & Co., of New Orleans, this fifth day of June, 1858.

"D. I. Field & Co. [seal.]"

4. "Bolivar, June 15th, 1859.

"Due C. I. Field, or order, one thousand three hundred and eighty-nine dollars $\frac{89}{100}$, for value rec'd, on settlement to this date (to this date). "D. I. Field & Co."

David I. Field (whom for the sake of brevity we will call D. I. Field) conducted the plantation, and lived on it until his death, which took place on the 11th of September, 1859; and from that time until the commencement of the [100] late war, it was conducted by his administrator, one E. H. Field. His widow, Lucy, the now defendant, soon after his death removed to Lexington, Kentucky, with her infant son, David I. Field, Junior, one of the defendants in this suit; and after her marriage with her present husband, C. S. Freeman, she removed to Missouri to reside with him, and neither she nor her son has ever lived in Mississippi since. At the time of his death, D. I. Field owed individually (including his half of the firm debt due to his brother, C. I. Field) $11,000 or $12,000, all of which debts, and all the firm debts except the debt due to C. I. Field, were paid. On the 12th of December, 1859, C. I. Field probated and registered his claim against the estate of D. I. Field, and to the proof thereof annexed the following memorandum, to wit:

"David I. Field & Co. is a firm consisting of the estate of David I. Field and C. I. Field, partners in the Kirk Plantation, known as the Content Place. All the within notes are joint notes of the firm to C. I. Field; consequently one half of the within claim is chargeable to the estate of D. I. Field. This the 10th Dec'r. 1859. (signed) C. I. Field."

Nothing was realized from the plantation during the years 1859, 1860, and 1861, more than sufficient to keep it up. In 1859 there was a bad overflow of the river; in 1860 there was barely sufficient for expenses, and the crop of 1861 was destroyed by the confederate soldiers under military orders.

Christopher I. Field then took the slaves (about thirty in number) to Texas to prevent their being dispersed and, after the war was ended, brought them back and endeavored to work the plantation again; but as few of the slaves, after obtaining their freedom, were willing to remain on it, very little could be done, and the place was worked at a loss. Christopher I. Field died on the 18th of July, 1867, leaving his daughter Pattie, the complainant, his sole heir at law, who came of full age on the 22d of November, 1869. A few months before his death he was appointed administrator de bonis non of his brother David, but nothing came to his hands as such administrator, and he filed no account. After his death, Brutus J. Clay, Senior (father of Brutus, one of the complainants), was appointed administrator, both of the estate of Christopher and of his brother David, and assumed the management of the plantation; but by reason of dilapidation, [101] growth of brush, and overflows of the river, realized nothing beyond taxes and expenses as long as he had the charge.

On the 2d of November, 1868, Brutus J. Clay, Senior, as administrator of David I. Field, presented a petition to the probate court of Bolivar County, Mississippi, representing the estate of said David to be insolvent, and praying for an order to sell his property, real and personal, for the payment of his debts. Schedules were annexed to the petition, showing that there was no personal property, that the only real estate was the said David's half interest in the plantation of Content, and that his debts consisted of one half of the notes given to Christopher as before mentioned. The petition stated that David's widow, Lucy, and his only child and heir, David, Jr., and his guardian, one Scott, resided in Lexington, Kentucky, and prayed an order of publication citing all parties interested to appear, etc. Upon this petition and the proceedings had in pursuance thereof, a decree was made by the probate court in March, 1869, declaring that the estate was insolvent, and authorizing and directing the administrator to sell the lands described in the petition. In pursuance of this decree and advertisement, duly published, D. I. Field's one half interest in the plantation was sold at public auction on the 20th day of December, 1869, and struck off to the complainant, then Pattie A. Field, by her attorney, for the sum of $6,000. The complainant gave her receipt for the amount of purchase money, less the costs, which was credited on the notes by the administrator, and she received a deed for the property purchased, and went into possession, and has remained in possession, by herself and her husband or her tenants, ever since that time, except as to the dower of the defendant, Lucy C. Freeman, hereafter mentioned. The sale was made in good faith and in the belief that it was valid. On the first day of December, 1869, shortly before the sale took place, a new Constitution of Mississippi went into operation, which abolished the probate court and established a chancery court for each county, having, amongst other things, the former jurisdiction of the probate court; and, by a law [102] passed the 4th of May, 1870, it was enacted that all causes and proceedings remaining undisposed of in the court of probate of each county should be transferred to the chancery court. The proceedings in this case were not formally transferred, but are actually on file in the clerk's office of the chancery court for Bolivar County aforesaid.

The bill then states the results of the working of the plantation from 1870 to the time of the filing of the bill, showing that no profits were realized, but that the complainant incurred a loss of from $2,500 to $3,000, in consequence of the dilapidations consequent upon the war, severe overflowing of the river, and other causes for which the complainant was not responsible. Vouchers are exhibited with the bill for taxes, expenses, and repairs by her paid and incurred.

In 1878 Lucy C. Freeman (then Lucy C. Field) filed a petition in the chancery court of Bolivar County for her dower in one undivided half of the Content Plantation; and in 1875 a decree for allotment of dower was made, which decree was affirmed by the supreme court of the State in 1876, so far as said Lucy's legal right to dower was concerned. The complainant and Brutus J. Clay, Senior, by way of defense to the suit, set up the partnership, the indebtedness to Christopher I. Field, the fact that the plantation was partnership property, and liable for the partnership debts before any dower could be had therein, and also set up the sale of David I. Field's interest by order of the orphans' court. But this defense was overruled as not a good defense at law. The supreme court in affirming the decree, however, declared that the right of C. I. Field's estate arising out of the partnership and the partnership debts was not affected by the proceedings in dower, and that the defendants, or tenants, in that suit were left free to litigate the same with the said Lucy. Her dower was thereupon set off to her in November, 1879, and complainants hoped she would be therewith content, and did not further resist her taking possession of her dower. But in September, 1880, she filed a bill for damages in dower, which is now pending in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Mississippi.

[103] On the 27th of November, 1880, David I. Field, Junior, who had then come of age, commenced an action of ejectment in the said circuit court for an undivided half of said plantation, as heir of his father, David I. Field, Senior, and demands $20,000 for mesne profits. The complainant filed a plea, and the suit was still pending at the time of filing the bill in this case.

The bill states that shortly after the sale made on the 20th of December, 1869, Brutus J. Clay, Senior, made his final settlement as administrator of the estates of David I. Field and Christopher I. Field, in the chancery court of Bolivar County aforesaid, and was discharged; and that there has since been no administrator of either of said estates. E. H. Field also settled his accounts as administrator of David I. Field's estate and was discharged. All of the personal property of the partnership of David I. Field & Co. was lost or destroyed without any negligence of Christopher I. Field, surviving partner, as the result of the war, at the end of which the only property of the partnership left was the Content Plantation; that no part of the partnership notes given to Christopher as aforesaid has ever been paid. The complainant insists that this debt is a charge on the property prior to any claim of the widow, Lucy, or of the heir, David I. Field, Junior. D. I. Field's estate is insolvent, the one half of said lands being now insufficient to pay said notes and the interest thereon. C. I. Field, at the time of his death, owed nothing, or if anything, all his debts are paid off and discharged. All the partnership debts, except the said debt due to the estate of C. I. Field, have been paid off and discharged. The complainant, Pattie A. Clay, now holds said debt as his sole heir at law and distributee.

The prayer is that an account of the partnership may be taken, and that the assets may be marshaled, and the said debt paid out of the assets of the partnership, including said plantation—the complainants proffering an account of all moneys received therefrom, and claiming credit for all taxes, expenses and repairs. The prayer then proceeds as follows: "Or if this honorable court should adjudge and determine that the said proceedings in the probate court of [104] said county of Bolivar constitute an election binding upon her, and that they estop her from proceeding otherwise than as against the undivided half interest of said David I. Field, deceased, in said plantation for the half of said partnership debts due to her ancestor, your orators in that event pray that after the amount due her as such heir at law and distributee upon such accounting shall be ascertained and fixed; the said undivided half interest of said David I. Field in said plantation shall be sold under the proper decree of this court, thus carrying into execution the decree of said probate court of Bolivar County, rendered in the matter of the administration of the estate of said David I. Field, deceased; but if this honorable court should adjudge and determine that your orators are not entitled to either of the special reliefs hereinbefore prayed, they then pray that this honorable court may decree that your orators have a lien upon the said undivided half interest of said David I. Field, deceased, in said plantation for the said sum of $6,000, and the interest thereon from the 20th day of December, 1869, lessened by any balance that may be found due by her upon such accounting to be had in the cause as may be adjudged to be fair and equitable; and if it be determined that your oratrix has lost her right to proceed against said plantation, as assets of said partnership for the payment of said partnership debts to her said ancestor, they pray that an accounting may be had between them and the said Lucy C. Freeman, in connection with her claim as propounded in and by her bill of complaint, upon such principles and in such manner as this honorable court shall adjudge to be fair and equitable; or, if mistaken in the relief sought, then for such other, further and general relief and decree as to equity belongs and your orators can require. In the meantime your orators, hereby confessing they are without valid title to the undivided half interest of said David I. Field in said plantation, but claiming and insisting that in no event can they be held to account to said defendants in two separate proceedings concerning the rents of said plantation, and that the whole controversy between them and said defendants, their agents and attorneys, be enjoined, inhibited, and restrained from further prosecuting their [105] said suits in this honorable court against your orators; and on final hearing, that said injunction be perpetuated."

This bill was dismissed by the court below as upon demurrer. Other proceedings were had; but, in view of the course which was finally taken in the cause, it is not necessary to notice them. The ground on which the bill was dismissed was lapse of time. The sale of David I. Field's interest by order of the probate court in 1869 was held to be void. This was also so held in the action of ejectment brought by David I. Field, Junior, the reason assigned being that the probate court had no jurisdiction of accounts between partners, and that the administrator gave no bond as required by law. On writ of error from this court in that case the judgment of the circuit court was affirmed. See Clay & Wife v. Field, 115 U. S. 260 [Bk. 29, L. ed. 375]. But that action affected only the legal title; and the question still remains, unless precluded by lapse of time, whether, in equity, the lands, being partnership property, are not liable to the debts of the partnership prior to any claim of the widow and heir of D. I. Field.

As before said, the court below placed its decree upon the lapse of time, holding that as the partnership was dissolved by the death of David I. Field, Sr., in September, 1859, a suit for an account of the partnership transactions could not be brought in 1882, after a lapse of 23 years; or, deducting 5 years for the continuance of the war, after a lapse of 18 years.

If this were simply a bill to enforce the settlement of an account, this reasoning would be very apposite. But it is not. It is a bill to prevent a dispossession of property until the equitable charges against that property are adjusted and settled. Of course the adjustment and settlement of those charges involves an account of the partnership transactions. But that account was no less claimable, at any time, by the estate of D. I. Field than it was by that of C. I. Field. The primary object of the present bill, though it involves a taking of the account, is to prevent the complainants from being dispossessed of the property until their claim against [106] it has been discharged.

If a pledgee holds property as security for a debt, the Statute of Limitations does not affect his right to hold the pledge until the debt is paid; it does not authorize the debtor to claim the pledge without paying the debt. The creditor is in possession. If the statute runs against anyone (so far as relates to the pledge), it runs against the pledgeor. The creditor, by operation of the statute, may lose his right of action for a personal judgment against the debtor; but he has a right to hold on to the pledge until the debt is paid. It is the debtor's concern to see that he does not lose his right to redeem the pledge.

So, a mortgagee in possession, if satisfied with the mortgage security, need have no anxiety about the Statute of Limitations. That is the concern of the mortgagor. Unless he redeems in proper time, he will lose his equity of redemption.

The same rule applies in the case of partnership property in the possession of the surviving partner; he has a right to hold it until the debts of the firm are paid, and if the firm is indebted to him, he has a right to hold it until he is paid. It is true, it is his duty to dispose of the partnership property, and settle the partnership debts. But that is a duty to which he may, at any time, be compelled by the representatives of the deceased partner, and although his neglect or delay in winding up the concern may expose him to the animadversion of the court, and to the vigorous exercise of its power to compel him to do his duty, it will not relieve the partnership assets in his hands from the lien of the partnership debts. Being in possession of those assets, he is not affected by the Statute of Limitations. If the statute runs against anybody, it runs against the representatives of the deceased partner in relation to their right to call him to account. The proposition that the partnership property can be taken out of the surviving partner's hands and distributed amongst the several partners and their representatives, without a settlement and payment of the partnership debts, including any balance due the surviving partner himself, is a proposition that equity will not for a moment entertain.

The other side, it is true, have prevailed at law; but they cannot prevail in equity. It would be strange indeed, if the principal capi- [107] talist of the firm, who advanced much the largest amount of money in the concern, should be brought in debt to his copartner. The thing is unreasonable on its face; and it cannot stand the test of a juridical examination.

The reason why the matter lay so long without any movement being made on either side (except that of Lucy C. Freeman for her dower) is probably this: On the side of C. I. Field and his representatives it was supposed that the decree of the probate court, declaring the insolvency of D. I. Field and ordering a sale of his property to pay his debts, and the sale made in pursuance thereof, ended all further inquiry or controversy. On the side of D. I. Field's family, it is probable that the same idea prevailed; or, if not, that the land was not supposed equal in value to the lien upon it. The infancy of C. I. Field, Jr., would hardly have deterred his mother and guardian from prosecuting his interest if they had thought it worth prosecuting.

The idea that David, Junior, could get the land without paying the debt on account of lapse of time is probably of recent growth.

But whatever the reasons for inaction may have been, C. I. Field and his representatives and heir at law have always, since the war, remained in possession; and the heir cannot, in equity, be ousted of that possession without a settlement of the accounts. It is very doubtful, indeed, whether without this possession even a technical plea of the Statute of Limitations, or lapse of time analogous thereto, could be sustained. After the death of D. I. Field, his administrator, E. H. Field, and C. I. Field, by mutual consent, continued the partnership until the breaking out of the war. Of course, neither party could have claimed that the statute was running during that period, under those circumstances. It did not run during the war. It did not commence to run, therefore, until April, 1866. C. I. Field died fifteen months afterwards, in July, 1867, and for several of those months he had been administrator of his brother's estate, no one being such for the remainder of the time. Of course he could not sue himself. Then Brutus J. Clay, Sr., was appointed administrator of both estates, and, so far as appears, continued such (except as discharged from active trust on settlement of his [108] accounts) down to the period of his death, which occurred, as stated in the bill, in October, 1878, since which time there has been no personal representative of either estate. We do not see, therefore, how the Statute of Limitations, or lapse of time, can be set up against the complainant, Pattie A. Clay, the heir at law of C. I. Field.

That she is a proper party to bring this suit we think is very clear. She is the only person in the world interested in C. I. Field's real or personal estate. In the realty she is legally interested as heir at law; in the personalty she is the only beneficiary. If new letters of administration were to be taken out it would be for her benefit. There are no creditors; there are no debts due the estate except the one debt due from the partnership. The plantation is partnership property, standing in the joint names of the partners, but liable for the partnership debts. C. I. Field and his administrator held it in possession subject to the lien of those debts. She, as their successor and the only person beneficially interested, still holds that possession. We think it would be highly inequitable to deprive her of that possession at the suit of the heir of D. I. Field, the debtor, without payment of the debt under the lien of which she holds it, or, at least, without bringing the debt into account against the property itself and any rents and profits which she and her predecessors in interest may have realized therefrom. Her position is really one of defense. She has possession, and an attempt is made, under a technically legal title, to deprive her of that possession; whilst that legal title is a merely formal one; since, as before said, the lands are partnership property, and assets, in equity, subject to the partnership debts; and her possession as sole successor in interest to her father cannot be disturbed without doing equity to her, by allowing her to bring the notes, with interest (now belonging to her) into account against those assets. The sale made by order of the probate court having been adjudged void, its incidents and consequences are void—such as the receipt given for the balance of the $6,000 purchase money, and the indorsement thereof on the notes. The latter will stand for their full amount, with interest, less the indorsement of $243.50 made by C. I. Field.

It results from these views that the lien for [109] partnership debts takes precedence, not only of the interest of David I. Field, Jr., as heir at law of D. I. Field, but of Lucy C. Freeman's right of dower. As, however, dower was actually assigned to her nearly three years before the filing of the present bill, such assignment should not now be disturbed; but no further exaction for detention of dower should be enforced. We think, therefore, that upon the allegations of the bill, the complainants are entitled to relief, and that the demurrers should have been overruled.

The decree of the Circuit Court is reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to overrule the demurrers, and to proceed in the cause according to law and the principles announced in this opinion.

In the MATTER OF WASH. F. LOTHROP. [113]

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 113-119.)

Territory of Arizona—authority of Legislature to establish courts.

The County Court in the County of Cochise, established by section 4 of the Act of March 12, 1885, of the Legislature of Arizona, is an inferior court within the meaning of section 1909 R. S. and was therefore legally created.

[No. 6. Orig.]

Argued and submitted April 12, 1886. Decided April 26, 1886.

PETITION for a writ of habeas corpus. Denied.

The case is stated by the court.

Mr. A. X. Parker, for petitioner.

Mr. Thomas Mitchell, in opposition.

Messrs. A. T. Britton and A. B. Browne, filed a brief in support of the validity of the Territorial Act "in behalf of the legal profession and the public at large" in the Territory.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

The petitioner is detained in the territorial [114] prison of Arizona upon a warrant of commitment issued by the County Court of Cochise County, under a sentence of imprisonment on a conviction of the crime of grand larceny; and the only question presented by his petition is whether the Territorial Legislature of Arizona had authority to create and establish that court. There is no question of the jurisdiction of the court to try the petitioner for the offense of which he was convicted, if the court itself was rightfully created.

The provisions of the Revised Statutes on which the question depends are these:

"Sec. 1846. The legislative power in each Territory shall be vested in the Governor and a legislative Assembly. The legislative Assembly shall consist of a council and house of representatives."

"Sec. 1851. The legislative power of every Territory shall extend to all rightful subjects of legislation not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States."

"Sec. 1864. The supreme court of every Territory shall consist of a chief justice and two associate justices, any two of whom shall constitute a quorum. * * * They shall hold a term annually at the seat of government of the Territory for which they are respectively appointed.

"Sec. 1865. Every Territory shall be divided into three judicial districts; and a district court shall be held in each district of the Territory by one of the justices of the supreme court, at such time and place as may be prescribed by law; and each judge, after assignment, shall reside in the district to which he is assigned."

"Sec. 1868. The supreme court and the district courts, respectively, in every Territory, shall possess chancery as well as common-law jurisdiction."

"Sec. 1869. Writs of error, bills of exceptions, and appeals shall be allowed, in all cases, from [115] the final decisions of the district courts to the supreme court of the Territories, respectively, under such regulations as may be prescribed by law."

"Sec. 1907. The judicial power in New Mexico, Utah, Washington, Colorado, Dakota, Idaho, Montana and Wyoming, shall be vested in a supreme court, district courts, probate courts and in justices of the peace."

"Sec. 1908. The judicial power of Arizona shall be vested in a supreme court and such inferior courts as the legislative council may by law prescribe."

"Sec. 1866. The jurisdiction, both appellate and original, of the courts provided for in sections 1907 and 1908 shall be limited by law."

Such was the organic law of Arizona, as shown by the Revised Statutes, on the 12th of March, 1885, when the Act was passed by the Legislative Assembly of the Territory and approved by the Governor, "to create and establish a County Court in the County of Cochise." Section 4 of this Act is as follows:

"Sec. 4. Said county court shall be a court of record, having a seal with the coat of arms of the Territory and 'County Court, Cochise County, Arizona,' sunk or engraved thereon; and said county court shall have original, general, criminal and civil jurisdiction, except as hereafter limited, and shall have equal, concurrent, common-law, equitable and statutory jurisdiction with the district courts in all cases. The County Court of said Cochise County shall have original, concurrent jurisdiction with the district courts in all cases of equity and in all cases at law which involve the title or possession of real property, or the legality of any tax, impost, assessment, toll or municipal fine, and in all other cases in which the demand or the value of the property in controversy amounts to $100 or more; and in all criminal cases amounting to felony, and cases of misdemeanor not otherwise provided for; of all actions of forcible entry and detainer; of proceedings in insolvency; of actions to prevent or abate a nuisance; of all matters of probate, of divorce and for annulment of marriage, and all matters incidental thereto or connected therewith; and of all such special cases and proceedings as are not otherwise provided for. And said court shall have the power of naturalization, and to issue papers therefor. Said county courts shall have appellate jurisdiction in all cases arising in justices and other inferior courts in [116] said Cochise County, in the same manner and to the same extent as is now allowed by law on appeals from such courts to the district courts. The said County Court of Cochise County shall be always open, legal holidays and nonjudicial days excepted, and its process shall extend to all parts of the Territory; Provided, That all actions for the recovery of the possession of, quieting the title to, or for the enforcement of liens upon, real estate shall be commenced in the county in which the real estate, or any part thereof affected by such action or actions, is situated. Said county court and the judge thereof shall have power to issue writs of mandamus, certiorari, injunction, prohibition, quo warranto and habeas corpus on petition, by or on behalf of any person in actual custody in said Cochise County. Injunctions, writs of prohibition and habeas corpus may be issued and served on legal holidays and nonjudicial days, and all Acts and parts of Acts granting and conferring jurisdiction to and upon the district courts and describing their civil and criminal procedure shall be and is here made applicable to the County Court of Cochise County. Appeals shall be taken from the county court to the supreme court of this Territory in the same manner and in the same cases as are now allowed by law in appeals from the district and probate courts to the supreme court."

The judge of the court was to be elected by the qualified electors of the county, and to hold his office for four years. He was to reside at the county seat, and could not be absent from the county more than thirty days in each calendar year.

The precise question for determination is whether such a court with such a jurisdiction is an "inferior court" within the meaning of section 1908. It has "equal, concurrent, common-law, equitable and statutory jurisdiction with the district courts in all cases," and "original, concurrent jurisdiction with the district [117] courts * * * in all criminal cases amounting to felony, and cases of misdemeanor, not otherwise provided for." It is, therefore, a court of substantially equal dignity and importance with the district court, so far as Cochise County is concerned; but it is "inferior" to the supreme court, because that court has power to review its judgments and decrees on appeal. As every Territory is by the Revised Statutes to be divided into districts, and a district court is to be held in each district, section 1908 must be so construed as not to exclude district courts in Arizona Territory. Still, as district courts are neither named nor specifically referred to in the section, it does not necessarily follow that the "inferior courts" provided for must be courts inferior to them. For some reason Congress saw fit in establishing the Territorial Government of Arizona to depart from its usual habit of specifying the courts in which the judicial power should be vested, and to provide that it should be vested there "in a supreme court to consist of three judges, and such inferior courts as the legislative council may prescribe." Chap. 56, § 2, 12 Stat. at L. 665. In all the other Territories then existing it had been vested "in a supreme court, district courts, probate courts, and in justices of the peace." This practice began with the Act establishing the Territorial Government at Wisconsin, April 20, 1836, 5 Stat. at L. 10, chap. 54, § 9, and it was followed in all the territorial organic Acts passed afterwards, except in those for Arizona and Alaska. In Arizona the provision as to the vesting of judicial power was more like that in the organic Act of Florida, March 30, 1822, 3 Stat. at L. 654, chap. 13, § 6, where it was placed "in two superior courts, and in such inferior courts and justices of the peace as the legislative council of the Territory may from time to time establish." This, it was held in American Ins. Co. v. Canter, 1 Pet. 511 [26 U. S. bk. 7, L. ed. 240], gave the legislative council authority to establish courts of concurrent jurisdiction with the superior courts, except in respect to capital offenses, as to which, by the organic Act, the jurisdiction of the superior courts had been made exclusive. The language of Chief Justice Marshall is, p. 544 [256]: "This general grant is common to the superior and inferior courts and their jurisdiction is concurrent, except so far as it may be made exclusive in either, by other provisions of the statute. The jurisdiction of the superior [118] courts is declared to be exclusive over capital offenses; on every other question over which those courts may take cognizance by virtue of this section, concurrent jurisdiction may be given to the inferior courts." This is, as it seems to us, equally applicable to the present case. The legislative power of the Territory extends to "all rightful subjects of legislation not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States." This includes the establishment of "inferior courts;" that is to say, courts inferior to the supreme court. District courts have been established by Congress, but Congress has not defined their jurisdiction, further than to provide generally that they shall have chancery as well as common-law jurisdiction. According to section 1866 the jurisdiction of all the courts is to be such as shall be limited by law. There is no restraint on the legislative power of this Territory as to the grant of jurisdiction to the inferior courts, except by implication, that it shall be such as properly belongs to a court inferior to the supreme court. In Ferris [Perris] v. Higley, 20 Wall. 888 [87 U. S. bk. 22, L. ed. 384], it was held in respect to a Territory where the judicial power was vested in a supreme court, district courts, probate courts, and justices of the peace, that the probate courts could not be vested by the territorial Legislature with the powers of courts of general jurisdiction, both civil and criminal, because that would be inconsistent with the nature and purpose of a probate court as authorized by that Act, and inconsistent with the clause which conferred on the supreme court and district courts general jurisdiction in chancery as well as at law. But here there is nothing of the kind. All that is required, according to the doctrine of American Ins. Co. v. Canter, is that the court shall be inferior to the supreme court. Its jurisdiction may be made concurrent with that of every other court which is alike inferior to the supreme court. Section 1869 provides for appeals and writs of error from the district courts to the supreme court, but this is not at all inconsistent with authority in the Legislature of Arizona to allow like appeals and writs of error from any other inferior court it may establish. District courts are now established in all the Territories, but it is, to say the least, doubtful whether that was done by Congress in Arizona prior to the adoption of the Revised Statutes. As has already been seen, the original organic Act contained no such provision in express terms, and it is not necessary now to decide [119] what effect the extension to that Territory of the legislative enactments, etc., of New Mexico may have had on this subject. At the first session of the Territorial Legislature of Arizona in 1864 such courts were established and their jurisdiction defined. Howell, Code, chap. 45, pt. 8. At the same time the Territory was divided into three judicial districts, the judges of the supreme court assigned for district court purposes, and the times and places for holding such courts fixed. From that time until now district courts have actually existed in the Territory, and it is not now important to inquire by what particular authority. The Territorial Legislature had power before the adoption of the Revised Statutes to create courts of concurrent jurisdiction with the district courts, and this power was not taken away by the revision.

Something was said in argument about the use of the word "prescribe" in the organic Act of Arizona, and "establish" in that of Florida, but we attach no importance to this. The words are often used to express the same thing, and Webster classes them as synonyms. We are, therefore, of opinion that the Act establishing the county court is valid and that the writ should be denied. Congress has power under section 1856 of the Revised Statutes to disapprove the Act and thus render it inoperative thereafter, and it is to be presumed this will be done if in its practical operation the court shall be found to be no longer desirable. There may be now no good reason for keeping up the distinction between the power of the Territory of Arizona over its courts and that of the other Territories; but this is a subject for congressional legislation and not for judicial restraint.

The rule is discharged and the writ of habeas corpus denied.

[86] UNITED STATES, Appt.,

v.

C. S. WILSON.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 86-90.)

Bill in equity to clear title—when does not lie—legal remedy.

1. The remedy of a person having the legal title to real estate, but kept out of possession by a person holding adversely, is at law to recover the possession. Bills quia timet, to remove a cloud from a legal title, cannot be brought by one not in possession of the real estate in controversy, because the law gives a remedy by ejectment which is plain, adequate and complete.

2. Where the local statute gives the remedy by bill in equity to remove a cloud upon a legal title, without requiring the complainant to obtain prior possession, that remedy may be administered in appropriate cases by the courts of the United States, but section 5043 of the Tennessee Code, enlarging the equity jurisdiction of courts of that State, does not efface the distinction between legal and equitable rights and remedies; and if it did, it could not confer upon the courts of the United States jurisdiction in equity to try cases at common law.

3. The United States alleged in its bill that a distiller became indebted in a certain sum for taxes and penalties which were assessed on the July list for 1867; that on failure to pay the same proper steps were taken and, on March 25, 1876, the interest of the distiller in certain real estate was sold to the United States; that, there having been no redemption, the land was, on September 29, 1877, conveyed to the United States; that on January 14, 1876, the distiller, for the purpose of defrauding the United States, conveyed the property to the defendant in error. Held, under the principles above stated, that the remedy of the United States, if any, was by ejectment.

Argued April 15, 1886. Decided April 26, 1886.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Middle District of Tennessee. Affirmed.

The case is stated by the court.

Mr. Wm. A. Maury, Asst. Atty-Gen., for appellant.

No one appeared for appellee.

Mr. Justice Matthews delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a bill in equity filed by the United States, June 6, 1878, to which were made defendants the widow, personal representatives and heirs at law of E. L. Allen, deceased, and C. S. Wilson, the appellee, and John T. Gill.

The material allegations of the bill are, that in the year 1867 there was a firm of distillers in Lincoln County, Tennessee, under the name of Alexander & Co., of which E. L. Allen, since deceased, was a member; that the said [87] firm became indebted to the United States in the sum of $3,057.16 for taxes and penalties, which were duly assessed on the July list for 1867; that failing to pay the same, as required by law, the proper collector of internal revenue, on January 21, 1876, issued a distress warrant for the collection of the same which, there not being a sufficiency of goods and chattels of the firm or either of the partners, was, on January 29, 1876, levied on all the right, title, claim and interest of the said E. L. Allen, in and to certain real estate in said County of Lincoln, particularly described in the bill; that, pursuant to law, all proper notices having been previously given, the said premises were offered for sale at the court-house door, in the Town of Fayetteville, on March 25, 1876, when said lots and parcels of land were offered separately at the minimum price placed on each; and no person offering to take them or either of them at said price, the same were purchased by the United States in accordance with the statutes in such cases made and provided; that no one appearing to redeem said lands within the time provided by law, on September 29, 1877, the collector of internal revenue, then in office in said district, conveyed to the United States, by deed, under and by virtue of said assessment, distress warrant, levy, and sale, all the interest in said lands of the said Allen, of which, at the time said taxes became due and were payable, it is averred the said Allen was owner in fee, holding the legal title thereto; that, notwithstanding said taxes were a lien on said lands from the time the same became due and payable, the said Allen and the said Wilson conspired and confederated to hinder, delay and defraud the United States in the collection of said taxes, and, in pursuance of said conspiracy and confederacy, on January 14, 1876, the said Allen made a pretended sale and conveyance of said tracts of land by deed to the said Wilson; that the said deed purported on its face to be an absolute conveyance in fee, and was duly registered and recorded as such; but the same was not so in fact, there being a secret agreement between the parties thereto by which it was converted into an assignment with benefits reserved to said Allen, and was made for the purpose of hindering, delaying and defrauding the United States in the collection of said taxes; the said Allen being at the time insolvent, and the property conveyed being all his property [88] subject to execution, and the conveyance to Wilson being, therefore, an assignment of all his effects by an insolvent debtor of the United States, within the meaning of section 3466 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; that since this assignment and since the sale to the United States, the defendant Gill claims to have acquired an interest under Wilson in the said real estate.

The prayer of the bill is that the conveyance by Allen to Wilson be declared fraudulent and void; that the paramount lien of the United States in said land for the said taxes be adjudged and declared; that the priority of the United States be maintained and decreed, and the pretended conveyance of Allen to Wilson be removed as a cloud upon their title, and account for rents and profits, and a writ of possession to put the complainants in possession, and for general relief.

The defendants answered, denying the legality of the tax and its assessment, and the regularity of the steps taken for its enforcement, and the validity of the sale and conveyance to the United States, and denying all the allegations of fraud and trust in reference to the conveyance from Allen to Wilson, insisting that the same was an absolute conveyance, made in good faith and for a valuable consideration. The case was put at issue by a replication and heard upon the pleadings and proof. The circuit court, finding the preponderance of evidence against the allegation of a demand of payment of the tax, penalty and interest, as required by section 3185 of the Revised Statutes, and that the title set up by the United States had failed, dismissed the bill. From this decree the United States has appealed.

Without examining the ground on which the circuit court proceeded, we are of opinion that the bill was rightly dismissed. The case as made by it is not one of equitable cognizance. It is not a creditor's bill. The United States does not set forth a debt due and a lien on the land of the debtor which it seeks to subject to the payment of the debt by a sale and to marshal the liens thereon. The debt originally due by virtue of the assessment of the tax has been merged in the tax sale and the purchase in [89] pursuance thereof. The United States claims and, if the allegations of the bill can be supported by proof, owns the legal title to the lands described, a title paramount to that under which the appellee claims; for the deed to the United States conveys, if it is effective, the title which Allen had when the tax was assessed in July, 1867, and operates by relation from that time. Having the legal title, then, but being kept out of possession by defendants holding adversely, the remedy of the United States is at law to recover possession. Equity in such cases has no jurisdiction, unless its aid is required to remove obstacles which prevent a successful resort to an action of ejectment, or when, after repeated actions at law, its jurisdiction is invoked to prevent a multiplicity of suits, or there are other specific equitable grounds for relief. Bills quia timet, such as this is, to remove a cloud from a legal title, cannot be brought by one not in possession of the real estate in controversy, because the law gives a remedy by ejectment, which is plain, adequate and complete. This is the familiar doctrine of this court. Hipp v. Babin, 19 How. 271 [60 U. S. bk. 15, L. ed. 633]; Ellis v. Davis, 109 U. S. 485 [Bk. 27, L. ed. 1006]; Killian v. Ebbinghaus, 110 U. S. 568 [Bk. 28, L. ed. 246]; Fussell v. Gregg, 113 U. S. 550, 555 [Bk. 28, L. ed. 993, 995].

The case of Ward v. Chamberlain, 2 Black, 430, 444 [67 U. S. Bk. 17, L. ed. 319, 326], was one of a creditor's bill, where the complainant, having a lien on the real estate of the defendant, by virtue of a decree in admiralty, for the payment of money, was held, as in other cases of creditors by judgment or decree, to be entitled to the aid of a court of equity to remove a cloud upon the title which obstructed or prevented the enforcement at law of his lien. The jurisdiction is invoked in such cases because it is necessary to give to the complainant the benefit of his remedy at law, which, without it, is not plain, adequate and complete.

Where the local statute gives the remedy by a bill in equity to remove a cloud upon the legal title, without requiring the complainant to obtain prior possession, that remedy, it is admitted, may be administered in appropriate cases by the courts of the United States. Holland v. Challen, 110 U. S. 16 [Bk. 28, L. ed. 52]; Reynolds v. Crawfordsville Bank, 112 U. S. 405 [Bk. 28, L. ed. 733]; Chapman v. Brewer, 114 U. S. 158 [Bk. 29, L. ed. 83].

But there is no statute of Tennessee which gives an equitable remedy in such cases. It is [90] true, indeed, that section 5043 of the Code of Tennessee provides that the chancery court "shall have and exercise concurrent jurisdiction with the circuit court, of all civil actions triable at law, except for injuries to person, property, or character, involving unliquidated damages;" and it has been decided by the Supreme Court of that State that this gives the chancery court jurisdiction over an action of ejectment. Frazier v. Browning, 11 Lea, 253. But this does not efface the distinction between legal and equitable rights and remedies, and if it did, it could not confer upon the courts of the United States jurisdiction in equity to try cases at common law. Thompson v. Railroad Companies, 6 Wall. 134 [73 U. S. bk. 18, L. ed 765]; Basey v. Gallagher, 20 Wall. 670 [87 U. S. bk. 22, L. ed. 452].

The decree of the Circuit Court is accordingly affirmed, without prejudice to the right of the appellant to bring an action at law.

RACHEL D. NAILOR ET AL.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 127-136.)

Bill to set aside deeds—incapacity of grantor—consideration, criminal intercourse—fraud or undue influence of grantee—equity practice.

1. Unless a plaintiff in equity waives the answer under oath, the answer must be sworn to and is evidence.

2. Extreme weakness of intellect, even when not amounting to insanity, in the person executing a conveyance may be sufficient ground for setting it aside when made upon a nominal or grossly inadequate consideration. Each case however must stand on its own facts, and a review of the evidence in the present case shows that the deeds in question cannot be set aside under this principle.

3. A conveyance to a woman with whom the grantor was living in adulterous intercourse, for the benefit of the illegitimate children of the grantor and grantee, is upon a valid consideration; and the subsequent death of the children does not invalidate the conveyance, although it contained a provision that, upon that contingency, the fee should vest in the grantee.

4. In order that a deed may be set aside on the ground of undue influence, the influence must be such that the grantor has no free will but stands in vinculis.

APPEAL from the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia.

The case is stated by the court.

Messrs. Walter D. Davidge and Irving Williamson, for appellant.

Messrs. William A. Cook and C. C. Cole, for appellees.

Mr. Justice Woods delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an appeal from a decree of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, by [128] which certain deeds executed by one Allison Nailor, to Catharine Conley, the defendant and appellant, were declared null and void. The deeds were four in number, and under them the defendant claimed title to certain real estate, some of which was situate in the City of Washington, and the rest in Montgomery County, in the State of Maryland. The bill was filed by the widow and three of the four heirs of Nailor. The interest of the widow in the lands was as doweress, and her rights were conceded by the answer. Allison Nailor, Jr., the remaining heir, was made a defendant, and answered that he had received his share of his father's estate by advancement, and disclaimed any interest in the property in controversy. The litigation was, therefore, virtually between Washington T. Nailor, son, and Lizzie Trimble and Frances Clarke, married daughters of Allison Nailor, whose husbands, Matthew Trimble and James W Clarke, were joined as plaintiffs.

NOTE.—Validity of deed; insanity, drunkenness, duress, fraud, etc. See Harding v. Handy, 24 U. S. bk. 6, p. 429, note.

The pleadings and evidence showed the following facts: In the latter part of the year 1869 Allison Nailor, who was then about fifty-eight or fifty-nine years of age, was the owner of real estate in the City of Washington and in Montgomery County, Maryland, worth about $150,000, and was possessed of considerable personal estate. He had resided in the City of Washington for about fifty years. He had for many years been engaged in buying and selling real estate, in keeping a livery stable, and in farming. He was shrewd and active in business, and had the capacity for making money and accumulating property. Much of the real estate which he owned in the City of Washington he let to be used for houses of ill fame and for sale by retail of spirituous liquors. For many years prior to 1869, and at least as early as the year 1854, he had led a dissolute and intemperate life. In 1869 he made the acquaintance of the defendant, who was then about twenty-one years of age. There is no averment or proof that prior to that time she was not a virtuous woman. In November or December of that year Nailor left his family and took up his residence with the defendant, and lived with her in concubinage until his death.

[129] The deeds referred to in the bill were the following: the first was a trust deed, dated and executed November 27, 1872, more than six years before the death of Nailor, and recorded May 27, 1873, which conveyed to the defendant, Catharine Conley, a lot on South Fourteenth Street, in the City of Washington, to hold in trust for the sole and separate use of Willie Earnest Nailor, who is described in the deed as the infant son of the grantor and the grantee. By the terms of the trust the grantee was to receive the rents and profits of the lot and apply the same to the education and support of the beneficiary. When the latter became twenty-one years of age the trust was to cease, and the title in fee simple was to vest in him. But the deed provided that, should "said Willie Earnest die before he arrives at the age of twenty-one years," "or without having disposed of the said piece or parcel of ground," then the title in fee simple should vest absolutely in the defendant.

The three other deeds were all dated and executed March 29, and recorded early in April, 1878. One of these three deeds conveyed to the defendant certain other real estate in the City of Washington in trust for the sole and separate use of Mary Edna Nailor, who is described as the infant daughter of the grantor and grantee, upon trusts and uses similar to those contained in the first deed, and with a similar remainder to the defendant. The second of the three deeds conveyed to the defendant about one hundred and thirty acres of land in Montgomery County, Maryland, in trust for the benefit of the said Willie Earnest Nailor, upon trusts and uses similar to those contained in the deed of November 27, 1872, and with a similar remainder to the defendant. The last deed conveyed to the defendant, in fee simple, for her own use, about one hundred acres of land in Montgomery County, Maryland. The property conveyed by these four deeds was worth about $25,000. Willie Earnest Nailor died August 6, 1878, being nearly six years of age, and Mary Edna Nailor died August 8, 1878, being nearly two years of age. Catharine Conley, therefore, claimed title in fee simple to all the property conveyed by the four deeds above mentioned. Allison Nailor died January 6, 1879.

The bill alleged three grounds for setting the deeds aside. The first was that the grantor was "demented and insane," and mentally incapable of making the deeds; the second, that the only consideration for said deeds, "and each of them, was the illegal and criminal intercourse between said Allison Nailor, Sr., and the said Catharine Conley, and that such consideration was illegal, alike contrary to public policy and common decency;" and the third, that the deeds had been procured by fraud and the undue influence of the defendant over the grantor. The bill neither required nor waived an answer under oath, but the defendant answered under oath, traversing all the averments of the bill upon which the prayer for relief was based. We shall notice the grounds upon which the cancellation of the deeds is demanded, in the order in which we have stated them. [130]

There is a large mass of evidence in the record introduced to prove that from a long course of dissolute and intemperate habits Nailor had become insane and incapable of transacting business. On the other hand there is, in our judgment, a great preponderance of evidence to show that when he executed the deeds, though in feeble health, he was of sound mind and capable of intelligently executing and making the conveyances. It would serve no useful purpose to discuss the evidence in detail. But there are some striking facts which should be stated. Of the forty-three witnesses for the plaintiffs who testify in regard to the mental capacity of Nailor, thirty-three give their opinion from having seen him when drunk. Of these thirty-three, eighteen swear that they never saw him sober, three that they never saw him sober but once, and twelve that they seldom saw him when not intoxicated. Six other of the forty-three witnesses speak of him as incompetent to transact business when he had been drinking. Only four witnesses testify that he was incapable of doing business when sober. Three of these are plaintiffs in this case, namely: W. T. Nailor, Matthew Trimble, and James W. Clarke. W. T. Nailor testifies generally that for the last eight or ten years of his life, Allison Nailor, his father, was incapable of transacting business, and that neither on November 27, 1872, when the first deed was executed, nor on March 29, 1878, when the other three were executed, was he mentally competent to make a valid conveyance. But the same witness testifies that during the last year of his father's life he [131] took from him a thirty years' lease for certain stables in the City of Washington, at a rent of $50 per month and the taxes on the property. Matthew Trimble and James W. Clarke both swear generally; the first that for the last three years, and the other that for the last six or seven years of his life, Allison Nailor was not competent to transact such business as the disposition and conveyance of valuable property Fairly construed the testimony of these three plaintiffs may be considered to mean that, whether inebriated or not, Nailor was mentally incompetent during the latter years of his life to attend to business of moment. After Nailor left his family and went to live with the defendant, it does not appear that these witnesses had any better opportunities for observing his mental condition than many others. There is but one witness, not a plaintiff in the case, who testifies that during the time covered by the transactions set out in the bill, Nailor, if sober, was not mentally capable of making the conveyances which the bill seeks to set aside.

The question to be decided is not whether Nailor had the mental capacity to make the conveyances when he was intoxicated, but whether he was competent when sober, and whether he was sober when he executed them. On these questions the evidence does not leave us in doubt. There is abundant testimony to show that during the last six or seven years of his life, Nailor, though habitually intemperate, was often sober and free from the influence of intoxicating liquors. This fact is shown by the testimony of fourteen witnesses who swear that they had interviews with him, many of them frequently, during the time above mentioned, and found him entirely sober. Every one of these fourteen witnesses testifies to the sanity and capacity of Nailor for the transaction of business. These witnesses, a number of whom had dealings with him, assert his mental capacity in the strongest terms. Other witnesses, who did not state distinctly whether they had met him when not under the influence of drink, spoke of the soundness of his mind in the same way. Three witnesses testify that they had known Nailor, one for thirty, and the other two for forty years, and had seen and talked with [132] him while sober during the last year of his life, and they concurred in the opinion that he was at that time of sound and capable mind.

The proof of Nailor's mental capacity extended to a period after the execution of the last three deeds. The physician who was attending his two children during their last illness, and who had frequent occasion to observe him when not at all under the influence of drink, testified to the soundness of his mind.

The apparent discrepancy between the witnesses for the plaintiffs and the witnesses for the defendant on the question of Nailor's mental condition is, therefore, in a large degree reconciled by the fact that the former give their opinions of Nailor's capacity when drunk and the latter when sober. In view of all the testimony on this branch of the case, it appears that Nailor, for many years before his death, had been dissolute and intemperate, and that during the last seven or eight years of his life his health had gradually failed. Much of the time he was more or less inebriated, but he was frequently entirely sober. When drunk he was, like most other men, incompetent to transact business. When sober he was, down to his last illness, entirely capable of doing the acts which are assailed in this case. He was competent to make deeds, to understand their effect, and to know whether or not their execution would accomplish his wishes. In all conditions, he was perverse, willful, obstinate, and defiant of public opinion.

The next inquiry relates to Nailor's mental condition and capacity on the two occasions when he executed the deeds whose validity is questioned by the bill. The averment of the bill was that the deeds were made when he was intoxicated and mentally incapable. The charge that Nailor was intoxicated when the deeds were executed is without support in the evidence. So far, therefore, as it concerns the deed executed on November 27, 1872, the case must fail for want of proof; for if Nailor was then competent to make a deed when sober, the plaintiffs to succeed in overthrowing that conveyance must show that when he executed it he was not sober, and this they have not attempted to do. In respect to the three deeds of March 29, 1878, the proof of sobriety and mental capacity of Nailor when he executed them is positive and satisfactory. The deeds were signed and acknowledged by Nailor before Nicholas Callan, a notary public of Washington City. Callan testifies that he had known Nailor for more than forty years; that he had during that time done much conveyancing for him; that he had taken his acknowledgment to more than a hundred deeds; that Nailor came to his office alone, on March 29, 1878, for the purpose of signing and acknowledging the last three deeds in question; that he conversed with him; that his mental condition was good on that day; and that he was sober. The deeds were all prepared beforehand, and were brought by Nailor, who acknowledged them in the presence of the witness. [133]

This evidence is unimpeached and uncontradicted, and is conclusive. Upon the whole record, therefore, in our judgment, it plainly appears that Nailor was not intoxicated, and was mentally competent, when he executed the deeds which are the subject of this litigation.

The cases of Harding v. Handy, 11 Wheat. 103 [24 U. S. bk. 6, L. ed. 429] and Allore v. Jewell, 94 U. S. 506 [Bk. 24, L. ed. 260], are cited by the plaintiffs' counsel as authorities in law against this conclusion These cases establish the proposition that extreme weakness of intellect, even when not amounting to insanity, in the person executing a conveyance, may be sufficient ground for setting it aside when made upon a nominal or grossly inadequate consideration. Conceding the correctness of this legal proposition, it can have no application to the present case, unless the facts are substantially the same. A cursory reading of the cases will show such a palpable difference in the facts as to make it clear that they cannot be taken as controlling authority in this. Cases like the present must each stand upon its own facts; and when the testimony shows that the grantor was sober and capable and well knew what he was doing when he executed the deed, no other case materially differing in its facts can furnish a reason for setting aside the deed thus executed.

The next ground alleged in the bill for annulling the deeds was that the only consideration for their execution was the illegal and [134] criminal intercourse between Nailor and the defendant. There is no averment that the deeds were given in consideration of future criminal intercourse. The criminal intercourse averred must, therefore, be construed to mean past intercourse. Without pausing to consider whether or not past criminal intercourse is a sufficient consideration to support a deed, it is enough, upon this branch of the case, to say that the averment is without support by any testimony in the record. On the contrary, the deeds recite a valuable consideration, and the averment of the bill is flatly denied by the answer of the defendant made under oath. The answer, though not called for under oath, is evidence in behalf of the defendant. For, if a plaintiff in equity is unwilling that the answer should be evidence against him, he must expressly waive the oath of the defendant in his bill. See amendment to 41st Equity Rule. If he fails to do this the answer must be given under oath, and is evidence. This branch, therefore, of the plaintiffs' case breaks down, because all the testimony in the record upon the question of consideration is against the averment of the bill.

But it should be noted here that three of the four deeds assailed by the bill were made by Nailor mainly for the benefit of the two children whose father he declared himself to be. The interest of the defendant in the property conveyed was remote and contingent. If the deeds were valid when executed, the subsequent death of the children could not avoid them. It is not now open to question that a deed made by a father for the benefit of his illegitimate child is upon good consideration, which will support the conveyance. Gay v. Parpart, 106 U. S. 679 [Bk. 27, L. ed. 256]; Bunn v. Winthrop, 1 Johns. Ch. 329; Hook v. Pratt, 78 N. Y. 371; Marchioness of Annandale v. Harris, 2 P. Wms. 432; Jennings v. Brown, 9 Mees. & W. 496.

The next and last ground alleged for annulling the deeds is that Nailor was induced to make them by the fraud and undue influence of the defendant. The ground upon which courts of equity grant relief in such cases is that one party, by improper means and practices, has gained an unconscionable advantage over another. The undue influence for which a will or deed will be annulled must be such that the party making it has no free will, but stands [135] in vinculis. "It must amount to force or coercion, destroying free agency." Stule v. Schaeffle, 16 Jur. 909. See also Williams v. Goude, 1 Hagg. Eccl. 577; Armstrong v. Huddleston, 1 Moore, P. C. 478. In Eckert v. Flowry, 43 Pa. St. 46, it was said by Strong, J.: "Now, that is undue influence which amounts to constraint, which substitutes the will of another for that of the testator. It may be either through threats or fraud; but however exercised, it must, in order to avoid a will, destroy the free agency of the testator at the time when the instrument is made." The rule upon this subject was thus stated in Davis v. Calvert, 5 Gill & J. 302: "A testator shall enjoy full liberty and freedom in the making of his will and possess the power to withstand all contradiction and control. That degree, therefore, of importunity or undue influence which deprives a testator of his free agency, which is such as he is too weak to resist and will render the instrument not his free and unconstrained act, is sufficient to invalidate it."

Tested by these rules, the charge that the deeds in question were procured by the fraud and undue influence of the defendant is without support. On this branch of the case the plaintiffs have taken pains to prove that the defendant treated Nailor with great kindness and with unremitting attention to his wants and comforts, but they have shown nothing else. There is an absence of proof that the defendant used either threats, stratagem, importunity, or persuasion to induce Nailor to execute the deeds. In fact there is no evidence that the defendant even requested him to make them. On the other hand, the proof is abundant that the making of a provision for the children whom the defendant had borne him had long been his cherished purpose. As early as 1872, soon after the birth of his son Willie, he executed the first deed. In December, 1877, he executed a will for the sole purpose of providing for the two children then living, borne him by the defendant, and for the defendant. Afterwards, conceiving that a provision by will was not as secure as one by deed, he executed the deeds in question, in which he made precisely the same disposition of the property that he had previously made by the will. The proof shows that [136] he took great pleasure in what he had done or what he proposed to do for these children. It was a matter of which he often boasted to his friends and acquaintances. In short, the evidence that the making of the deeds was his own act, and not the act of another, is clear and is uncontradicted. Conceding, therefore, as it is contended by plaintiffs' counsel, that when a will or deed is made while the parties are living in illegal sexual relations, it is open to suspicion of fraud and undue influence, the plaintiffs have failed by any testimony whatever to show that the deeds in question were procured by either. On the contrary, it is shown that the making of the deeds was the result of Nailor's free volition.

As none of the grounds alleged for annulling the deeds have been maintained, the decree of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia must be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to dismiss the bill; and it is so ordered.

Argued April 15, 1886. Decided April 26, 1886.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Georgia.

The case is stated by the court.

Mr. H. B. Tompkins, for plaintiffs in error.

No counsel appeared for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Matthews delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action at law, begun by the defendant in error, in a magistrate's court in Chatham [91] County, Georgia, against the plaintiffs in error, to recover $93.16, claimed to be due under the pilotage laws of Georgia, for inward pilotage on account of the steamer Saxon, of which the defendants were owners, the vessel having been spoken by the pilot while she was bearing toward the Port of Savannah, and his services offered outside of Tybee Bar, and refused, the vessel having arrived in port piloted by another Savannah pilot, who spoke her and entered on the discharge of his duties as pilot on the same day, but subsequently to the tender by the plaintiff below of his services.

There was a judgment in favor of the plaint- [92] iff below in the magistrate's court for the amount claimed, which was reversed on appeal by the Superior Court of Chatham County, which judgment was in its turn reversed by the Supreme Court of Georgia, which ordered judgment to be entered for the plaintiff below. To reverse this judgment this writ of error is brought.

The case was submitted and decided upon an agreed statement of facts, as follows:

"It is agreed between the parties to the above entitled cause that the same shall be tried on appeal in the Superior Court of Chatham County on the following state of facts before the court, without a jury: that the steamship Saxon is a licensed coastwise steam vessel engaged in the trade between Philadelphia and Savannah, and belongs to Spraigue, Soullee & Co.; that on the 9th day of August, 1881, she was engaged in a voyage from Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, to Savannah, Georgia, and that S. W. Snow was her master; that said master was duly licensed, under title 52 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as master of a steam vessel, and as a pilot also, but that his certificate as pilot did not include Tybee Bar and Savannah River, but that his certificate was for the Atlantic coast, and that his certificate as master and pilot was issued last November.

"That said steamship 'Saxon' was spoken by plaintiff off Cape Roman on the 9th day of August, 1881, and his services were tendered to said master of said steamship 'Saxon' as a pilot for Savannah River and Tybee Bar, and that at the time his said services were offered there was no pilot for Tybee Bar or Savannah River on board said steamship, and that said plaintiff was the first pilot who spoke said vessel on her said trip to Savannah. It was further admitted by counsel at the hearing that Philadelphia was the home port of said steamer 'Saxon,' and that the captains and masters of the Ocean Steamship Company steamers, whose home port is Savannah, have each a license from the United States authorities at Savannah to pilot their vessels up and down the Savannah River over and from the bar to the city; that said pilot was duly commissioned by the commissioners of pilotage for the Savannah River and Tybee Bar, and was also duly commissioned by the United States inspectors to conduct steam vessels over Tybee Bar and up Savannah River and within that limit; that Thompson went out [93] to meet the 'Saxon,' being advised of her departure from Philadelphia, and his services were refused; that the defendant had procured the services of Walter W. Smith, a pilot who was duly licensed for the Savannah River and Tybee Bar by the commissioners of pilotage, and who was also duly licensed by the United States to conduct steam vessels over Tybee Bar and up Savannah River, and had notified the captain of said steamship 'Saxon' to stop at the Martin's Industry Lightship and take said Walter W. Smith on board to pilot said steamship over Tybee Bar and up Savannah River; that said Walter W. Smith was employed as the regular pilot of steamer 'Saxon' and was under pay from the time said vessel left Philadelphia; that said pilot was taken on board said steamship on 10th day of August off the Martin's Industry Lightship, and he piloted the said vessel to the City of Savannah and has continued in the employ of said vessel from that time until the present time as pilot. That Cape Roman is on the South Carolina coast, north of Charleston, and that Martin's Industry Lightship is north of Tybee Bar and off the South Carolina coast. That Walter W. Smith was in Savannah when The Saxon left Philadelphia, and was not piloting The Saxon when she was spoken by the plaintiff, but met her afterwards and was taken. That said steamship Saxon drew seventeen feet six inches of water, and that according to rates of pilotage for Tybee Bar and River of Savannah $93.17 was a proper charge for piloting a vessel of such draft up to Savannah City."

The claim of the defendant in error for pilotage, arising upon the foregoing case, is based on section 1512 of the Code of Georgia, which is as follows:

"Any person, master, or commander of a ship or vessel bearing toward any of the ports or harbors of this State, except coasters in this State, and between the ports of this State and those of South Carolina, and between the ports of this State and those of Florida, and who refuses to receive a pilot on board, shall be liable, [94] on his arrival in such port in this State, to pay the first pilot who may have offered his services outside the bar, and exhibited his license as a pilot, if demanded by the master, the full rates of pilotage established by law for such vessel."

And the claim is undoubtedly well founded, if this provision of the state law is enforceable consistently with the Constitution of the United States, and the Acts of Congress on the same subject passed in pursuance thereof.

It is therefore contended by the plaintiffs in error that this provision of the Georgia Code is invalid, on the ground that it is inconsistent with the laws of the United States regulating the same subject.

Section 4235, R. S., enacts that, "Until fur ther provision is made by Congress, all pilots in the bays, inlets, rivers, harbors and ports of the United States shall continue to be regulated in conformity with the existing laws of the States respectively wherein such pilots may be, or with such laws as the States may respectively enact for the purpose;" but it is also enacted by section 4237, R. S., that,

"No regulations or provisions shall be adopted by any State which shall make any discrimination in the rate of pilotage or half pilotage between vessels sailing between the ports of one State and vessels sailing between the ports of different States, or any discrimination against vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, or against national vessels of the United States; and all existing regulations or provisions making any such discrimination are annulled and abrogated."

The section of the Georgia Code, above quoted, does contain such discriminations as are prohibited by section 4237, R. S. It excepts from its operation "coasters in this State," and "between the ports of this State and those of South Carolina," and "between the ports of this State and those of Florida."

It was held, however, by the Supreme Court of Georgia, in the case now before us, that so much of the section as makes these illegal exceptions may be disregarded, so that the rest of the section as thus read may stand, upon the principle that a separable part of a statute which is unconstitutional may be rejected, and the remainder preserved and enforced. But the insuperable difficulty with the application [95] of that principle of construction to the present instance is, that by rejecting the exceptions intended by the Legislature of Georgia the statute is made to enact what confessedly the Legislature never meant. It confers upon the statute a positive operation, beyond the legislative intent and beyond what anyone can say it would have enacted in view of the illegality of the exceptions. We are, therefore, constrained to hold that the provisions of section 1512 of the Code of Georgia cannot be separated so as to reject the unconstitutional exceptions merely, and that the whole section must be treated as annulled and abrogated by section 4237 of the Revised Statutes.

We are also of opinion that the claim for pilotage in the present case is defeated by other provisions of the Revised Statutes. Section 4401 provides that "all coastwise sea-going vessels and vessels navigating the great lakes shall be subject to the navigation laws of the United States, when navigating within the jurisdiction thereof; and all vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam and navigating as aforesaid, shall be subject to all rules and regulations established in pursuance of law for the government of steam vessels in passing, as provided by this title; and every coastwise, sea-going, steam vessel subject to the navigation laws of the United States, and to the rules and regulations aforesaid, not sailing under register, shall, when under way, except on the high seas, be under the control and direction of pilots licensed by the inspectors of steamboats."

And section 4444 is as follows:

"No state or municipal government shall impose upon pilots of steam vessels any obligation to procure a state or other license in addition to that issued by the United States, or any other regulation which will impede such pilots in the performance of the duties required by this title; nor shall any pilot charges be levied by any such authority upon any steamer piloted as provided by this title; and in no case shall the fees charged for the pilotage of any steam vessel exceed the customary or legally established rates in the State where the same is performed. Nothing in this title shall be construed to annul or affect any regulation established by the laws of any State requiring vessels [96] entering or leaving a port in any such State, other than coastwise, steam vessels, to take a pilot duly licensed or authorized by the laws of any such State, or of a State situate upon the waters of such State."

According to the agreed case The Saxon was a coastwise, sea-going, steam vessel, was not sailing under register, and at the time when the defendant in error tendered his services, and subsequently when she passed up the river into Savannah, was under the control and direction of a pilot licensed by the United States inspectors of steamboats. She was therefore, at the time, piloted as provided by that title of the statute, so that she was lawfully exempt from any pilot charges levied by any state or municipal government. The section expressly excepts coastwise, steam vessels from the regulations established by the laws of any State requiring vessels entering or leaving a port in any such State, to take a pilot duly licensed or authorized by the laws of any such State, or of a State situate upon the waters of such State. The owners of The Saxon were, therefore, at liberty to employ any pilot, licensed under the authority of the United States, for the particular service in which he was engaged, without regard to the provisions of the Georgia Code requiring it to accept the services of the pilot first tendered or, in case of refusal, to pay pilotage therefor. The engagement of the services of the pilot actually taken, by previous contract, was equivalent to keeping him on board for that purpose during the whole voyage, as he was, in fact, under pay from its commencement; and had he been actually on board at the time the defendant in error tendered himself as pilot, we think the right of the vessel to reject the offer could not have been reasonably questioned.

For these reasons the judgment of the Supreme Court of Georgia is reversed and the cause is remanded, with instructions to take further proceedings therein according to law and in conformity with this opinion.

Validity of state taxation of railroad corporations—constitutional provisions—fences not a part of roadbed or roadway—separability of assessment of different kinds of property.

1. Where judgment was sought for an entire tax arising upon an assessment of different kinds of property as a unit, such assessment including property not legally assessable and the part of the tax assessed against the latter property not being separable from the other part, the assessment was invalid and would not support an action for the recovery of the entire tax.

2. The fences along the line of a railway are not a part of the roadbed or roadway of such railroad, within the meaning of the constitution and laws of California authorizing the state board of equalization of that State to assess the property of certain classes of the railway corporations having roads in that State.

3. A corporation is not in default in not tendering such sum as may be legally due for taxes, when the different classes of property assessed are not distinct and separable.

4. The provision of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which forbids a State to deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the law, applies to corporations.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of California. Affirmed.

The case is stated by the court.

Announcement by Mr. Chief Justice Waite:

The court does not wish to hear argument on the question whether the provision in the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution, which forbids a State to deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws, applies to these Corporations. We are all of opinion that it does.

Messrs. D. M. Delmas, A. L. Rhodes and E. C. Marshall for plaintiffs in error.

Messrs. S. W. Sanderson, George F. Edmunds and Wm. M. Evarts, for defendants in error.

These several actions were brought—the first one in the Superior Court of Santa Clara County, California, the others in the Superior Court of Fresno County, in the same State—for the recovery of certain county and state taxes, claimed to be due from the Southern Pacific Railroad Company and the Central Pacific Railroad Company, under assessments made by the state board of equalization upon their respective franchises, roadways, roadbeds, rails, and rolling stock. In the action by Santa Clara County the amount claimed is $13,866.53 for the fiscal year of 1882. For that sum, with 5 per cent penalty, interest at the rate of 2 per cent per month from December 27, 1882, cost of advertising, and 10 per cent for attorney's fees, judgment is asked against the Southern Pacific Railroad Company. In the other action against the same Company the amount claimed is $5,029.27 for the fiscal year of 1881, with 5 per cent added for nonpayment of taxes and costs of collection. In the action against the Central Pacific Railroad Company judgment is asked for $25,950.50 for the fiscal year of 1881, with like penalty and costs of collection. [398]

The answer in each case puts in issue all the material allegations of the complaint, and sets up various special defenses, to which reference will be made further on.

With its answer the defendant, in each case, filed a petition, with a proper bond, for the removal of the action into the Circuit Court of the United States for the district, as one arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States. The right of removal was recognized by the state court, and the action proceeded in the circuit court. Each case, the parties having filed a written stipulation waiving a jury, was tried by the court. There was a special finding of facts upon which judgment was entered in each case for the defendant. The general question to be determined is whether the judgment can be sustained upon all or either of the grounds upon which the defendants rely.

The case as made by the pleadings and the special finding of facts is as follows:

By an Act of Congress, approved July 27, 1866, the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company was created, with power to construct and maintain, by certain designated routes, a continuous railroad and telegraph line from Springfield, Missouri, to the Pacific. For the purpose—which is avowed by Congress—of facilitating the construction of the line, and thereby securing the safe and speedy transportation of mails, troops, munitions of war, and public stores, a right of way over the public domain was given to the company, and a liberal grant of the public lands was made to it. The railroad so to be constructed and every part of it was declared to be a post route and military road, subject to the use of the United States for postal, military, naval and all other government service, and to such regulations as Congress might impose for restricting the charges for government transportation. By the 18th section of the Act, the Southern Pacific Railroad Company—a corporation previously organized under a general statute of California, passed May 20, 1861, Stat. Cal. 1861, p. 607—was authorized to connect with the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad at such point, near the boundary line of that State, as the former company deemed most [399] suitable for a railroad to San Francisco, with "uniform gauge and rate of freight or fare with said road;" and in consideration thereof, and "to aid in its construction" the Act declared that it should have similar grants of land, "subject to all the conditions and limitations" provided in said Act of Congress, "and shall be required to construct its road on like regulations, as to time and manner, with the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad." 14 Stat. at L. p. 292, §§ 1, 2, 3, 11, 18.

In November, 1866, the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company and the Southern Pacific Railroad Company filed in the office of the Secretary of the Interior their respective acceptances of the Act.

By an Act of the Legislature of California, passed April 4, 1870, to aid in giving effect to the Act of Congress relating to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, it was declared that,

"To enable the said company to more fully and completely comply with and perform the requirements, provisions and conditions of the said Act of Congress, and all other Acts of Congress now in force, or which may hereafter be enacted, the State of California hereby consents to said Act; and the said company, its successors and assigns, are hereby authorized to change the line of its railroad so as to reach the eastern boundary line of the State of California by such route as the company shall determine to be the most practicable, and to file new and amendatory articles of association; and the right, power, and privilege is hereby granted to, conferred upon, and vested in them to construct, maintain, and operate by steam or other power the said railroad and telegraph line mentioned in said Acts of Congress, hereby confirming to, and vesting in the said company, its successors and assigns, all the rights, privileges, franchises, power and authority conferred [400] upon, granted to, or vested in said company by the said Acts of Congress, and any Act of Congress which may be hereafter enacted."

Subsequently, by the Act of March 3, 1871, Congress incorporated the Texas Pacific Railroad Company, with power to construct and maintain a continuous railroad and telegraph line from Marshall in the State of Texas, to a point at or near El Paso, thence through New Mexico and Arizona to San Diego, pursuing as near as might be the thirty-second parallel of latitude. To aid in its construction, Congress gave it also, the right of way over the public domain, and made to it a liberal grant of public lands. The 19th section provided:

"That the Texas Pacific Railroad Company shall be, and it is hereby declared to be, a military and post road; and for the purpose of insuring the carrying of the mails, troops, munitions of war, supplies, and stores of the United States, no act of the company nor any law of any State or Territory shall impede, delay or prevent the said company from performing its obligations to the United States in that regard; Provided, That said road shall be subject to the use of the United States for postal, military, and all other governmental services, at fair and reasonable rates of compensation, not to exceed the price paid by private parties for the same kind of service; and the Government shall at all times have the preference in the use of the same for the purpose aforesaid."

The twenty-third section of that Act has special reference to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, and is as follows:

"Sec. 23. That, for the purpose of connecting the Texas Pacific Railroad with the City of San Francisco, the Southern Pacific Railroad Company of California is hereby authorized (subject to the laws of California) to construct a line of railroad from a point at or near Tehachapa Pass, by way of Los Angeles, to the Texas Pacific Railroad at or near the Colorado River, with the same rights, grants and privileges, and subject to the same limitations, restrictions and conditions, as were granted to said Southern Pacific Railroad Company of California by the Act of July twenty-seven, eighteen hundred and sixty-six; Provided, however, That this section shall in no way affect or impair the rights, present or prospective, of [401] the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company, or any other company."

Under the authority of this legislation, federal and state, the Southern Pacific Railroad Company constructed a line of railroad from San Francisco, connecting with the Texas and Pacific Railroad (formerly the Texas Pacific Railroad) at Sierra Blanca, in Texas; and with other railroads it is operated as one continuous line (except for that part of the route occupied by the Central Pacific Railroad) from Marshall, Texas, to San Francisco. It is stated in the record that the Southern Pacific Railroad Company of California, since the commencement of this action, has completed its road to the Colorado River, at or near The Needles, to connect with the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad; and that with the latter road it constitutes a continuous line from Springfield, Missouri, to the Pacific, except as to the connection, for a relatively short distance, over the road of the Central Pacific Railroad Company.

On the 17th of December, 1877, the said Southern Pacific Railroad Company and other railroad corporations, then existing under the laws of California, were legally consolidated, and a new corporation thereby formed, under the name of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, the present defendant in error, 59.30 miles of whose road is in Santa Clara County and 17.98 miles in Fresno County.

On the first of April, 1875, this Company was indebted to divers persons in large sums of money advanced to construct and equip its road. To secure that indebtedness, it executed on that day a mortgage for $32,520,000 on its road, franchises, rolling stock and appurtenances, and on a large number of tracts of land, in different counties of California, aggregating over eleven million acres. These lands were granted to the Company by Congress under the above mentioned Acts, and are used for agricultural, grazing and other purposes not connected with the business of the railroad. Of those patented, 3,138 acres are in Santa Clara County, and 18,789 acres in Fresno County. When these proceedings were instituted no part of its above mortgage debt had been paid, except the accruing interest and [402] $1,632,000 of the principal, leaving outstanding against it $30,898,000.

In the year 1852 California, by legislative enactment, granted a right of way through that State to the United States for the purpose of constructing a railroad from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean, declaring that the interests of California, as well as the whole Union, "require the immediate action of the Government of the United States, for the construction of a national thoroughfare, connecting the navigable waters of the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, for the purpose of the national safety, in the event of war, and to promote the highest commercial interests of the Republic." Stat. Cal. 1852, p. 150. By an Act passed July 1, 1862, Congress incorporated the Union Pacific Railroad Company, with power to construct and maintain a continuous railroad and telegraph line to the western boundary of what was then Nevada Territory, "there to meet and connect with the line of the Central Pacific Railroad Company of California." 12 Stat. at L. 489, §§ 1, 8. The declared object of extending government aid to these enterprises was to effect the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific, which, for all purposes of communication, travel and transportation, so far as the public and the General Government are concerned, should be operated "as one connected, continuous line." Id. §§ 6, 9, 10, 12, 17, 18.

In 1864 the State of California passed an Act to aid in carrying out the provisions of this Act of Congress, the first section of which declared that,

"To enable said Company more fully and completely to comply with and perform the provisions and conditions of said Act of Congress, the said Company, their successors and assigns, are hereby authorized and empowered, and the right, power and privilege is hereby granted to, conferred upon, and vested in them, to construct, maintain and operate the said railroad and telegraph line, not only in the State of California, but also in the said Territories lying east of and between said State and the Missouri River, with such branches and extensions of said railroad and telegraph line, or either of them, as said Company may deem necessary or proper, and also the right of way for said railroad and telegraph line over any lands belonging to this State, and on, over, and along any [403] streets, roads, highways, rivers, streams, water and water courses; but the same to be so constructed as not to obstruct or destroy the passage or navigation of the same; and also the right to condemn and appropriate to the use of said Company such private property, rights, privileges and franchises as may be proper, necessary or convenient for the purposes of said railroad and telegraph; the compensation therefor to be ascertained and paid under and by special proceedings, as prescribed in the Act providing for the incorporation of railroad companies, approved May 20, 1861, and the Act supplementary and amendatory thereof; said Company to be subject to all the laws of this State concerning railroad and telegraph lines, except that messages and property of the United States, of this State, and of said Company shall have priority of transportation and transmission over said line of railroad and telegraph, hereby confirming to and vesting in said Company all the rights, privileges, franchises, power and authority Conferred upon, granted to, and vested in said Company by said Act of Congress, hereby repealing all laws and parts of laws inconsistent or in conflict with the provisions of this Act, or the rights and privileges herein granted."

In 1870, the Central Pacific Railroad Company of California and the Western Pacific Railroad Company formed themselves into one corporation under the name of the Central Pacific Railroad Company, the defendant in one of these actions, 61.06 miles of whose road is in Fresno County. The Company complied with the several Acts of Congress, and there is in operation a continuous line of railway from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, the Central Pacific Railroad Company owning and operating the portion thereof between Ogden, in the Territory of Utah, and San Francisco.

When the present action was instituted against this Company the United States had and now have a lien, created by the Acts of Congress of 1862 and 1864, for $30,000,000, with a large amount of interest, upon its road, rolling stock, fixtures, and franchises; and there were also outstanding bonds for a like amount issued by the Company prior to January 1, 1875, and secured by a mortgage upon the same property.

Such were the relations which these two Companies held to the United States and to the [404] State when the assessments in question were made for purposes of taxation.

It is necessary now to refer to those provisions of the Constitution and laws of the State which, it is claimed, sustain these assessments.

The Constitution of California, adopted in 1879, exempts from taxation growing crops, property used exclusively for public schools, and such as may belong to the United States, or to that State, or to any of her county or municipal corporations, and declares that the Legislature "may provide, except in the case of credits secured by mortgage or trust deed, for a reduction from credits of debts due to bona fide residents" of the State. It is provided in the first section of Article XIII that, with these exceptions,

"All property in the State, not exempt under the laws of the United States, shall be taxed in proportion to its value, to be ascertained as provided by law. The word 'property,' as used in this article and section, is hereby declared to include moneys, credits, bonds, stocks, dues, franchises, and all other matters and things, real, personal and mixed, capable of private ownership."

The fourth section of the same article provides:

"A mortgage, deed of trust, contract, or other obligation by which a debt is secured, shall, for the purposes of assessment and taxation, be deemed and treated as an interest in the property affected thereby. Except as to railroad and other quasi public corporations, in case of debts so secured, the value of the property affected by such mortgage, deed of trust, contract, or obligation, less the value of such security, shall be assessed and taxed to the owner of the property, and the value of such security shall be assessed and taxed to the owner thereof, in the county, city, or district in which the property affected thereby is situate. The taxes so levied shall be a lien upon the property and security, and may be paid by either party to such security; if paid by the owner of the security, the tax so levied upon the property affected thereby shall become a part of the debt so secured, if the owner of the property shall pay the tax so levied on such security, it shall constitute a payment thereon, and, to the extent of such payment, a full discharge thereof; Provided, That if any such security or indebtedness [405] shall be paid by any such debtor or debtors, after assessment and before the tax levy, the amount of such levy may likewise be retained by such debtor or debtors, and shall be computed according to the tax levy of the preceding year."

The ninth section makes provision for the election of a state board of equalization, "whose duty it shall be to equalize the valuation of the taxable property of the several counties in the State for the purpose of taxation." The boards of supervisors of the several counties constitute boards of equalization for their respective counties, and they equalize the valuation of the taxable property therein for purposes of taxation—assessments, whether by the state or county boards, to "conform to the true value in money of the property" contained in the assessment roll. Id. § 9.

The tenth section declares:

"All property, except as hereinafter in this section provided, shall be assessed in the county, city, city and county, town, township, or district in which it is situated, in the manner prescribed by law. The franchise, roadway, roadbed, rails and rolling stock of all railroads operated in more than one county in this State shall be assessed by the State Board of Equalization at their actual value, and the same shall be apportioned to the counties, cities and counties, cities, towns, townships and districts in which such railroads are located, in proportion to the number of miles of railway laid in such counties, cities and counties, cities, towns, townships, and districts."

The assessments in question, it is contended, were made in conformity with these constitutional provisions, and with what is known as section 3664 of the Political Code of California. That section made it the duty of the state board of equalization, on or before the first Monday in May in each year to "assess the franchise, roadway, roadbed, rails, and rolling stock of railroads operated in more than one county"—to which class belonged the defendants. It required every corporation of that class, by certain officers, or by such officer as the state board should designate, to furnish the board with a sworn statement showing, among other things, in detail, for the year ending March first, the whole number of miles of railway owned, operated, or leased by it in the State, the value thereof per mile, and all of its property of every kind, [406] located in the State; the number and value of its engines, passenger, mail, express, baggage, freight, and other cars, or property used in operating and repairing its railway in the State, and on railways which are parts of lines extending beyond the limits of the State. It is also directed that "the said property shall be assessed at its actual value;" that the "assessment shall be made upon the entire railway within the State, and shall include the right of way, road bed, track, bridges, culverts, and rolling stock;" and that "the depots, station grounds, shops, buildings, and gravel beds shall be assessed by the assessors of the county where situated, as other property." It further declares:

"On or before the fifteenth day of May, in each year, said board shall transmit to the county assessor of each county through which any railway, operated in more than one county, may run, a statement showing the length of the main track or tracks of such railway within the county, together with a description of the whole of said tracks within the county, including the right of way by metes and bounds, or other description sufficient for identification, and the assessed value per mile of the same, as fixed by a pro rata distribution per mile of the assessed value of the whole franchise, roadway, roadbed, rails and rolling stock of such railway within this State. Said statement shall be entered on the assessment roll of the county. At the first meeting of the board of supervisors, after such statement is received by the county assessor, they shall make and cause to be entered in the proper record book an order stating and declaring the length of the main track, and the assessed value of such railway lying in each city, town, township, school district, or lesser taxing district in their county through which such railway runs, as fixed by the state board of equalization, which shall constitute the taxable value of said property for taxable purposes in such city, town, township, school, road, or other district."

These Companies, within due time, filed with the state board the detailed statement required by that section.

At the trials below, no record of assessment against the respective defendants, as made by the state board, was given in evidence, and there was introduced no written evidence of [407] the assessment except an official communication from the state board to each of the assessors of Santa Clara and Fresno Counties, called, in the special findings, the assessment roll for the particular county. The roll for Fresno County, in 1881, relating to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, is as follows:*

There were similar rolls in reference to the [408] Central Pacific Railroad in the same county, for the same year, and the Southern Pacific in Santa Clara County for 1882. For each of those years the board of supervisors of the respective counties made an apportionment of the taxes among the legal subdivisions of such counties.

It is stated in the findings that the delinquent lists for those years, so far as they related to the taxes in question, were duly made up in form corresponding with the original assessment roll; that in pursuance of section 3788 of the Political Code of California, the board of supervisors of the respective counties duly passed an order, entered on the minutes, dispensing with the duplicate assessment roll for that year; that the controller of the State transmitted a letter to the tax collector of the county, in pursuance of the provisions of section 3899 of that Code, directing him to offer the property for sale bnt once, and if there were no bona fide purchasers, to withdraw it from sale; that the tax collector, in obedience to the provisions of that section, transmitted to the controller, with his indorsement thereon of the action had in the premises, a certified copy of the entry upon the delinquent

Southern Pacific Railroad Company	Office of The State Board of Equalization, Sacramento, May 14, 1881. To W. H. McKenzie, Assessor of Fresno County. SIR: The State Board of Equalization on the 2d day of May, 1881, assessed for the year 1881, the Southern Pacific Railroad Company for its franchise, roadway, roadbed, rails, and rolling stock, in the State of California, in the aggregate sum of $11,739,915. The entire line of main track of said railroad of said company in the said State is 711.51 miles. The length of the main track of said railway in Fresno County is 17.96 miles. The description of the whole of the main track of the railway of the said Southern Pacific Railroad Company, and the right of way for the same, in the County of Fresno, is as follows: Beginning at the Town of Huron and running easterly in the direction of Goshen, in Tulare County, to the east line of Fresno County. The assessed value per mile of said railway, as fixed by a pro rata distribution per mile of the assessed value of the whole franchise, roadway, roadbed, rails, and rolling stock of such railway of the said company within this State is $16,500. The apportionment of the assessment of the said franchise, roadway, roadbeds, rails, and rolling stock, by this board, for and to Fresno County, is $295,845. Warren Dutton, Chairman, M. M. Drew, D. list relating to the tax in question in these several actions; that such indorsement shows that the tax collector had offered the property for sale and had withdrawn it because there was no purchaser for the same; and that the controller, in pursuance of the provisions of the same section, transmitted to the tax collector of the county a letter directing him to bring suit.

In each case there were also the following findings:

"The state board of equalization, in assessing said value of said property to and against defendant, assessed the full cash value of said railroad, roadway, roadbed, rails, rolling stock and franchises, without deducting therefrom the value of the mortgage, or any part thereof, given and existing thereon as aforesaid, to secure the indebtedness of said company to the holders of said bonds, notwithstanding they had full knowledge of the existence of the said mortgage; and in making said assessment the said state board of equalization did not consider or treat said mortgage as an interest in said [409] property, but assessed the whole value thereof to the defendant, in the same manner as if there had been no mortgage thereon."

"The state board of equalization, in making the supposed assessment of said roadway of defendant, did knowingly and designedly include in the valuation of said roadway the value of fences erected upon the line between said roadway and the land of coterminous proprietors. Said fences were valued at $300 per mile."

The special grounds of defense by each of the defendants were: 1. That its road is a part of a continuous postal and military route, constructed and maintained under the authority of the United States, by means in part obtained from the General Government; that the Company having, with the consent of the State, become subject to the requirements, conditions, and provisions of the Acts of Congress, it thereby ceased to be merely a state corporation, and became one of the agencies or instrumentalities employed by the General Government to execute its constitutional powers; and that the franchise to operate a postal and military route, for the transportation of troops, munitions of war, public stores, and the mails, being derived from the United States, cannot, without their consent, be subjected to state taxation. 2. That the provisions of the Constitution and laws of California, in respect to the assessment for taxation of the property of railway corporations operating railroads in more than one county, are in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution, in so far as they require the assessment of their property at its full money value, without making deduction, as in the case of railroads operated in one county, and of other corporations, and of natural persons, for the value of the mortgages covering the property assessed; thus imposing upon the defendant unequal burdens, and to that extent denying to it the equal protection of the laws. 3. That what is known as section 3664 of the Political Code of California, under the authority of which in part the assessment was made, was not constitutionally enacted by the Legislature, and had not the force of law. 4. That no valid assessment appears in fact to have been made by the state board. 5. That [410] no interest is recoverable in this action until after judgment. 6. That the assessment upon which the action is based is void, because it included property which the state board of equalization had no jurisdiction, under any circumstances, to assess, and that, as such illegal part was so blended with the balance that it cannot be separated, the entire assessment must be treated as a nullity.

The record contains elaborate opinions stating the grounds upon which judgments were ordered for the defendants. Mr. Justice Field overruled the first of the special defenses above named, but sustained the second. The circuit judge, in addition, held that section 3664 of the Political Code had not been passed in the mode required by the State Constitution, and, consequently, was no part of the law of California. These opinions are reported as The Santa Clara Railroad Tax Case, in 9 Sawyer, 165, 210.

The propositions embodied in the conclusions reached in the circuit court were discussed with marked ability by counsel who appeared in this court for the respective parties. Their importance cannot well be overestimated; for they not only involve a construction of the recent amendments to the National Constitution in their application to the constitution and the legislation of a State, but upon their determination, if it were necessary to consider them, would depend the system of taxation devised by that State for raising revenue, from certain corporations, for the support of her government. These questions belong to a class which this court should not decide, unless their determination is essential to the disposal of the case in which they arise. Whether the present cases require a decision of them depends upon the soundness of another proposition, upon which the court below, in view of its conclusions upon other issues, did not deem it necessary to pass. We allude to the claim of the defendant, in each case, that the entire assessment is a nullity, upon the ground that the state board of equalization included therein property which it was without jurisdiction to assess for taxation.

The argument in behalf of the defendant is: That the state board knowingly and designedly included in its assessment of "the franchise, roadway, roadbed, rails, and rolling stock" of [411] each Company, the value of the fences erected upon the line between its roadway and the land of coterminous proprietors; that the fences did not constitute a part of such roadway, and therefore could only be assessed for taxation by the proper officer of the several counties in which they were situated; and that an entire assessment which includes property not assessable by the state board against the party assessed is void and, therefore, insufficient to support an action, at least, when—and such is claimed to be the case here—it does not appear, with reasonable certainty, from the face of the assessment or otherwise, what part of the aggregate valuation represents the property so illegally included therein.

If these positions are tenable, there will be no occasion to consider the grave questions of constitutional law upon which the case was determined below; for in that event, the judgment can be affirmed upon the ground that the assessment cannot properly be the basis of a judgment against the defendant.

That the state board purposely included in its assessment and valuation the fences erected on the line between the railroads and the lands of adjacent proprietors, at the rate of $300 per mile, is undoubtedly true; for, it is so stated in the special finding of facts, and that finding must be taken here to be indisputable. It is equally true that that tribunal has no general power of assessment, but only jurisdiction to assess "the franchise, roadway, roadbed, rails, and rolling stock" of railroad corporations operating roads in more than one county, and that all other property of such corporation, subject to taxation, is assessable only "in the county, city, city and county, town, township, or district, in which it is situated, in the manner prescribed by law." Such is the declaration of the State Constitution. People v. Sacramento County, 59 Cal. 324, art. XIII, § 10. It must also be conceded that "fences" erected on the line between these railroads and the lands of adjoining proprietors were improperly included by the state board in its assessments, unless they constituted a part of the "roadway." Some light is thrown upon this question by that clause of section 3664 of the Political Code of California—which, in the view we take of these [412] cases, may be regarded as having been legally enacted—providing that "the depots, station grounds, shops, buildings, and gravel beds" shall be assessed in the county where situated as other property. From this it seems that there is much of the property daily used in the business of a railroad operated in more than one county that is not assessable by the state board, but only by the proper authorities of the municipality where it is situated. So that, even if it appeared that the fences assessed by the state board were the property of the railroad Companies, and not of the adjoining proprietors, they could not be included in an assessment by that board unless they were part of the roadway itself; for, as shown, the jurisdiction of that board is restricted to the assessment of the "franchise, roadway, roadbed, rails and rolling stock." We come back, then, to the vital inquiry whether the fences could be assessed under the head of roadway? We are of opinion that they cannot be regarded as part of the roadway for purposes of taxation.

The Constitution of California provides that "land and improvements thereon shall be separately assessed" (art. XIII. § 2); and, although that instrument does not define what are improvements upon land, the Political Code of the State expressly declares that the term "improvements" includes "all buildings, structures, fixtures, fences, and improvements erected upon or affixed to the land." § 3617. It would seem from these provisions that fences erected upon the roadway, even if owned by the railroad company, must be separately assessed, as "improvements," in the mode required in the case of depots, station grounds, shops, and buildings owned by the company, namely: by local officers in the county where they are situated. The same considerations of public interest or convenience upon which rest existing regulations for the assessments of depots, station grounds, shops and buildings of a railroad company operated in more than one county, would apply equally to the assessment and valuation for taxation of fences erected upon the line of railway of the same company.

In San Francisco and North Pacific Railroad Co. v. State Board of Equalization, 60 Cal. 12, [413] 84, which was an application, on certiorari, to annul certain orders of the state board assessing the property of a railroad corporation, one of the questions was as to the meaning of the words "roadbed" and "roadway." The court there said: "The roadbed is the foundation on which the superstructure of a railroad rests. (Webster.) The roadway is the right of way, which has been held to be the property liable to taxation. Appeal of N. B. & M. R. R. Co., 32 Cal. 499. The rails in place constitute the superstructure resting upon the roadbed." This definition was approved in San Francisco v. Central Pacific R. R. Co., 63 Cal., 467, 469. In the latter case the question was whether certain steamers owned by the railroad company, upon which were laid railroad tracks, and with which its passenger and freight cars were transported from the eastern shore of the Bay of San Francisco to its western shore, where the railway again commenced, were to be assessed by the City and County of San Francisco, or by the state board of equalization. The contention of the company was that they constituted a part of its roadbed or roadway, and must therefore be assessed by the state board. But the supreme court of the State held otherwise. After observing that all the property of the company, other than its franchise, roadway, roadbed, rails, and rolling stock, was required by the Constitution to be assessed by the local assessors, the court said: "They are certainly not the franchise of the defendant Corporation. They may constitute an element to be taken into computation to arrive at the value of the franchise of the corporation, but they are not such franchise. It is equally as clear that they are not rails or rolling stock. * * * Are they, then, embraced within the words roadway or roadbed, in the ordinary and popular acceptation of such words as applied to railroads? These two words, as applied to common roads, ordinarily mean the same thing, but as applied to railroads their meaning is not the same. The roadbed referred to in section 10, in our judgment, is the bed or foundation on which the superstructure of the railroad rests. Such is the definition given by both Worcester and Webster, and we think it correct. The roadway has a more extended signification as applied to railroads. In addition to the part denominated roadbed, the roadway includes whatever [414 space of ground the company is allowed by law in which to construct its roadbed and lay its track. Such space is defined in subdivision 4 of the 17th section and the 20th section of the Act 'to provide for the incorporation of railroad companies,' etc., approved May 20, 1861. Stat. 1861, p. 607; S. F. & N. P. R. R. Co. v State Board, 60 Cal. 12."

The argument in support of the proposition that these steamers—constituting, as they did, a necessary link in the line of the Company's railway, and upon which rails were actually laid for the running of cars—were a part either of the road bed or roadway of the railroad is much more cogent than the argument that the fences erected upon the line between a roadway and the lands of adjoining proprietors are a part of the roadway itself. It seems to the court that the fences in question are not, within the meaning of the local law, a part of the roadway for purposes of taxation, but are "improvements" assessable by the local authorities of the proper county, and therefore, were improperly included by the state board in its valuation of the property of the defendants.

The next inquiry that naturally arises is whether the different kinds of property assessed by the state board are distinct and separable upon the face of the assessment, so that the Company, being thereby informed of the amount of taxes levied upon each, could be held to have been in default in not tendering such sum, if any, as was legally due? Upon the transcript before us, this question must be answered in the negative. No record of assessment, as made by the state board, was introduced at the trial, and, presumably, no such record existed. Nor is there any documentary evidence of such assessment, except the official communication of the state board to the local assessors, called in the findings the assessment roll of the County. That roll shows only the aggregate valuation of the Company's franchise, roadway, roadbed, rails, and rolling stock in the State; the length of the Company's main track in the State; its length in the county; the assessed value per mile of the railway as fixed by the pro rata distribution per mile of the assessed value of its whole franchise, roadway, roadbed, rails and rolling stock, in the State; and the apportionment of the property so assessed to the County.

It appears, as already stated, from the evi-[415] dence, that the fences were included in the valuation of the defendants' property; but under what head, whether of franchise, roadway, or roadbed, does not appear. Nor can it be ascertained, with reasonable certainty, either from the assessment roll or from other evidence, what was the aggregate valuation of the fences, or what part of such valuation was apportioned to the respective counties through which the railroad was operated. If the presumption is that the state board included in its valuation only such property as it had jurisdiction under the State Constitution to assess, namely: such as could be rightfully classified under the heads of franchise, roadway, roadbed, rails or rolling stock, that presumption was overthrown by proof that it did, in fact, include, under some one or more of those heads, the fences in question. It was then incumbent upon the plaintiff, by satisfactory evidence, to separate that which was illegal from that which was legal—assuming for the purposes of this case only, that the assessment was, in all other respects, legal—and thus impose upon the defendant the duty of tendering, or enable the court to render judgment for, such amount, if any, as was justly due. But no such evidence was introduced. The finding that the fences were valued at $300 per mile is too vague and indefinite as a basis for estimating the aggregate valuation of the fences included in the assessment, or the amount thereof apportioned to the respective counties. Were the fences the property of adjacent proprietors? Were they assessed at that rate for every mile of the railroad within the State? Were they erected on the line of the railroad in every county through which it was operated, or only in some of them? Wherever erected, were they assessed for each side of the railway, or only for one side? These questions, so important in determining the extent to which the assessment included a valuation of the fences erected upon the line between the railroad and coterminous proprietors, find no solution in the record presented to this court.

[416] If it be suggested that, under the circumstances, the court might have assumed that the state board included the fences in their assessment, at the rate of $300 per mile for every mile of the railroad within the State, counting one or both sides of the roadway, and, having thus eliminated from the assessment the aggregate so found, given judgment for such sum, if any, as, upon that basis, would have been due upon the valuation of the franchise, roadbed, roadway, rails and rolling stock of the defendant, the answer is that the plaintiff did not offer to take such a judgment; and the court could not have rendered one of that character without concluding the plaintiff hereafter, and upon a proper assessment, from claiming against the defendant taxes for the years in question, upon such of its property as constituted its franchise, roadway, roadbed, rails and rolling stock. The case as presented to the court below was, therefore, one in which the plaintiff sought judgment for an entire tax arising upon an assessment of different kinds of property as a unit—such assessment including property not legally assessable by the state board, and the part of the tax assessed against the latter property not being separable from the other part. Upon such an issue, the law, we think, is for the defendant; an assessment of that kind is invalid and will not support an action for the recovery of the entire tax so levied. Cooley, Tax. 295-6, and authorities there cited; Libby v. Burnham, 15 Mass. 147; State v. Randolph, etc. v. City of Plainfield, 38 N. J. L. 93; Gamble v. Wilty, 35 Miss. 35; Stone v. Bean, 15 Gray, 45; Moshier v. Robie, 2 Fairfield (Me.) 137; Johnson v. Colburn, 36 Vt. 695; Wells v. Burbank, 17 N. H. 412.

It results that the court below might have given judgment in each case for the defendant upon the ground that the assessment, which was the foundation of the action, included property of material value, which the state board was without jurisdiction to assess, and the tax levied upon which cannot, from the record, be separated from that imposed upon other property embraced in the same assessment. As the judgment can be sustained upon this ground it is not necessary to consider any other questions raised by the pleadings and the facts found by the court.

It follows that there is no occasion to determine under what circumstances the plaintiffs would be entitled to judgment against a delinquent taxpayer for penalties, interest, or attorney's fees; for if the plaintiffs are not entitled to judgment for the taxes arising out of the assessments in question, no liability for penalties, interest, or attorney's fees, could result from a refusal or failure to pay such taxes. v.

SOUTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 417-425.)

Validity of state taxation of railroad corporations—constitutional provisions—fences not a part of roadbed or roadway—separability of assessments of different kinds of property—claim for penalties and collection fees in action for taxes.

1. Where in an action for taxes, the plaintiff is not entitled to judgment for the taxes originally in question, it follows that it cannot have judgment for penalties, interest or attorney's fees.

2. County of Santa Clara v. Southern Pacific Railroad Company, ante, followed.

[No. 619.]

Argued Jan. 26, 27, 28, 29, 1886. Decided May 10, 1886.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of California. Affirmed.

The case is stated by the court.

This cause was argued with the preceding case by the same counsel.

Mr. Justice Harlan delivered the opinion of the court: [418]

This action was brought in the Superior Court of San Bernardino, California, for the recovery of certain taxes, county and state, alleged to be due from the Southern Pacific Railroad Company for the fiscal year of 1880-1881. The amount claimed for county taxes is $8,785.90; that claimed for state taxes is $4,608.99. For each sum judgment is asked, with 5 per cent penalty, interest on the taxes and penalty at the rate of 2 per cent per month from December 26, 1880, and costs of advertising.

The complaint alleges that the taxes were duly assessed and levied upon "forty-eight $\frac{44}{100}$ miles of the roadway, road bed, and rails of said defendant, assessed at $10,800 per mile;" upon its rolling stock, "assessed at $1,983.15 per mile;" and upon its franchise, assessed at $2,000 per mile. It also alleges that the whole of the defendant's property, so far as its franchise, roadway, rails, roadbed, and rolling stock in California are concerned, was assessed for the period named at $10,488,518, the length of the defendant's road in the State being seven hundred and eleven $\frac{44}{100}$ miles.

An answer was filed similar to those in the cases of The County of Santa Clara, etc. v. Railroad Companies [ante, 118] just decided. This case was removed to the Circuit Court of the United States upon the same grounds as those presented in the other cases.

The facts specially found by that court are, in all material respects, like those found in the former cases. The copy of the assessment roll for San Bernardino County, introduced at the trial below, is not, so far as it bears upon this case, materially different from that for Fresno and Santa Clara Counties, set forth in the report of the other cases.

For the reasons given in the opinions delivered in the circuit court in the former cases, [419] reported as Santa Clara Railroad Tax Cases, 9 Sawyer, 165, 210, judgment was given for the defendant.

But the bill of exceptions further states:

"That, after said judgment was ordered, the defendant, being minded to pay, notwithstanding the fact that the tax had been declared invalid, the full amount of said tax due, without penalty, interest, or counsel fees, and to leave the question of its liability for said penalty, interest, and counsel fees to be finally determined by the Supreme Court of the United States in cases already pending there, or in this case if appealed, or taken there upon a writ of error, agreed, for the purposes aforesaid, that the judgment in its favor might be set aside and judgment in favor of the plaintiff be entered for the full amount of said tax, less penalties, interest, and counsel fees; which was done.

"And be it further remembered, that, before said judgment for the defendant was set aside, and in open court, it was stipulated and agreed by and between the attorneys for the plaintiff and defendant, that if said judgment was set aside and judgment for the plaintiff entered as aforesaid, the said defendant should not be deemed to have admitted thereby the validity of the taxes claimed or any part thereof, nor should said judgment be treated, upon an appeal or proceedings under writ of error, as a consent judgment; defendant then and there expressly waiving that point, if point it was.

"And be it further remembered, that the object and purpose of the proceeding then had was to enable the defendant to pay into the state and county treasuries on account the sum for which the judgment was rendered, without prejudice to the right of the plaintiff in the case to proceed for penalties, interest, and attorney's fees claimed, and in order that the litigation might be brought to a speedy conclusion.

"The plaintiff tenders this its bill of exceptions, which, being agreed to by the respective attorneys for the parties, is allowed, signed, sealed, and made a part of the record of the court."

The record also shows that in forty suits, heard with this one, brought in the name of different counties, and of the State against the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, the Central Pacific Railroad Company, and the Northern Railway Company, to recover like taxes, alleged to be due to counties and to the State, judgments were ordered for the respective defendants; that thereafter a stipulation, signed by the attorney of the several defendants in those cases and by the Attorney-General of the State, was filed, in which it is recited that the defendants, "notwithstanding the fact that the taxes therein sued for have been declared invalid, being minded to pay portions of the sum claimed," agree that judgments in favor of the plaintiffs might be entered for certain sums, being, as we suppose, the amount of the taxes sued for in the respective actions, less the penalties, interest and counsel fees therein claimed. [420]

On the 8th of December, 1885, the following stipulation was filed in the court below, and a printed copy thereof filed in this case here:

"In the Circuit Court of the United States, Ninth Circuit, District of California.

"The County of San Bernardino, Plaintiff, vs. "The Southern Pacific Railroad Company, Defendant. } No. 2757.

"It is hereby stipulated between the parties to the above entitled action that for the fiscal year 1880-'81 the principal of the tax claimed to be due by plaintiff from defendant for state and county purposes amounted to $18,394.88; that before judgment was entered herein in this court—from which judgment a writ of error has been taken—there had been paid on account of such taxes to the plaintiff herein, through its county officers, the sum of $4,932.40, leaving a balance due of $8,462.48, for which said sum judgment was taken.

"That for the fiscal year 1881-'82, the principal of the tax claimed to be due by plaintiff, the County of San Bernardino, from defendant for state and county purposes was $16,847.87; that before judgment was entered in the action brought to recover such taxes, the defendant therein, the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, paid to the plaintiff, through its county officers, on account of such taxes, the sum of $6,518.20, and judgment was taken in said action for the balance, $9,829.67.

"That for the fiscal year 1882 the total [421] amount claimed by said County from defendant, the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, for state and county purposes, was $9,681.45; that no payment had been made on account of said taxes, and judgment was therefore taken for the full amount.

"That in the three actions brought to recover taxes claimed to be due to the County of San Bernardino from the defendant herein, the total amount claimed as principal of state and county taxes, when the aforesaid judgments were entered, was $27,928.60, which amount was, upon the rendition of said judgments, paid in full to the Attorney-General, attorney for plaintiff, and by him subsequently paid into the county treasury of San Bernardino County, as directed by law, for the use and benefit of the State and of the County, and that said payment, together with the sums which had, prior thereto, been paid by said defendant, the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, on account of said taxes, constituted payment in full of the principal of all state and county taxes claimed to be due for the three years aforesaid.

"(Signed) E. C. Marshall,
Atty-Gen. Cal. and Atty. for Plf.
P. D. Wigginton,
Atty. for Defl."

As it appears that the taxes, for the recovery of which this suit was brought, have, through the action of the Attorney-General of California, been received by the plaintiff for the use and benefit of itself and the State, the only question which remains to be determined is as to the defendant's liability for the statutory penalty, interest and attorney's fees. There is no substantial difference, upon the facts, between this case and that of the County of Santa Clara v. Railroad Companies, just determined; for, in this case, as in the others, the assessment—upon which the taxes sued for depend for their validity—improperly included fences, erected upon the line between the railroad and the lands of adjacent proprietors, at the rate of $300 per mile. For the reasons given in the opinion in the other cases—which are equally applicable here—that assessment must be held to be insufficient as a basis for judgment against the Company. As upon this ground judgment might [422] have been rendered for the defendant, it is unnecessary to consider other questions, determined by the court below and discussed by counsel who appeared in this court.

The plaintiff, then, not being entitled to judgment for the taxes originally in question, and the parties having stipulated that the judgment entered for the plaintiff, with the consent of the defendant, should not be treated as an admission by the latter of the validity of the taxes claimed, it follows that the plaintiff cannot have judgment in its favor for penalty, interest, and attorney's fees. Apart from every other view, the defendant could not be adjudged liable for penalty, interest, or attorney's fees for not paying taxes arising out of an invalid assessment, and which, under the law, were not collectible by suit.

Mr. Justice Field concurring:

I agree to the judgment of the court in this as also in the other tax cases from California. But I regret that it has not been deemed consistent with its duty to decide the important constitutional questions involved, and particularly the one which was so fully considered in the circuit court, and elaborately argued here, that in the assessment, upon which the taxes claimed were levied, an unlawful and unjust discrimination was made between the property of the defendant and the property of individuals, to its disadvantage, thus subjecting it to an unequal share of the public burdens, and to that extent depriving it of the equal protection of the laws guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution. At the present day nearly all great enterprises are conducted by corporations. Hardly an industry can be named that is not in some way promoted by them, and a vast portion of the wealth of the country is in their hands. It is, therefore, of the greatest interest to them whether their property is subject to the same rules of assessment and taxation as like property of natural persons, or whether elements which affect the valuation of property are to be omitted from consideration when it is owned by them, and considered when it is [423] owned by natural persons; and thus the valuation of property be made to vary, not according to its condition or use, but according to its ownership. The question is not whether the State may not claim for grants of privileges and franchises a fixed sum per year, or a percentage of earnings of a corporation—that is not controverted—but whether it may prescribe rules for the valuation of property for taxation which will vary according as it is held by individuals or by corporations. The question is of transcendent importance, and it will come here and continue to come until it is authoritatively decided in harmony with the great constitutional Amendment which insures to every person, whatever his position or association, the equal protection of the laws; and that necessarily implies freedom from the imposition of unequal burdens under the same conditions. Barbier v. Connolly, 113 U. S. 27, 31 [Bk. 28, L. ed. 923, 925].

Much as I regret that the question could not now be decided, I recognize fully the wisdom of the rule that the constitutionality of state legislation will not be considered by the court unless by the case presented its consideration is imperatively required. Although the objection, that in the assessment of the roadway there was included property not appertaining to it was raised in the answer and taken on the trial, the point was not discussed by counsel, as the constitutional questions were deemed of far greater importance. The attention of the court was specially directed to them, and thus the minor point was left undetermined.

After judgment had been entered in favor of the defendant on the ground that the assessment upon which the taxes claimed were levied was illegal, it entered into an agreement with the Attorney-General of the State to allow the judgment to be set aside and a judgment to be entered in favor of the plaintiff for the face of the taxes claimed, and to leave the question of its liability for the penalty, interest, and counsel fees to be finally determined by the supreme court. It is stated in the record that the object and purpose of the proceeding was "to enable the defendant to pay into the state and county treasuries, on account, the sum for which the judgment was rendered, without prejudice to [424] the right of the plaintiff in the case to proceed for penalties, interest, and attorney's fees claimed, and in order that the litigation might be brought to a speedy conclusion." It is also suggested that the same amount of taxes, if not recoverable when levied upon the property, might under the Constitution be recovered in another action when levied upon the mortgage; and in that event that the Company could claim a credit from the mortgagees for the payment. The motives of the Company in this matter, however, do not affect the question of its liability for the penalty, interest, and attorney's fees. It was agreed between the respective attorneys that, in consenting to the judgment for the face of the taxes, the defendant should not thereby be deemed to admit their validity, desiring, as it would seem, to contest, on the ground of their alleged invalidity, the claim for the penalties, interest, and attorney's fees. Judgment was accordingly entered for the plaintiff for the face of the taxes claimed and the amount has been paid.

The arrangement was a wise and judicious one on the part of the Attorney-General, as it at once enabled the state and county treasuries to have the amount of the taxes levied, and to proceed for the penalties, interest, and attorney's fees. To have refused such an advantageous arrangement might have subjected him to just animadversion. Every right which the State could under any circumstance have had was fully guarded by the agreement. No conceivable benefit could have arisen to the State by his refusing to accede to it, and, as it has turned out from the decisions in the other cases, great inconvenience and loss would have followed.

The record shows that after the circuit court had announced its decision in favor of the defendant and different railway companies in forty other cases, brought to recover alleged delinquent taxes, they agreed to allow judgments to be entered against them for portions of the sums claimed. It was admitted by counsel on the argument that these judgments, amounting to several hundred thousand dollars, were for the face of the taxes; and that any claim in the cases for penalties, interest, and attorney's fees, was by stipulation to abide the [425] determination of the supreme court in the present case.

According to the decision of the court in the Santa Clara Case, the assessment upon which the taxes were levied was illegal, as it embraced items not assessable by the board of equalization. Of course no penalties for not paying an illegal tax, and no attorney's fees charged for the attempt to collect them, could be recovered; and for a like reason the interest of 2 per cent a month claimed could not be demanded. Besides, the statute allows no such interest on delinquent taxes where property is possessed by the delinquent, upon which a levy could be made for them. The collector must, on the third Monday of March of each year, make an affidavit that the taxes not marked "paid" on the delinquent list have not been paid, and that he has been unable to discover any property belonging to, or in the possession of the persons liable to pay the same, from which to collect them. It is only on such delinquent taxes that the 2 per cent a month interest is collectible. Since this case has been pending in this court a decision to that effect has been made by the Supreme Court of the State. People v. North Pacific Coast R. R. Co. 9 West Coast Rep. 574.

DAVID D. OLIVER.

Bill in equity—evidence held insufficient to support averments.

1. Where a debtor, for the purpose of delaying his creditors until he can make a favorable sale, conveys his real estate to one of three persons to whom he has executed a mortgage, but who has transferred his interest in the mortgage to his comortgagees, and the debtor then enters into a verbal contract authorizing his grantee to convey the property to junior mortgage creditors upon certain conditions, and after such subsequent conveyance has been executed under a written contract entered into by his grantee, and the persons to whom such grantee conveys purporting to embrace the verbal agreement, and after he has examined the written contract and executed deeds based upon it without expressing dissent therewith to the grantees who have accepted the deed under its provisions and have expended large sums upon the property, he cannot, after a delay of four years, be permitted in a court of equity to assert that the written contract and conveyance was not in accordance with the verbal agreement, and demand an accounting and reconveyance of the property to himself; nor can he demand a cancellation of the original mortgage without proof that the other two mortgagees were interested in his dealings with their co-mortgagee.

2. Where it is shown beyond question that neither of the defendants ever agreed to become partners in a firm, of which it is alleged they were members, that they never held themselves out as partners or contributed anything to the capital of the firm, or derived any profit whatever from its business, the facts that the defendants held a mortgage upon the firm property and that one of them indorsed the paper of the firm, his son-in-law being a member thereof, do not tend to prove that they were partners.

Argued April 5, 6, 7, 1886. Decided May 10, 1886.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Michigan. Reversed.

The case is stated by the court.

Messrs. Henry M. Duffield and George F. Edmunds, for appellants.

Messrs. Charles F. Burton and Alfred Russell, for appellee.

Mr. Justice Woods delivered the opinion of the court:

The bill was filed by David D. Oliver, the appellee, against Henry S. Cunningham, Garrett B. Hunt, Jacob Eschleman, Philip M. Ranney, Calvin Haines, George J. Robinson, and Henry M. Robinson. The following facts are shown by the pleadings and evidence: in the summer of 1868, Oliver, the plaintiff, was the owner of about 12,500 acres of pine lands, and held a contract for the purchase of 6,500 acres more from one David Preston. These lands were in the State of Michigan, mainly in Alpena and Alcona Counties. Six thousand acres of these lands Oliver had purchased in 1866 from the defendants Hunt, Eschleman, and Cunningham, for $35,000. He paid nothing on the purchase money, but secured its payment by a mortgage on the lands purchased and other lands owned by him. In 1867 he put up a steam saw-mill and made other improvements on the mortgaged lands, and carried on the business of manufacturing pine lumber cut from the lands, first with one George W. Hawkins as a partner, and afterwards with the defendant George J. Robinson, to whom he conveyed an undivided one fourth in all his lands. In the summer of 1868 the plaintiff was in arrears for interest past due on the mortgage above mentioned, and on a mortgage for $16,000 to the defendants Haines and Ranney, and also on one to E. & G. R. Haines, for $10,000, covering part of the lands included in the Hunt, Eschleman and Cunningham mortgage. His property was also incumbered by other mortgages, to the amount of $13,000; he owed on the Preston contract for the purchase of lands, $12,000; he owed an unsecured indebtedness of $6,000; and the firm of Oliver & Robinson was indebted in the sum of $25,000, making in all $117,000, without including interest. He had not the ready means to meet his pressing demands. He was, therefore, financially embarrassed, and was, moreover, involved in difficulty with his partner, George J. Robinson, whom he accused of trying to dispossess and defraud him. Thereupon, on June 9, 1868, he wrote to Hunt and Cunningham for help, stating his situation, and asking them to take from him a quitclaim deed of all his property, and to purchase the Haines and Ranney mortgage, the E. & G. R. Haines mortgage, and other indebtedness outstanding against him; to take possession of and manage his property, and, when they had paid all his debts and the property was clear, to reconvey the same to him by quitclaim deed; and for all their trouble and services he offered to pay a reasonable compensation. They did not accede to Oliver's proposition, and matters remained in statu quo until September. In the meantime, Oliver went to Buffalo, and there saw Hunt, Eschleman and Cunningham, and urged them to help him out of his troubles with his partner and his creditors. But they did not yield to his importunities. Of these three persons Cunningham alone had had any experience in commercial affairs. Hunt and Eschleman were farmers living in Erie County, New York, and Hunt was Cunningham's father-in-law.

Oliver had given his creditors Haines and Ranney an option to buy his property, but they had declined to purchase. Finally, on September 2, 1868, Cunningham, being urgently entreated by Oliver, left Buffalo and went to Ossineke, in Michigan, Oliver's place of residence, and had an interview with him. Before leaving, [213] he assigned his interest in the Hunt, Eschleman and Cunningham mortgage to Hunt and Eschleman, and, as it appears, without consideration paid at the time.

Cunningham, while at Ossineke, accepted, at Oliver's own solicitation, quitclaim deeds from him of all the latter's real estate and bills of sale of all his personal property, including his interest in the firm of Oliver & Robinson. The conveyances were upon their face without condition or trust. Cunningham refused before the deeds were made to give Oliver any writing showing the terms on which he accepted them. Oliver, in his testimony in this case, states that at the time the conveyances were made he understood that "the object of the transfer was a trust; that he," Cunningham, "was to use the property to pay off the debts, and when the debts were paid to deed it back." In the bill he alleges that "said transfers were made for the purpose of enabling the mortgagees to sell said property in such a way as to pay their own debt, and to pay the other debts of complainant and leave him a surplus." Cunningham testifies that the purpose of Oliver in making the transfer to him was to enable him to hold the title for Oliver, so that the property should not be seized in suits then pending or about to be brought against Oliver, and to enable Oliver to make a sale thereof.

No consideration for the transfers passed at the time of their execution. The deeds were dated September 8, 1868; but were not in fact executed until September 8, following. Oliver endeavored during the thirty days that followed the date of the deeds to make a sale of his property, but failed. About the first of October, 1868, he was in Buffalo, and, with Cunningham, entered upon a treaty with the defendants, Calvin Haines and Philip M. Ranney, who were partners under the name of C. Haines & Co., and with the defendant, George J. Robinson, for the sale of the property to them. A contract was agreed on, and, as the appellants insist, was as agreed on reduced to writing, and dated and executed on October 8, 1868. It was signed by Cunningham, C. Haines & Co., and George J. Robinson, and, for the sake of brevity, is called in the record the Buffalo agreement. It provided, among other things, that on the expiration of thirty days [214] Cunningham, party of the first part, should convey to C. Haines & Co. and Robinson, party of the second part, all the real estate situated in townships 28 and 29 north, range 8 east, in the Counties of Alpena and Alcona, Michigan, which was conveyed to him by Oliver and wife by deed, bearing date on or about the fifth day of September, 1868, and also all the personal property conveyed to him by Oliver by bill of sale executed on the same day, the sale and conveyance to be subject to the following claims:

1. The Cunningham, Hunt and Eschleman mortgage upon a part of said real estate, on which mortgage there was unpaid $80,000 and interest.

2. A mortgage to C. Haines & Co. for about $19,000.

3. A mortgage to J. B. Wayne for about $12,000, on a portion of said real estate.

4. A claim of James H. Hill for about $3,000.

5. The copartnership indebtedness of the firm of Oliver & Robinson.

The party of the second part agreed to take the property subject to the above claims, and to assume and pay, at the time of the conveyance by Cunningham, one half of a debt for about $10,500 due to E. & G. R. Haines secured by a mortgage executed by Oliver on his lands. The party of the second part further agreed that they would, at the time of the conveyance by Cunningham, release and discharge all mortgages given by George W Hawkins to Calvin Haines or E. & G. R. Haines, and covering lands in the Counties of Erie and Niagara, in the State of New York, or either of said counties, and would protect and save Hawkins harmless therefrom, and from the debt thereby secured.

The contract further provided that the party of the second part in lieu of paying the one-half part of the mortgage held by E. & G. R. Haines, and of discharging the Hawkins mortgage, should have the option to assign to Garrett B. Hunt, the mortgage of C. Haines & Co. against the said real estate of George W. Hawkins, and the debt secured thereby, and in addition to pay or secure the payment to Hunt of the sum of $4,000 within one year from the third day of November, 1868.

The contract also provided that Cunningham
[215] should assign a certain agreement made between Oliver and David Preston for the purchase of about 6,500 acres of land in Alpena and Alcona Counties, Michigan, subject to the aforesaid claims, and subject to the contract price of said last mentioned lands, and the party of the second part agreed that, upon such assignment, they would pay to Preston the contract price, and convey to such persons as Oliver should direct, free of charge, all of said 6,500 acres which lay outside of townships 28 and 29 north, range 8 east.

The delay of thirty days provided by the contract was to give Oliver the chance of selling the property within that time if he could. He was not able to sell. On November 18, 1868, Cunningham conveyed to George J. Robinson, Calvin Haines, and Philip M. Ranney, in pursuance of the Buffalo agreement, the lands and personal property therein mentioned. The grantees then formed a partnership under the name of Robinson, Haines & Ranney, for the manufacture and sale of lumber from timber to be cut from the lands and sawed at the mill conveyed to them by Cunningham. On the 9th of January, 1869, a new partnership for the same purpose was formed, under the name of Cunningham, Robinson, Haines & Co., by taking into the firm Henry S. Cunningham. This firm continued in business until its dissolution in January, 1875. It was an unsuccessful venture. It never made or divided any profits. When it ceased business it had not assets sufficient to pay its debts. Three of its members Cunningham, Haines and Robinson, were adjudicated bankrupts, and Ranney, the fourth partner, was insolvent.

The bill in this case was filed March 12, 1873. It charged a conspiracy between Cunningham, Hunt, Eschleman, Robinson, Haines, and Ranney to defraud Oliver of his property. It averred that, before the Buffalo agreement was reduced to writing and signed, Oliver was compelled to leave, and did leave Buffalo, and was not present at its execution; that the agreement which, before leaving, he consented that Cunningham might make with C. Haines &
[216] Co. and Robinson was, that they should pay the Hunt and Eschleman, the James B. Wayne and the C. Haines & Co. mortgages, and half of the E. & G. R. Haines mortgage, and pay the Hill claim of $3,000, and release and discharge Hawkins from all his liabilities growing out of his business with Oliver, and pay all the debts of the firm of Oliver & Robinson, whereupon Cunningham should convey to them all the lands conveyed to him by Oliver and David Preston in townships 28 and 29 north, range 8 east. Having done this, Cunningham was to deed to Oliver all the lands outside of said towns. It was averred that, instead of making the contract to which he had assented, Cunningham made the Buffalo agreement, as hereinbefore set forth, by which Haines, Ranney and Robinson agreed not to pay off Oliver's debts, but to receive a conveyance of the lands subject to said mortgages, and bound themselves only to pay off one half of the mortgage to E. & G. R. Haines.

The bill then charged that Hunt and Eschleman were in fact members of the firm of Cunningham, Robinson, Haines & Co.; that Cunningham put no capital into the firm, and that all the defendants to the bill had carried on the lumber business under said firm name upon the lands and with the mill of the plaintiff, and had stripped the lands of their best pine timber; that Cunningham had in the manner above set forth secretly and fraudulently effected a sale of said lands to himself and his comortgagees; that the Buffalo agreement was a fraud on the plaintiff; that Cunningham's deed to Robinson, Haines and Ranney was procured by fraud and in furtherance of a conspiracy between all the defendants to obtain the plaintiff's property without consideration, and was made and delivered without payment or discharge by the vendees of the debts of the plaintiff and said Hawkins, and was without consideration and void; and that the mortgage to Hunt, Eschleman and Cunningham had been paid, and should be charged with the receipts of the mortgagees from the property, to wit: the profits of the said partnership.

The bill prayed that the deed and all the transfers made by Oliver to Cunningham, the Buffalo agreement, and the deed of Cunningham to Robinson, Haines and Ranney, might be canceled as fraudulent and void; that an [217] account might be taken of the issues and profits of said lands received by Cunningham for the benefit of himself and Hunt and Eschleman, and the mortgage held by them be charged with the amount thereof; that the plaintiff might be at liberty to redeem; and that all the defendants might be required to deliver up possession of the mortgaged premises to the plaintiff, free and clear of all incumbrance put thereon by them.

Before the filing of the bill in the present case, to wit: on April 8, 1869, Hunt and Eschleman had filed their bill in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Michigan, to foreclose the mortgage executed to them and Cunningham by Oliver, to which Oliver and wife, George J. Robinson, Calvin Haines, Ranney and Cunningham were made defendants. Oliver filed an answer and cross bill, in which he set up by way of defense substantially the same facts as are relied on for relief in the present case. After the taking of a large mass of evidence in that case the court dismissed the cross bill without prejudice, and rendered a decree in favor of Hunt and Eschleman, on their note and mortgage, for $47,495, and directed a sale of the mortgaged premises to pay the same. Upon this decree a sale was made on August 28, 1873, to Garrett B. Hunt, for $50,699.44, which was confirmed on May 8, 1874. The premises brought sufficient to pay the debt secured by the mortgage.

The defendants, Hunt and Eschleman, filed a joint answer, in which they traversed all the material facts averred in the bill on which the plaintiff's prayer for relief was based, and set up the decree made in the suit for the fore closure of their mortgage in bar of the present suit. Separate answers were also filed by the other defendants. After the taking of testimony and a reference to and report by a master, the circuit court, on final hearing, rendered a decree in favor of the plaintiff, against all the defendants, for $41,418.87, and that the defendants surrender to the plaintiff all the lands conveyed by him to Cunningham by deeds dated September 8, 1868.

From this decree Hunt and Eschleman alone have appealed.

[218] The appeal brings up the question how far the evidence justifies the decree against Hunt and Eschleman. The gravamen of the bill is that the defendants, including the appellants, conspired with each other to secure for themselves without consideration the property of the appellee, and in pursuance of this purpose induced the plaintiff to execute deeds and transfers of all his property to Cunningham; that, having thus devested the title of the plaintiff and vested it in one of their own number, they caused the execution of the Buffalo agreement, which was greatly to the disadvantage of the plaintiff, and was different from the verbal agreement between him and Cunningham and the other defendants; that the Buffalo agreement as reduced to writing was never performed; but that the defendants, having organized the partnership of Cunningham, Robinson, Haines & Co., appropriated and used the property of the plaintiff without compensation or consideration passing to him, and by these means the large and valuable property of which the plaintiff was the owner before his conveyance thereof to Cunningham was wrested from him and used and consumed by the defendants.

We are of opinion, after a careful consideration of the record, that the decree of the circuit court, so far as it concerns the appellants, is not supported by the evidence.

The deeds and transfers of his property by the plaintiff were not made to the appellants, but to Cunningham, and there is no proof that they had any part in persuading Oliver to make them. On the contrary, Oliver himself testifies that the transfer of his property was suggested by himself for his own advantage; that he offered by letter to convey his real and personal estate to Hunt and Cunningham, jointly; and that they declined to accept his conveyance. He went from Ossineke, in Michigan, to Buffalo to try if he could not, by a personal interview, induce Hunt, Eschleman and Cunningham to accede to his wishes, but they refused to become his grantees. After much personal importunity he finally persuaded Cunningham to accept a transfer of his property for the purpose, as it seems to us, of delaying [219] his creditors until he could make a favorable sale and thus save something for himself after paying his debts. Cunningham went from Buffalo to Ossineke for the purpose of receiving the deeds and transfer, but there is no proof that either Hunt or Eschleman solicited or advised Oliver to make the conveyances to him. It was the latter's own scheme, conceived and carried out by himself and in his own interest.

Nor is there any evidence that either Hunt or Eschleman took any part in the making of the Buffalo agreement. Oliver himself fails to connect them with it. He merely says that Hunt and Eschleman, Haines, Ranney, George J. Robinson and Henry M. Robinson were present at the discussion prior to the making of the Buffalo agreement. There is no proof that either Hunt or Eschleman urged or even advised the making of that agreement, or any agreement whatever, for the sale by Oliver and the conveyance by Cunningham of the lands and property transferred by Oliver to Cunningham. There is no proof that either of them was present when the Buffalo agreement was signed.

The charge that the agreement was not the contract to which Oliver had assented is supported by only one witness, and that is Oliver himself. On the other hand, there is much direct evidence to show that the agreement was just what he had consented it should be. Besides, Oliver's own conduct shows beyond controversy his assent to the agreement. He knew as early as the 10th of October what the written agreement was; for on that day, according to his own testimony, he went to the office of Williams, the lawyer who wrote the agreement and with whom it was left, and saw and read it. He says that, after reading it, he complained to Cunningham that the agreement was not the contract to which he had verbally assented. In this he is contradicted by Cunningham, and both Hunt and Eschleman swear that, after Oliver had read the agreement, he said to them that he was well satisfied with it. But Oliver does not swear, nor is there any proof, that he expressed any dissatisfaction with the agreement to Haines, Ranney, or Robinson, the other parties to the contract, and who by its terms were to become the vendees of the property. He took no steps whatever to prevent the execution of the agreement. On the contrary, on November 18, more than a month after he had seen and read it, he allows Cunningham, without objection from him, to make deeds for the property to Haines, Ranney and [220] Robinson, in accordance with its stipulations.

The record shows other pregnant facts. On October 2, 1868, the day before the execution of the Buffalo agreement, Oliver signed a contract in writing, in which, in consideration of the execution of that agreement, he covenanted to convey to Robinson, Haines and Ranney certain lands not included therein, and, on November 12, 1868, a month after he had seen and read the Buffalo agreement, he executed to Robinson, Haines and Ranney a deed for said lands, "together with the right to run logs through Devil River, over and through any lands owned by said David D. Oliver on the second day of October, 1868, and for that purpose to dam said river, and to flood any lands that may be necessary for the purpose of running logs," etc.; and afterwards, on January 12, 1869, he procured the acknowledgment of his wife to the deed, which was delivered, of course, after that date. This was equivalent to a ratification under his own hand and seal of the Buffalo agreement. Both the agreement by which he contracted to convey the lands and his deed of conveyance are in the record.

If Oliver was not satisfied with that agreement, as reduced to writing, he should have assailed it at once. As soon as he learned of the fraud which he alleged had been practiced he should have repudiated the contract, and informed Robinson, Haines and Ranney thereof. But he did nothing of the kind. He allowed the contract to be carried out by Cunningham without objection. He himself made a deed in pursuance of the contract, and he permitted the vendees to expend large sums of money in establishing and carrying on the business for which they purchased the property. These facts prove beyond question, either that the Buffalo agreement was made upon the terms to which he had given his assent in advance, or if not, that he was satisfied with it as it was written, and ratified and performed it. All the complaints of Oliver, therefore, in reference to the execution of the Buffalo agreement, are shown to be groundless.

But the case stated in the bill fails for want of proof of the necessary and vital averment that these appellants were partners in the firm of [221] Cunningham, Robinson Haines & Co., and, as such, appropriated and converted to their own use the property of the plaintiff.

The partnership just named was formed under written articles, under which Henry S. Cunningham, George J. Robinson, Calvin Haines and Philip M. Ranney, and no others, became partners. With the exception of George J. Robinson, every member of the firm named in the articles of partnership testifies that neither Hunt nor Eschleman was in fact a partner. Hunt and Eschleman testify to the same effect. The testimony of George J. Robinson may be laid out of consideration. He is not only contradicted on this point by every other witness who testifies on the subject, but is flatly contradicted by his own deposition and answer in the foreclosure suit brought by Hunt and Eschleman against Oliver. Without going into details, it is sufficient to say that this witness is so thoroughly discredited that his deposition, uncorroborated, is not worthy of attention in settling the facts of the case.

It is shown beyond question that neither Hunt nor Eschleman ever agreed to become partners in the firm of Cunningham, Robinson, Haines & Co.; and that they never held themselves out as partners, or contributed anything to the capital of the firm, or derived any profit whatever from its business. They were, therefore, not partners in any sense. Berthold v. Goldsmith, 24 How. 536 [65 U. S. bk. 16, L. ed. 762]; Felichy v. Hamilton, 1 Wash. C. C. 491.

The only facts upon which the contention of the plaintiff is based, that Hunt and Eschleman were partners in the firm, are: first, that Cunningham appeared as a partner under circumstances which indicated, as the plaintiff claims, that his contribution to the capital of the firm was the money due on the mortgage to Hunt and Eschleman. This position, it may be observed, is at variance with the bill, which avers that Cunningham did not contribute any capital to the firm. The second fact relied on to show that Hunt was a member of the firm is that he lent it his credit by indorsing its paper.

But these facts are inconclusive. Hunt could [222] aid Cunningham, his son-in-law, by advancing him means and by indorsing paper of the firm of which Cunningham was a member, without himself becoming a partner in the firm. These acts of Hunt were perfectly consistent with his testimony, and that of all the other witnesses, that he was in no sense a member of the firm. Conceding, therefore, that Hunt and Eschleman allowed Cunningham to get a foothold in the firm by authorizing him to promise that the property of the firm should be protected from the Hunt and Eschleman mortgage, and the testimony shows nothing more, this does not prove or tend to prove that they were partners. If they had given Cunningham outright their whole interest in the mortgage, that fact would not have invested them with any rights in the property of the firm, or subjected them to its liabilities. The contention that they were partners in the firm of Cunningham, Robinson, Haines & Co. is based on vague conjectures built on the sayings and doings of others, which neither Hunt nor Eschleman is shown to have authorized or ratified.

Much stress is laid by Oliver's counsel upon the alleged fact that the assignment by Cunningham to Hunt and Eschleman of his interest in Oliver's mortgage to Hunt, Eschleman, and Cunningham, was without consideration and simulated. We regard this assignment as a fact of no weight in this controversy. As Hunt and Eschleman are shown not to have been partners in the firm of Cunningham, Robinson, Haines & Co., the assignment did not injuriously affect Oliver's rights as against them. Whether it was made with or without consideration was a matter of no concern to Oliver. The fact is, and so the record shows, that it was made upon the advice of counsel, and Oliver was told of it by Cunningham early in November, 1868. Its purpose evidently was to avoid any embarrassment to Hunt and Eschleman, in case Cunningham became Oliver's vepdee of the mortgaged lands, and not to gain any unfair advantage over him.

Finally, the evidence shows that all the stipulations in the Buffalo agreement for the benefit of Oliver have been performed by the parties, except when his own conduct has prevented performance; the $4,000 has been paid to Hunt [223] on Oliver's account, and Hunt has acknowledged its receipt, and the Hawkins mortgage has been assigned to Hunt according to the contract; all of the lands conveyed by him to Cunningham, and all of the Preston lands not in townships 28 and 29, have either been conveyed to him by Cunningham or will be upon his demand. There are over 6,000 acres of these lands to which he now has a clear legal or equitable title, and which are valued by an uncontradicted witness at $40,000. In short, the Buffalo agreement, which the bill assails, appears to have been made with Oliver's assent, to have been to his advantage and to have been fairly performed.

On every ground for relief alleged in the bill there is a failure of proof. This view renders it unnecessary to consider the effect, as a bar to the relief sought in this case, of the decree in the suit for foreclosure brought by Hunt and Eschleman against Oliver.

The decree of the Circuit Court against the appellants, Hunt and Eschleman, must, therefore, be reversed and the cause remanded, with directions to dismiss the bill as to them; and it is so ordered.

Title in special allotments to head men of Ottawa Indians—limitation on power of alienation—Treaty of June 24, 1862.

1. The special allotments to the chiefs and head men of the Ottawa Indian Tribe, authorized by the third article of the Treaty of June 24, 1862, were subject to the limitations on the power of alienation prescribed by the seventh article of the same Treaty.
2. Such limitation on the power of conveyance did not deprive the title of the character of a fee simple estate.

Submitted April 19, 1886. Decided May 10, 1886.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Kansas. Affirmed.

The case is stated by the court.

Messrs. George R. Peck, A. T. Britton and A. B. Browne, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. William H. Clark, in person.

Mr. Justice Miller delivered the opinion of the court:

251] This is a writ of error to the Supreme Court of the State of Kansas.

It is an action in the nature of ejectment brought by Libby against Clark.

Both parties assert title through William Hurr, who is by birth and descent an Indian of the Ottawa Tribe, and was one of the chiefs and head men of the Tribe. On the trial the plaintiff read in evidence a patent from the United States to Hurr for the land in controversy, and offered a deed from said Hurr to J. S. Kallock, which, on objection of the defendant, the court refused to receive, and the exception to this ruling, which was affirmed by the supreme court, presents the question of federal law which gives jurisdiction to this court. The patent to Hurr reads as follows:

"The United States of America to all to whom these presents shall come, Greeting:

Whereas, there has been deposited in the General Land-Office a return, dated 17th March, 1864, from the Office of Indian Affairs, containing certain lists showing the selections of allotments made for the use of certain Ottawa Indians under the Treaty concluded on the 24th day of June, 1862, between the United States and the Ottawa Indians of Blanchard's Fork and Roche de Boeuf, in the State of Kansas, as ratified on the 28th day of July, 1862, which lists were duly approved by the Secretary of the Interior under date of March 9, 1864; and whereas, it appears from one of the lists aforesaid that the east half of the northwest quarter of section seven, in township seventeen, the east half of the west half of section thirty, and the east half of the northwest quarter of section thirty-one, in township sixteen, south of range twenty, east of the sixth principal meridian in Kansas, containing 320 acres, has been designated as the allotment of William Hurr: Now, know ye that the United States of America, in consideration of the premises, and pursuant to the third and seventh articles of the Treaty aforesaid, have given and granted, and by these presents do give and grant unto the said William Hurr and to his heirs the tract of land above described; Provided, however, and these presents are upon the express condition, and with the limitation, as required by the Treaty aforesaid, That the said William Hurr shall not alienate or incumber the aforesaid tracts of land until he shall become, by the terms of said Treaty, a citizen of the United States; and any conveyance or incumbrance of said lands, done or suffered by said William Hurr, made before he shall become a citizen, shall be null and void; to have and to hold the said tracts of land, with the appurtenances, unto the said William Hurr and to his heirs and assigns forever, subject to the limitation and condition aforesaid. [252]

"In testimony whereof, I, Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, have caused these letters to be made patent, and the seal of the General Land-Office to be hereunto affixed.

"Given under my hand at the City of Washington, this first day of December, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-five, and of the Independence of the United States the ninetieth.

"[Seal of the U. S. General Land-Office.]

"By the President:

"ANDREW JOHNSON,
By Edw. D. Neill, Secretary.
S. Granger,
Recorder of the General Land-Office."

The deed from Hurr to Kallock is dated December 1, 1865, and was unaccompanied by any consent of the Secretary of the Interior, or any evidence that Hurr had become a citizen of the United States, and it was for that reason rejected.

Whether Hurr could make a valid conveyance of the land at the time he made the deed to Kallock depends upon the construction to be given to the Treaty mentioned in the patent to Hurr, the third and seventh articles of which are as follows:

"Article III. It being the wish of said Tribe of Ottawas to remunerate several of the chiefs, councilmen and head men of the Tribe for their services to them many years without pay, it is hereby stipulated that five sections of land is (are) reserved and set apart for that purpose, to be apportioned among the said chiefs, councilmen and head men as the members of the Tribes shall in full council determine; and it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to issue patents in fee simple of said land, when located [253] and apportioned, to said Indians. In addition thereto, said last named persons, and each and every head of a family in said Tribe, shall receive 160 acres of land, which shall include his or her house and all improvements, so far as practicable; and all other members of the Tribe shall receive 80 acres of land each, and all the locations for the heads of families, made in accordance with this Treaty, shall be made adjoining and in as regular and compact form as possible, and with due regard to the rights of each individual and of the whole Tribe."

"Article VII. There shall be set apart ten acres of land for the benefit of the Ottawa Baptist Church; and said lands shall include the church building, mission house and graveyard, and the title to said property shall be vested in a board of five trustees, to be appointed by said church in accordance with the laws of the State of Kansas. And in respect for the memory of

Rev. J. Meeker, deceased, who labored with unselfish zeal for nearly twenty years among said Ottawas, greatly to their spiritual and temporal welfare, it is stipulated that 80 acres of good land shall be, and hereby is, given, in fee simple, to each of the two children of said Meeker, viz.: Emmeline and Eliza; their lands to be selected and located as the other allotments herein provided are to be selected and located, which lands shall be inalienable, the same as the lands allotted to the Ottawas. And all the above mentioned selections of lands shall be made by the agent of the Tribe under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior. And plats and records of all the selections and locations shall be made, and upon their completion and approval, proper patents by the United States shall be issued to each individual member of the tribe and persons entitled for the land selected and allotted to them, in which it shall be stipulated that no Indian, except as herein provided, to whom the same may be issued, shall alienate or incumber the land allotted to him or her in any manner until they shall, by the terms of this Treaty, become a citizen of [254] the United States; and any conveyance or incumbrance of said lands, done or suffered, except as aforesaid, by any Ottawa Indian, of the lands allotted to him or her, made before they shall become a citizen, shall be null and void. And forty acres, including the houses and improvements of the allottee, shall be inalienable during the natural lifetime of the party receiving the title; Provided, That such of said Indians as are not under legal disabilities by the local laws may sell to each other such portions of the lands as are subject to sale, with the consent of the Secretary of the Interior, at any time."

By the first article of the Treaty, it was declared that this branch of the Ottawa Tribe of Indians, and each one of them, should become citizens of the United States, and their tribal relations be dissolved, at the end of five years from the ratification of the Treaty, which was July 18, 1862. Hurr, therefore, lacked nearly two years of being a citizen when he attempted to convey to Kallock.

It is to be added that the records of the land-office show that the land named in that deed was part of the allotment to Hurr as one of the chiefs and head men of the Tribe, under article three of the Treaty, and not lands certified to him in common with all others of the Tribe under article seven. The question thus presented is whether Hurr held this land after the patent was delivered to him, subject to the stipulations found in it and prescribed by the seventh article, namely: "And plats and records of all the selections and locations shall be made, and, upon their completion and approval, proper patents by the United States shall be issued to each individual member of the Tribe and person entitled for the lands selected and allotted to them, in which it shall be stipulated that no Indian, except as herein provided, to whom the same may be issued, shall alienate or incumber the land allotted to him or her in any manner, until they shall, by the terms of this Treaty, become a citizen of the United States; and any conveyance or incumbrance of said lands, done or suffered, except as aforesaid, by any Ottawa Indian, of the lands allotted to him or her, made before they shall become a citizen, shall be null and void." The Supreme Court of Kansas held [25 that his title was subject to this provision and. as Hurr had not become a citizen when the deed to Kallock was made, it was void. Counsel for Libby say this was error, because the special allotments to the chiefs and head men of the Tribe, authorized by the third article of the Treaty, were not subject to this rule, which applied only to the ordinary Indian who was not supposed to be capable of taking care of himself in such a contract of sale.

In support of this view much stress is laid upon the use of the words "fee simple," in describing the estate conferred upon these head men by the third article, which is not used in that conferring title on the others in article 7.

The title conveyed to Hurr by the patent was a fee simple; that is, it was all the title or interest in the land. No one shared this title, or had any interest in it, and it descended, or would have descended, to his heirs. The restriction on his right to convey did not deprive the title of the character of a fee simple estate. "An estate in fee simple is where a man has an estate in lands or tenements to him and his heirs forever." 4 Comyn's Digest, 1, article, Estates. The limitation of the power of sale for five years is not inconsistent with a fee simple estate. Such also, seems to have been the practice of the government in other Treaties referred to by counsel in their brief. 7 Stat. at L. pp. 348 et seq.

The embodiment of the stipulation required by the seventh article of the Treaty in the patent to Hurr shows the construction of the executive department of the government, that it was applicable to the land granted by the third section, as Hurr's acceptance of it seems to imply his acquiescence in it.

Two decisions of the Supreme Court of Kansas on the same subject give this construction to the Treaty. The opinion of that court in the present case (14 Kan. 435) is an able examination of the question, and we concur in the views there stated.

The judgment of that court is affirmed.

NORWICH AND NEW YORK TRANSPORTATION COMPANY.

(See S. C. "The City of Norwich" Reporter's ed. 468-506; 526-541.)

Admiralty—Limited Liability Act of 1851 construed—when owner entitled to benefits of Act—when value of owner's interest to be estimated—what freight included—insurance, not included—limitation applicable in proceedings in rem—right to limitation, not lost by surrender to underwriters—practice.

*In a case of collision occasioned by the negligence of the officers or hands of one of the vessels, without any neglect, privity or knowledge of her owner, and where said vessel took fire and sank with loss of cargo, and never completed her voyage nor earned any freight, but was afterwards raised and repaired, and was then libeled and seized on behalf of the owners of her cargo, and claimed and bonded at her then value by her owner, who filed an answer and a petition for limited liability; and where it further appeared that the owner received certain moneys for insurance of the ship against loss by fire, it was held:

1. That the owner was entitled to a limitation of liability to the value of its interest in ship and freight under the Act of 1851. §§ 4282–4287 R. S.

2. That the point of time at which the amount or value of the owner's interest in ship and freight is to be taken for fixing its liability is the termination of the voyage on which the loss or damage occurs.

3. That if the ship is lost at sea, or the voyage be otherwise broken up before arriving at her port of destination, the voyage is then terminated for the purpose of fixing the owner's liability.

4. That in the present case, the voyage was terminated when the ship had sunk, and that her value at that time was the limit of the owners' liability; and that the subsequent raising of the wreck and repair of the ship, giving her an increased value, had nothing to do with the liability of the owner.

5. That no freight except what is earned is to be estimated in fixing the amount of the owner's liability.

6. That insurance is no part of the owner's interest in the ship or freight within the meaning of the law, and does not enter into the amount for which the owner is held liable.

7. That the limitation of liability is applicable to proceedings in rem against the ship, as well as to proceedings in personam against the owner; the limitation extends to the owner's property as well as to his person.

8. That the right to proceed for a limitation of liability is not lost or waived by a surrender of the ship to underwriters.

9. In this case, although an application for limitation of liability had been originally overruled by the district court, and an interlocutory decree had been rendered in favor of the libelants for their entire damage, with a reference for proofs and a report by the master; yet the court, after the decision of this court in Norwich Co. v. Wright, 13 Wall. 104 [80 U. S. bk. 20, 585], relating to the same collision, and the promulgation of the additional rules adopted by this court, received a new petition and ordered a new appraisement to ascertain the value of the ship whilst lying sunk; and made a decree limiting the liability of the owner to the value at that time. Held, that the district court had jurisdiction to receive such new petition and to take such proceedings.

Argued, Nov. 16, 17, 1885. Decided May 10, 1886.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of New York. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court. See, also, the following cases of Dyer v. National Steam Navigation Company, and Thommessen v. Whitwill.

Mr. J. Langdon Ward, for Place and others, appellants:

The sum received by the petitioners from the insurance companies as indemnity for the damage caused to The City of Norwich by fire, with interest from the date of its receipt, should have been included in the appraisement of the petitioners' interest as owners in that vessel.

The Act of 1851 provides that the liability of the owner or owners of the vessel for damage caused, as in the present case, "without the privity or knowledge of such owner or owners, shall in no case exceed the amount or value of the interest of such owner or owners respectively in such ship or vessel and her freight then pending;" and then provides that where loss has been suffered by several owners of property, exceeding the whole value of the ship or vessel, and her freight for the voyage, they shall receive compensation from the owner or owners in proportion to their respective losses, and that anyone interested may take appropriate proceedings for the apportioning of the sum among the parties entitled thereto. The statute then provides that a transfer by the owner or owners of his or their interest in such ship or vessel and freight, for the benefit of the claimants, to a trustee to be appointed shall be deemed a sufficient compliance with the Act on his or their part.

The whole difficulty which has arisen in the application of this statute has been caused by doubt as to the precise time at which the value of the interest of the owners in the vessel, in each particular case, ought to be estimated. The point has been presented to this court on three occasions:

Acquiescing entirely in each of the above expositions of the law, as applicable to the cases in which they were made, and the points in decision, it seems to us that neither is sufficiently comprehensive to meet all the cases which might arise.

The North Star, 106 U. S. 17 (Bk. 27, L. ed. 91).

It seems to us that the meaning and intent of the Legislature, in the enactment of this statute, was to constitute the owners of a vessel—on the instant of the happening of any event by reason of which damage might result to others, for which they were or might be liable and for which they desired to limit their liability under the statute—trustees, holding the vessel and everything which might be realized from her thereafter during that voyage for the benefit of the sufferers.

Statutes must, if possible, be so construed as to operate with uniformity in all cases; and we believe that on no other theory can absolute uniformity be secured in the operation of this statute.

The responsibility of the vessel owner for damages caused by collision with another vessel, in a case where his responsibility for those damages would be limited by the statute, would arise from his responsibility for the act of his master or mariners, his servants, and would be an action for trespass on the case.

It is settled law that in such an action the right of action accrues at the instant of the commission of the fault, even though the resulting damages may not be suffered for some time afterwards.

Argall v. Bryant, 1 Sandf. 98; Wilcox v. Plummer's Exrs. 4 Pet. 172 (29 U. S. bk. 7, L. ed. 821).

Such being the case, it seems to us equitably and fairly within the meaning of the law, that at the instant of the occurrence by which the liability of the ship owner is fixed, the ship itself and the freight that may be earned on that voyage should be deemed appropriated to the satisfaction of the resulting damages, and so it was held under the Statute, 53 Geo. III. chap. 159, the wording of which was entirely similar to the Act of 1851.

Dobree v. Schroder, 6 Simon, 291.

Our statute, it is true, provides that the owner may be deemed to have complied with the Act, if he shall transfer his interest in the vessel to a trustee; and hence, it has been argued and held, that our Act did not adopt the rule of the English Act. This is true, for under our Act, to some extent, the perils necessarily attending the completion of the voyage by the offending ship must be borne by the sufferer; but surely it could not have been in the contemplation of the Legislature that an owner whose ship was pledged to her full value, to answer for damages suffered, should thereafter benefit by any occurrence to that ship which should at the same time diminish the remedy of the sufferers against her.

Waldron v. Willard, 17 N. Y. 466.

If this proposition is correct, it is manifest that the rule enunciated by this court in the case of The Scotland, 105 U. S. 24 (Bk. 26, L. ed. 1001), that the liability of the owners is measured "by the value of the ship as she comes back into port," though correct in its results as applied to the point then in mind, was not intended as a universal rule applicable to all possible cases; and it would also follow that if in the case last supposed the vessel primarily liable for damage to her cargo, instead of being a total loss by reason of a subsequent collision was damaged thereby only to the extent of a portion of her value, whether greater or less, the right of action against the offending ship for that damage should also pass to the trustee under the assignment; otherwise the law would be uncertain in its application and the owner would benefit by that which reduced the security of the pledgees; and it would also result that the rule suggested in Norwich Co. v. Wright, 13 Wall. 104 (80 U. S. bk. 20, L. ed. 585), and interpreted in The Benefactor, 103 U. S. 239 (Bk. 26, L. ed. 351), "that the value of the ship at the time of the surrender, if surrender is made in a reasonable time, would furnish a proper criterion of the amount of liability," though unquestionably correct in its application to the case as then in the mind of the court, is not to be interpreted as a universal rule applicable to all cases.

Again; if the proposition above stated is correct, it would seem to follow by parity of reasoning that if, by reason of the act or occurrence out of which their liability to the freighters arose, or of any subsequent occurrence to the ship on the same voyage, their vessel suffered damage for which her owners received compensation from any source (as, for instance, underwriters) moneys so received should be held as received to the use of the injured freighters and be held to pass under the assignment.

It has been urged in opposition to this view that the contract of insurance is a personal contract, and by the transfer of the insured property before the loss, right of action is gone and there remains no insurable interest in the holder; and, therefore, if the transfer contemplated by the Act were made before the loss, the trustee would have no right of action against the insurance company, and that this is a conclusive argument against the inclusion of the insurance moneys in the assignment of the interest of the owners in their vessel.

There are two answers to this position. In the first place, if as matter of fact the transfer to a trustee were made before the occurrence of subsequent disaster, there would be an opportunity for, and it would be the duty of, the trustee to insure the property forthwith, and by delay on the part of the owners for their own benefit in taking such a course the sufferers should not be prejudiced; and second, that in the case at bar the moneys have been collected from the insurance companies and received by the owners; and we say that, under the statute, the common case is presented of the legal title to property vested in one person and the beneficial interest in another. In analogous cases it has been uniformly held that if the loss or damage occurs to the property, and the holders of the legal title receive compensation therefor, they receive it for the benefit of the holders of the beneficial interest.

Wyman v. Wyman, 26 N. Y. 253; Burbank v. Rockingham Mut. F. Ins. Co. 4 Foster, 550; Beach v. Bowery F. Ins. Co. 8 Abb. Pr. 261, note; Parry v. Ashley, 3 Sim. Ch. 97; Ins. Co. v. Updegraff, 21 Pa. St. 513; Gates v. Smith, 4 Edw. Ch. 702; Eagle's Case, 3 Abb. Pr. 218-235.

We say that cases of this kind, where the benefit of the statute is sought, should be treated in all respects as if the ship owner had died at the instant of the commission of the wrong, and his ship had become the property of the sufferers of damage as his next of kin.

"If the principal has derived any benefit from such acts of the agent, to the extent of that benefit he is responsible, upon the principles of natural justice; and no man ought to be enriched by the loss and injury of another."

The Rebecca, 1 Ware, 188, 206.

The correctness of this principle and its solid foundation in morals cannot be questioned. We think it has a direct application to the case at bar and, properly applied, demonstrates that the moneys received by the appellee from the insurance companies should be surrendered by it to the appellants. The liability of the appellee to the appellants for the damage suffered by the latter arises from the wrongful act of the master of the steamboat "City of Norwich" in so navigating his vessel as to cause the collision. Under the Act of 1851 these appellants were entitled to indemnification for this damage, out of the offending vessel the "City of Norwich."

The fire reduced the value of the vessel, and this reduction has been made good to the appellee by the insurance. But the fire, as the court below held, was a consequence of the collision. It was, therefore, a result of the wrongful act of the master; and, unless the appellee shall turn over these moneys to the appellants, it has so profited to their injury; that is to say, to the extent of the moneys received from the insurance companies, it has derived a benefit from the wrongful act of its own agent; and, unless the moneys so received from the insurance companies shall be applied to the satisfaction of the appellants' claims, it will to that extent have been enriched by the loss and injury of the appellants.

If it be replied that the moneys received from the insurance companies were received by reason of the contract of insurance and the premiums paid by the appellee, we say that it is true; but that, notwithstanding the contract of insurance and the moneys paid as premium, except for the wrongful act of the master in causing the collision and consequent fire appellee would not have received these moneys, and that the proximate cause of their receipt was the fire and the act of the master, and not the contract of insurance and premium.

Within the manifest purview and intent of the Act of 1851, both damages and insurance not only equitably but actually represent the vessel; and we most earnestly urge upon this court that it should not, unless compelled by some binding authority, adopt such a construction of the Act of 1851 as will impose upon courts in future the necessity of working out manifest equities by circuitous methods and fine-drawn subtleties, when, by the simple construction which we claim for that Act, absolute equity will be attained without difficulty in all cases.

Messrs. C. R. Ingersoll and Huntley and Lowe for Wright and others, appellants:

The court below erred in not apportioning among the sufferers by the steamer's fault the whole value of the owners' interest in the offending vessel at the time the limitation of liability was sought; such value being fixed by the stipulation at $70,000.

That the stipulation taken upon the release of the vessel from custody is (independently of any peculiar provision) a substitute for the released vessel, and that the rights and remedies of all parties interested in the released vessel remain unaffected by the substitution, and are to be regarded precisely the same as though the vessel itself was now in court, as the actual res to be subjected to its decrees, we suppose, will be conceded.

United States v. Ames, 99 U. S. 42 (Bk. 25, L. ed. 300); The Wanata, 95 U. S. 611 (Bk. 24, L. ed. 461).

Our contention will be that the sole purpose of the statute is to limit the liability of the ship owner to his interest in the ship, but within that limit to leave his liability and, necessarily, the remedy of the creditor, as it was under the maritime law before the enactment of the statute.

When this statute was enacted, the general maritime law as administered, not only in the United States where no limitation of the ship owner's liability by federal law obtained, but in Continental Europe and England also, where the limitation existed, entitled the lien creditor to the full amount of the owner's interest in the vessel as that interest might be at the time of its appropriation for his benefit.

And this maritime lien or hypothecation of the vessel adheres to the ship from the moment it attaches as a proprietary interest—a jus in re—and travels with her wherever she may go and in whatever condition she may be, so long as her identity as a ship is preserved.

1 Jacobsen, Sea Laws, chap. 1, p. 15; Reddie, Law, Mar. Com. 89; 2 Kay, Law Shipmasters and Seamen, 975; Williams and Bruce Adm. Jur. 65; The Aline, 1 W. Rob. 111; The Europa, 2 Moore, P. C. (N. S.) 1; The Charles Amelia, 2 L. R. Adm. 330; The Bold Buccleugh, 7 Moore, P. C. 267.

The source and origin of this lien is to be found in that ancient rule of the maritime law which gave a sort of personality to the ship, and imposed a responsibility for the faults of its navigation upon her as the offender or guilty thing, irrespective of the personality of her owner.

The dictum of Dr. Lushington in The Druid, 1 W. Rob. 398, that "The liability of the ship, and the responsibility of the owners, are convertible terms," has not passed unquestioned in England (Marsden on Collision 2d ed. 1885, 86, n), and if it has the meaning apparently given to it by the learned judge, in Petition of N. & N. Y. Trans. Co. 17 Blatchf. 237, that the ship is only liable through the owner, and the owner never through the ship, we venture to say does not correctly express the principle by which the maritime law determines the liability of the ship. And that Dr. Lushington did not so intend is, we think, clear by his opinion in the case of The Aline, 1 W. Rob., 111.

See The Malek Adhel, 2 How. 234 (43 U. S. bk. 11, L. ed. 239); The China, supra; Freeman v. Buckingham, 18 How. 189 (59 U. S. bk. 15, L. ed. 341).

And out of this responsibility which the maritime law imposes upon the offending vessel has grown the peculiar remedy of the court of admiralty, in rem. Its sole purpose is to enforce the lien by which the ship is bound.

The Rock Island Bridge, 6 Wall. 215 (73 U. S. bk. 18, L. ed. 754).

It was also out of this ancient distinction between the liability of the vessel and the liability of the person, that grew the mode by which the principle (grafted upon the Roman law by the maritime law) of limiting the personal liability of the shipowner to his sea fortune, was carried into effect.

The shipowner was allowed to discharge himself from his personal liability by abandoning to his creditor the ship and freight.

But he could not by any act limit the liability of the ship, nor impair in any degree the remedy which the maritime law gave the creditor in rem.

In Norwich Company v. Wright, 13 Wall. 104 (80 U. S. bk. 20, L. ed. 585), it is justly said that, "The learned opinion of Judge Ware in the case of The Rebecca leaves little to be desired on the subject" of the history of the maritime law in this respect.

The sea fortune of the owner, which he exposes to hypothecation and risk, is his ship, however its value may fluctuate from time to time.

Under the maritime law as administered in France, we understand that the shipowner who should, after a collision resulting in serious damage to his vessel, repair his vessel fully and for a new voyage, would be held to have elected not to abandon, and therefore could not thereafter set up his privilege of limitation against the creditor.

Upon this review of the maritime law as it was administered when the Act of Congress of March, 1851, was passed, it is plain that at that time the sufferer by collision, in this country, had his remedy against the offending vessel, to the full extent of the value of the owner's interest in that vessel at the time when such value was sought to be appropriated for his benefit.

Has this remedy been taken from him by the Act of March 3, 1851?

There is a twofold purpose in this statute. One purpose is to limit the shipowner's liability in every case of loss without his privity to the value of his interest in the vessel and pending freight; the other, to apportion that value among the sufferers by the wrong, in the special case where there are several on the same voyage and the whole value of the vessel and freight is not sufficient to make compensation to each of them.

The principle of limiting the shipowner's liability to the value of his interest in the ship comes, as we have seen, from the maritime law of Continental Europe; the principle of apportioning such value among the sufferers where the claimants are more than one, from the equity system of England.

But it must be conceded, we think, that the rule for measuring the shipowner's liability which the statute intends is a rule of uniform application—that is, a rule which will provide the same measure whether the creditor claimant be one or several, or whether the mode of applying that measure shall be by the specified mode of a "transfer," or any other appropriate proceeding.

We understand the circuit court to have held that the liability of the appellee, as owner of the steamer, is limited by the Act to the value of the vessel "as she was immediately after the injury was inflicted;" and as, in the opinion of the circuit court, "no liability can rest upon the vessel which does not exist against the owner;" therefore no liability can rest upon the vessel which will not be extinguished by the payment into court of a sum of money equivalent to "the value of the offending ship in the condition in which she was immediately after the disaster."

This construction of the statute we contest.

It is not easily understood why, if Congress had intended any such radical change of the maritime law of the country—a change so radical that it, in effect, does away with the ancient maritime rule that the maritime lien travels with the keel, and can only be extinguished by a sale, or its equivalent, of the vessel—the intention should not have been clearly expressed.

And in construing the statute it should be borne in mind that if its principle is not "tyrannical," as it is said to be in The Ettrick, 6 L. R. Prob. Div. 127, it is, certainly, as is said in The Benares, 14 Jur. 581, and approved by Judge Sprague in Allen v. Mackay, 1 Sprague, 224, "an intrenchment, so far as it goes, on the general principle of every man being entitled to recover the whole of his loss from the individual who inflicts it, and, therefore, must not be extended beyond the fair import of its language."

The reasoning of the circuit court we understand to be this: that, in cases of collision, the statute (1) measures the owner's liability by the value of his vessel immediately after the collision; and (2) as the vessel's liability is measured by the owner's liability, therefore, (3) the vessel is only liable to the extent of her value as she came out of the collision.

We deny both this conclusion and its premise.

If the freighter obtained a maritime lien upon the vessel as an element of his contract of affreightment, and the owners of the injured vessel a like lien upon the instant of the injury, we fail to find anything in the statute to impair the force of those liens, whatever may be the limitation it places upon the owner's liability, or the sufferer's remedy in personam.

We submit that the course of reasoning of the circuit court should be reversed, and that the premise should be that the statute expresses but one measure for the owner's liability, and that is the value of the vessel when it shall be transferred for the benefit of the creditor; and from this premise the only sound conclusion is that where there is an existing vessel, the owner's liability is, therefore, the value of that vessel when either the vessel itself or its representative value shall be appropriated for the benefit of the creditor.

In Norwich Company v. Wright, 13 Wall. 104 (80 U. S. bk. 20, L. ed. 585), this court discovered the intention of Congress as to the measure of the shipowner's liability in "the provision for the shipowner to discharge himself, as in the maritime law, by giving up the vessel and freight."

But if this provision of a transfer is decisive evidence, as the court found it to be, of the intention of the statute to measure the owner's liability by the value of the vessel at some time after the collision, is it not with greater reason decisive evidence that the statute intends the absolute liability to remain until the owner shall either transfer the vessel "in compliance with the requirements of the Act," or do some other equivalent thing? And does it not necessarily follow that the equivalent thing to do must be something which will give to the claimants the value of the vessel at the time the thing was done? And that therefore, if the owner may pay value into court instead of transferring the vessel to a trustee, such value must be the value of the vessel as she then is when the payment into court is made?

If this is not so, the statute is open to the objection that it provides two differing measures of liability: one furnished by the value of the vessel when transferred, in specie, and the other by her value in money at some other time.

From the decision that the value of the vessel which measures the owner's liability is its value after the collision, and not before, because of the statute provision of transfer, it necessarily follows that the transfer intended by the statute is a present transfer. For if the provision is open to the construction that the transfer may be as of any past time, it may as well mean a time before the collision as after.

The Benefactor, 103 U. S. 246 (Bk. 26, L. ed. 351); The Scotland, 105 U. S. 24 (Bk. 26, L. ed. 1001).

If the transfer has any force by the statute whatever, it must be the force given it by the court in The Benefactor. It must carry to the creditor the value of the vessel at the time when the limit of the owner's liability arises, which is not until the transfer is made. Then, and not till then, his liability becomes wholly real, and ceases to be at all personal.

The only other provision of the statute concerning the single creditor, whose case we are now considering, is that of section 8 of the original Act: the general provision that the liability of the owner, etc., "shall in no case exceed the amount or value of the interest of such owner or owners, respectively, in such ship or vessel and her freight then pending."

But this declaration is in close harmony with the provision of a transfer. If the provision for a transfer requires the owner to transfer his whole present interest in the vessel for the benefit of the creditor, the inference is necessary and unavoidable that this declaration means that in the case of an existing wrong-doing vessel which can be transferred, the liability of the owner shall not exceed the amount or value of the interest therein which the owner is required to transfer if he elects to transfer anything.

The declaration of section 8 is only the declaration of the maritime law that the shipowner, in the cases there mentioned, may, if he chooses, restrict his creditor to the remedy which the maritime law gives him in rem against the vessel: or, as it is expressed in The China, the "primary liability" is regarded as upon the vessel and the limitation "limits the creditor to this part of the owner's property."

For the statute makes no attempt to interfere with the ordinary jurisdiction of the admiralty court in rem. Indeed this provision for a transfer "to a trustee" seems to have been intended for the purpose of affording the state or common-law courts a method of applying the statute analogous to that which is peculiar to the admiralty court.

The section of the statute providing, with distinctness, for an apportionment, in the case of several claimants, of "the sum for which the owner may be liable among the parties entitled thereto," is also in entire harmony with the position we have sought to maintain.

What is the sum here referred to? Obviously the sum which is "not sufficient to make compensation to each" of these parties; and that sum is the "whole value of the vessel and freight for the voyage;" and that vessel is the vessel which, by the maritime law, is bound, and as she is bound, to make that compensation. And this is the value which, as we have seen, the creditor is entitled to receive by the statutory transfer.

In this discussion we have purposely kept in mind the case of an existing vessel—existing at the time when the application of the statute is sought. For that is the case of these appellants. In fact their case is that, not of an actually existing vessel merely, but of such a vessel lying under actual condemnation of the admiralty court.

The question concerning these appellants is simply whether this statute has the effect to discharge a vessel so situated from its obligations in any other way than by the usual one in which such obligations may be discharged in an admiralty court.

Messrs. Jeremiah Halsey and J. W. C. Leveridge, for appellee:

There are now, as there would have been if the steamer had been in the custody of the court when this petition was filed, only two questions to be considered:

1. Is the petitioner entitled to the limitation which the statute gives?

2. What is the amount at which the statute fixes such limitation?

That it is entitled to such limitation was settled by this court in the case of Norwich C. v. Wright, 13 Wall. 104 (80 U. S. bk. 20, L. ed. 585), and this proceeding was by that decision expressly authorized, and has been taken in strict conformity with it and the rules there established.

In that case this court held that "the rule of the maritime law was intended to be adopted," and that the owner's liability was limited to the value of his interest in the vessel and her freight, viz.: to that value which the owner would have been compelled under the general maritime law to surrender in order to be discharged from liability.

This amount has been fixed and accurately fixed by the report of the commissioner in this proceeding.

The valuation of the steamer at the time the stipulation was taken in the Place suit and after she had been raised and repaired in no way affects that amount, which is always the same whether the vessel is repaired or not.

See "The Benefactor," 103 U. S. 239 (Bk. 26, L. ed. 351); 17 Blatchf., 229.

Care should be taken to discriminate between the rule of limitation of liability and the proceedings to be taken to obtain such limitation.

The rule of limitation, under the maritime law, is that the liability is limited to the ship and the freight; i. e., to the property which the shipowner put at risk for the expedition in question—to his sea fortune, and not his property on land.

Our statute contains both a rule of limitation and proceedings to obtain the benefit of it. The rule of limitation which it awards is, as was decided by the supreme court, the rule of the maritime law.

The proceedings which it provides are two: (1) appropriate proceedings before a competent court; (2) a transfer to a trustee by the shipowner or shipowners "of his or their interest in such vessel or freight."

And furthermore the defense of limited liability may be availed of by answer or plea, at least so far as to obtain protection against the libelants in a suit in admiralty, to recover for the damages caused by the collision; and where there is a total loss of ship and freight, the statute may be invoked as a full defense.

The Scotland, 105 U. S. 24 (Bk. 26, L. ed. 1001); Thommesen v. Whitwill, 21 Blatchf. C. C. 45.

Whatever be the proceeding, the rule of limitation must be the same.

The question raised by the claim of the appellants, that the amount collected of the insurers should have been included in the appraisement, has not been expressly determined by this court; but expressions used in various opinions indicate that ship owners are liable under the Act for such insurance.

The Benefactor, supra, 246 (854); The North Star, 106 U. S. p. 29 (Bk. 27, L. ed. 96); Norwich Co. v. Wright, supra, 126 (593); The Scotland, supra, 28 (1002); Moore v. Am. Trans. Co. 24 How. 39 (65 U. S. bk. 16, L. ed. 674.)

The decisions of the district and circuit courts have been uniform against the claim of the appellants.

Watson v. Marks, 2 Am. Law. Reg. 157; 8 Ben. p. 317; 17 Blatchf. 238; The Peshtigo, 2 Flip. 466; Thommesen v. Whitwill, supra; The City of Columbus, 22 Fed. Rep. 460.

"The amount or value of the interest of such owner in such vessel and her freight then pending," which is made the measure of his liability, means simply the value of his interest or share.

The construction of section 4283, is aided by the language of section 4284, being section 4 of the original Act, which describes the liability as "the whole value of the vessel and her freight for the voyage."

All claims for damages arising from the disaster stand upon an equality when the whole value is insufficient to make full compensation; and the measure of the owner's liability is the same whether he surrenders his interest under section 4285, or takes "appropriate proceedings" under section 4284.

The "whole value of the vessel and freight for the voyage" is clearly the limit of the liability; and in the case of part owners, each is liable only for the value of his interest or share in the ship.

This construction gives full effect to the language of each section, and renders them harmonious.

The entire exemption from damage by fire given by section 4282 tends to show that insurance was not included in the amount of the owner's liability, under section 4283.

The Act should be fairly construed for the furtherance of the object in view. It was enacted "to encourage persons to become the owners of ships," and to encourage navigation and commerce.

This court, from the case of The City of Norwich, supra, to the case of the Providence & N. Y. S. S. Co. v. Hill Mfg. Co. 109 U. S. 578 (Bk. 27, L. ed. 1038), has manifested no hostility to the Act, but has construed and applied its provisions in a liberal spirit, and in a manner to promote the great and important benefits which it was intended to confer upon the shipping interests of this country.

This case arose out of a collision which occurred on Long Island Sound, opposite Huntington, on the 18th of April, 1866, between the Steamboat "City of Norwich," belonging to the Norwich and New York Transportation Company, the appellee, and the schooner "General S. Van Vliet," belonging to William A. Wright and others, appellants, by which the schooner and her cargo were sunk and lost, and the steamboat was set on fire and sunk, and her cargo lost. The owners of the schooner filed a libel in personam in the District Court of the United States for the District of Connecticut, against the owners of the steamboat, and obtained a decree for about $20,000 for the schooner, and about $2,000 for her cargo, with interest. Before the decree was passed, the respondent filed a petition, stating that proceedings in rem had been commenced against the steamboat in the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of New York, for the recovery of damages for the loss of the cargo on board said steamboat; and it prayed leave to show the whole amount of damages sustained by all parties, and the value of the steamer and her freight then pending; and that the libelant might have a decree for only such proportion of damages sustained by it as the value of steamer and freight bore to the whole amount of damages sustained by all parties by the collision, this claim being made under the Limited Liability Act of 1851. The district court denied the prayer of this petition, holding that it had no jurisdiction to give relief. On appeal to the circuit court the decree was affirmed and the petition for limitation of liability was denied, on the ground that cases of collision were not within the Act. The case then came to this court, and we held, first, that [470] the Act of 1851 adopted the general maritime law in reference to limited liability as contradistinguished from the English law, measuring the liability by the value of ship and freight after, instead of before, the collision; secondly, that the Act embraced cases of damage received by collision as well as cases of injury to the cargo of the offending ship; thirdly, that the District Courts of the United States, as courts of admiralty, have jurisdiction to administer the law; fourthly, that the proper court to hear and determine the question is the court which has possession of the fund, that is, the ship and freight or the proceeds and value thereof. And in view of the want of rules of procedure, and of any uniform practice on the subject, we directed that proceedings should be suspended in the District Court of Connecticut, in order to give the respondent an opportunity of making the proper application to the District Court of the Eastern District of New York, which had possession of the steamer, or a stipulation for her value in lieu of the steamer itself. We also adopted some general rules of practice for the aid and guidance of the district courts in such cases. 18 Wall. 104 [80 U. S. bk. 20, L. ed. 585].

The libel in rem, filed in the District Court for the Eastern District of New York, was filed by George Place and Charles Place (now appellants here) in August, 1866, after the steamboat had been raised and carried to the shore of Long Island and repaired. The Norwich and New York Transportation Company appeared as claimant, and filed an answer and a petition to have the benefit of the Act of 1851 for a limitation of its liability to the value of the steamboat and freight pending at the time of the collision and fire. Other libels were also filed by other owners of cargo. The steamer as repaired was appraised at $70,000.

On the 13th day of June, 1872, after the decision of this court was rendered in the case of Norwich and N. Y. Trans. Co. v. Wright, the Company, by leave of the court, filed a new petition in the District Court for the Eastern District of New York for the benefit of limited liability under the Act of 1851, conformably to the rules adopted by this court.

The petition stated the various claims against [47] the vessel arising out of the collision (amounting to nearly $150,000), the previous proceedings that had been taken, the libels that had been filed, the circumstances of the loss, the raising and repair of the vessel, etc.; and prayed for a new appraisement in accordance with the decision of this court, a monition to claimants, etc., as will more fully appear in the finding of facts made by the circuit court, hereinafter stated.

Orders for publication and appraisement were made pursuant to the prayer of the petition, and the commissioner appointed to make the appraisement reported as follows, to wit:

"In ascertaining the value of the steamboat City of Norwich, as directed by the order of reference herein, I have followed what I understood to have been the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Wright against the owners of this boat (18 Wall. 104), and have ascertained her value in the situation and condition she was in after the collision and before she was raised; and I find from the testimony taken before me that she was at that time of the value of $2,500. I have arrived at such value by taking the testimony as to her value in New York after she was raised by her owners and brought there, which shows that she was then and there worth the sum of $25,000; and I have deducted from that amount the sum of $22,500, being the sum which, according to the testimony, it had actually cost to raise her and bring her to New York, which leaves $2,500 to be her value, as I have above stated."

Exceptions were taken to the report: first, that the former appraisement of $70,000 was binding on the parties and the court; secondly, that the appraisement should have been for the value of the steamer immediately before the collision; thirdly, that it should have been for the value immediately after the collision, before the occurrence of damage by the fire; fourthly, that there should have been no deduction for the expenses of raising the steamer; fifthly, that the sum of $600 should have been added for the pending freight; sixthly, that the money received for insurance on the vessel should have been added, amounting to $49,283.07.

[472] The exceptions were overruled, and a decree was made authorizing the petitioners to pay into court the sum of $2,500, the value of the steamer, and directing a monition to issue, citing all parties interested to appear and prove their claims, restraining the further prosecution of all suits, and appointing a commissioner to take proof of claims. On the subsequent report of the commissioner a final decree was made in January, 1879, distributing the fund in court and discharging the petitioners from further demands.

The case was appealed to the circuit court and argued before Mr. Justice Strong, who, in October, 1879, affirmed the decree of the district court, but the decree of affirmance was not entered until July 3, 1882. That decree is now before us for review.

The finding of facts by the circuit court is substantially as follows:

1. It states the fact of the collision, and that "it was caused by the negligence of the steamboat's officers or hands, without any design, neglect, privity or knowledge of her owners. Very soon, within half an hour after the collision, the boat took fire, her deck and upper works were burned off, and she sunk in about twenty fathoms of water. The fire was the direct consequence of the collision and inseparable from it. It was caused by the rushing of the waters through the broken hull of the boat, whereby the fire was driven out of the furnaces upon the wood work, and the boat sank by reason of her filling with water.

"2. At the time of the disaster the boat had a cargo of merchandise on board belonging to different freighters, all of which was totally lost. The freight then pending amounted to $600, but none of it was earned or received by the ship owners.

"3. Sometime after the steamboat was sunk and her cargo destroyed, she was raised by salvors and taken to the Long Island shore, within the Port of New York, where she was repaired."

4. It states the suit by Wright & Co., in the District Court of the United States for the District of Connecticut, and the decision of the supreme court in that case.

5. It states the proceedings upon libel filed by George and Charles Place in the District Court for the Eastern District of New York, [473] the appraisement at $70,000, and the release of the vessel to the complainant (The Norwich & N. Y. Trans. Co.) upon its giving stipulation therefor, adding: "The stipulation purported to be for the security not only of the Messrs. Place, but also for the benefit of all persons who might, by due proceedings in said court, show themselves entitled to liens upon the vessel by reason of said collision. The appraisement was of the value of the vessel as it was after she had been raised and repaired. It was returned into the court on the 11th of March, 1867, and the stipulation in the amount of the appraisement was filed on the 29th day of the same month. On the 20th day of December, 1869, the district court ordered decrees to be entered in favor of the libelants in all the suits commenced against the steamer as aforesaid.

"6. Such was the condition of the litigation when the present petition was filed in July, 1879, after the rendition of the judgment by the supreme court in the case of the libel of William A. Wright et al. in the District Court of Connecticut. The petition prayed that, in conformity with the Act of Congress, the decision of the supreme court, and the admiralty rules made in pursuance thereof, the court would cause an appraisement to be made of the value of the interest of the petitioner in the steamboat, and her freight for the voyage in which she was employed, for which it was liable; and that an order should be made for paying the amount of such valuation into court, or for giving a stipulation therefor, with sureties. It prayed further for a monition against all the persons claiming damages arising out of the said collision and fire, citing them to appear and make proof of their claims; and it prayed also for a restraining order against the further prosecution of all or any suits against the steamboat or the petitioner for any damage caused by the collision, fire and loss. There was also a prayer for general relief. The monition was issued, the appellants appeared, and an order was made for an appraisement of the amount or value of the interest of the petitioners as owners, respectively, of said steamboat and her freight, pending for the voyage upon which she [474] was employed, for which the petitioners were liable. A restraining order, as prayed for, was also made. Pursuant to the direction of the court, an appraisement was made. The appraiser ascertained and reported the value of the steamboat, as she lay immediately after the collision and fire, and before she was raised, to have been $2,500; and the district court confirmed the report and ordered the amount to be paid into the registry, which was accordingly done.

"7. The value of the interest of the petitioners in the steamboat, as she was immediately after the disaster, was $2,500 and no more.

"8. The value of that interest immediately before the collision was $70,000.

"9. When the collision occurred the steamboat was insured against fire (not against marine disaster), and upon the several policies the petitioners, as owners, have recovered from the underwriters the sum of $49,288.07; that part of said sum was recovered by the petitioner herein in an action brought by it in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Connecticut on one of said five policies against the Western Massachusetts Insurance Company. One of the defenses in that action was that the loss and damages were occasioned by the collision (which is the same mentioned in these proceedings), while the petitioner herein claimed that the greater part of the loss was by fire. The court held in that case that there were two classes of losses: one, the damage done the steamer by the collision itself, and the other caused by the fire. The damages caused by the collision were proved at $15,000. The damages caused by the fire were determined to be $69,000. The said insurance company moved for a new trial, but the motion was denied.

"10. The steamboat itself has never been surrendered or transferred to a trustee for the persons injured by her fault."

The conclusions at which Justice Strong arrived upon these facts were: 1. That the value of the steamboat immediately after the collision and fire, as she lay at the bottom of the sound, with her pending freight, was the measure of the owners' liability, and the amount to be apportioned. [475] 2. That insurance is not an interest in the vessel within the meaning of the third section of the Act of 1851, or section 4288 of the Revised Statutes. 3. That the limitation of the owners' liability under the Act is as applicable when the proceeding is in rem, as when it is in personam; so that, if the owner's liability is only the amount of the vessel's value when at the bottom of the sound, the vessel's liability, after being raised and repaired, is no greater.

The first ground of error which we shall notice is the alleged want of jurisdiction in the district court to allow a reappraisement of the steamboat for the purpose of fixing her value as the limit of the owner's liability, after her value had once been appraised at $70,000, and she had been delivered to the claimants upon their stipulation for that amount. This ground cannot be maintained, because the question had not then been decided, what particular time was to be taken for fixing the value of the vessel in reference to the limited liability of the owners. They wished to have possession of her, and were willing to give a stipulation for her full value at that time in order to obtain such possession. Had the vessel remained in custody until the final petition for a limited liability was filed, the court would have been at liberty then to determine the time at which the value of the vessel should be taken for that purpose, and to order a new appraisement if necessary. The stipulation given merely stood in place of the vessel itself, and did not deprive the court of any of its power. The subsequent trial on the merits, the interlocutory decree in favor of the libelants, and the report of the commissioner showing the amount of their damage, did not preclude the claimants from exercising their right to proceed for a limitation of their liability under the rules of procedure adopted by this court. The trial on the merits resulted in determining which vessel was in fault, and in liquidating the amount of damage sustained by the libelants, to be used as a basis of their pro rata share in the fund which might ultimately be decreed, subject to their claim and the claims of other parties. It did not settle the amount of that fund, nor the extent of the liability of the owners of the steamer. In the case of The Benefactor, 103 U. S. 239 [Bk. 25, L. ed. 351], this matter was fully considered, and we held that "The amount recovered, whether before the limitation proceedings are commenced or afterwards, and whether in the court of first instance or an appellate court, will stand as the recoveror's basis for pro rata division when the condemned fund is distributed. In all other respects the proceedings for obtaining a limitation of liability may proceed in the ordinary course." In view of the want of any settled practice on the subject, this court, in its opinion in the case of Norwich & N. Y. Trans. Co. v. Wright, suggested the precise course which was taken by the petitioners. (13 Wall. 126.) We think it was the proper course, and that the district court had jurisdiction to entertain the petition, and to order a new appraisement.

The next question to be considered is: At what time ought the value of the vessel and her pend- [490] ing freight to be taken, in fixing the amount of her owners' liability? Ought it to be taken as it was immediately before the collision or afterwards? And if afterwards, at what time afterwards? The first question has been repeatedly answered by the decisions of this court. We held in Norwich Co. v. Wright, and have held and decided in many cases since, that the Act of Congress adopted the rule of the maritime law as contradistinguished from that of the English law on this subject; and that the value of the vessel and freight after, and not before, the collision is to be taken. But at what precise time after the collision this value should be taken has not been fully determined so as to establish a general rule on the subject. That is a question which deserves some consideration. In the case of The Scotland, 105 U. S. 24 [Bk. 26, L. ed. 1001], the collision occurred opposite Fire Island Light, and the steamer, being much injured, put back, in order if possible to return to New York, but was unable to get further than the middle ground outside and south of Sandy Hook, where she sank, and nothing was saved but a few strippings, taken from her before she went down. We held that these strippings were all of the ship that could be valued, although she had run thirty or forty miles after the collision. The value was taken, not as it was, or as it might have been supposed to be, immediately after the collision, but as it was after the effects of the collision were fully developed in the sinking of the ship.

An examination of the statute will afford light on this subject. Section 4288 declares that the liability of the owner of any vessel (for various acts and things mentioned) shall "in no case" exceed the value of his interest in the [491] vessel and her freight then pending. When it says "in no case," does it mean that for each case of "embezzlement, loss, destruction, collision, etc., happening during the whole voyage, his liability may extend to the value of his whole interest in the vessel? Twenty cases might occur in the course of a voyage, and all at different times. Does not the provision made in the 4284th section, for compensation pro rata to each party injured, apply to all cases of loss and damage happening during the entire voyage; happening, that is, by the fault of the master or crew, and without the privity or knowledge of the owner? Pending freight is of no value to the shipowner until it is earned; and it is not earned, if earned at all, until the conclusion of the voyage. Does this not show that every "case" in which the principle of limited liability is to be applied means every voyage? We think it does. It seems to us that the fair inference to be drawn from section 4288 is that the voyage defines the limits and boundary of the casus, or case, to which the law is to be applied.

This is rendered certain by the language of section 4284, which is: "Whenever any such embezzlement, loss, or destruction is suffered by several freighters, or owners of goods, wares, merchandise, or any property whatever, on the same voyage, and the whole value of the vessel, and her freight for the voyage, is not sufficient to make compensation to each of them, they shall receive compensation from the owner of the vessel in proportion to their respective losses." There may be more than one case of embezzlement during the voyage, and more than one case of loss and destruction, and they may happen at different and successive times, yet they are to be compensated pro rata. This shows conclusively that it must be at the termination of the "voyage," that the vessel is to be appraised, and the freight (if any be earned) is to be added to the account for the purpose of showing the amount of the owner's liability.

This conclusion is corroborated by section 4285, which declares that it shall be a sufficient compliance with the requirements of the law if the owner shall transfer his interest in the vessel and freight to a trustee for the benefit of the claimants. In most cases this cannot be done until the voyage is ended, for, until then, the [492] embezzlement, loss, or destruction of property cannot be known.

And this was manifestly the maritime law, for by that law the abandonment of the ship and freight (when not lost) was the remedy of the owners to acquit themselves of liability; and, of course, this could only be done at the termination of the voyage. If the ship was lost, and the voyage never completed, the owners were freed from all liability. Boulay Paty, Droit Com. Mar. tit. III. sec. 1, pp. 263, 265, etc.; Emerigon, Contrats à la Grosse, chap. 4, sec. 11, Subs. 1, 2; Valin, Com. lib. II. tit. VIII. art. II.; Consolato del Mare, chaps. 34 (141), 186 (182), 227 (194), 239; Pardessus, Collection, vol. 2; Cleirac, Nav. de Rivierès, art. XV.

If, however, by reason of the loss or sinking of the ship the voyage is never completed, but is broken up and ended by causes over which the owners have no control, the value of the ship (if it has any value) at the time of such breaking up and ending of the voyage must be taken as the measure of the owners' liability. In most cases of this character no freight will be earned; but if any shall have been earned, it will be added to the value of the ship in estimating the amount of the owners' liability. These consequences are so obvious that no attempt at argument can make them any plainer.

If this view is correct, it follows, as a matter of course, that any salvage operations, undertaken for the purpose of recovering from the bottom of the sea any portion of the wreck, after the disastrous ending of the voyage as above supposed, can have no effect on the question of the liability of the owners. Their liability is fixed when the voyage is ended. The subsequent history of the wreck can only furnish evidence of its value at that point of time. And it makes no difference, in this regard, whether the salvage is effected by the owners, or by any other persons. Having fixed the point of time at which the value is to be taken, the statute does the rest. It declares that the liability of the owner shall in no case exceed the amount or value of the interest of such owner in such vessel and her freight then pending. If the vessel arrives in port in a damaged condition, and earns some freight, the value at that time [493] is the measure of liability; if she goes to the bottom and earns no freight, the value at that time is the criterion. And the benefit of the statute may be obtained, either by abandoning the vessel to the creditors or persons injured, or by having her appraisement made and paying the money into court, or giving a stipulation in lieu of it, and keeping the vessel. This double remedy given by our statute is a great convenience to all parties. It does not make two measures or standards of liability; for the measure is the same whichever course is adopted; but it enables the owner to lay out money in recovering and repairing the ship, without increasing the burden to which he is subjected.

It follows from this that the proper valuation of the steamer was taken in the court below, namely: the value which she had when she had sunk, and was lying on the bottom of the sea. That was the termination of the voyage.

The next question to be considered is whether the petitioners were bound to account for the insurance money received by them for the loss of the steamer, as a part of their interest in the same. The statute, section 4288, declares that the liability of the owner shall not exceed the amount or value of his interest in the vessel and her freight; and section 4285 declares that it shall be a sufficient compliance with the law, if he shall transfer his interest in such vessel and freight, for the benefit of the claimants, to a trustee. Is insurance an interest in the vessel or freight insured, within the meaning of the law? That is the precise question before us.

It seems to us, at first view, that the learned justice who decided the case below was right in holding that the word "interest" was intended to refer to the extent or amount of ownership which the party had in the vessel, such as his aliquot share, if he was only a part owner, or his contingent interest, if that was the character of his ownership. He might be absolute owner of the whole ship, or he might own but a small fractional part of her, or he might have a temporary or contingent ownership of some kind or to some extent. Whatever the extent or character of his ownership might be, that is to say, whatever his interest in the ship might be, the amount or value of that interest was to [494] be the measure of his liability.

This view is corroborated by reference to a rule of law which we suppose to be perfectly well settled, namely: that the insurance which a person has on property is not an interest in the property itself, but is a collateral contract, personal to the insured, guarantying him against loss of the property by fire or other specified casualty, but not conferring upon him any interest in the property. That interest he has already, by virtue of his ownership. If it were not for a rule of public policy against wagers, requiring insurance to be for indemnity merely, he could just as well take out insurance on another's property as on his own, and it is manifest that this would give him no interest in the property. He would have an interest in the event of its destruction or nondestruction; but no interest in the property. A man's interest in property insured is so distinct from the insurance, that unless he has such an interest independent of the insurance, his policy will be void.

This rule of law manifests itself in various ways. If a mortgagor insures the property mortgaged, the mortgagee has no interest in the insurance. He may stipulate that the policy shall be assigned to him, and the mortgagor may agree to assign it; and if it be assigned with the insurer's consent, the mortgagee will then have the benefit of it; or, if not assigned according to agreement, the mortgagee may have relief in equity to obtain the benefit of it.

So where property is sold, the insurance does not follow it, but ceases to have any value, unless the insurer consent to the transfer of the policy to the grantee of the property. In other words, the contract of insurance does not attach itself to the thing insured, nor go with it when it is transferred.

It is hardly necessary to cite authorities for a rule which has become so elementary. We will only refer to a few of them. Lord Chan. King in Lynch v. Dalzell, 4 Bro. Parl. Cas. 497; S. C. 2 Marshall, Ins. 801; Lord Hardwicke in Sadlers Co. v. Badcock, 2 Atk. 554; Carroll v. Boston Marine Ins. Co. 8 Mass. 515; Columbia Ins. Co. v. Lawrence, 10 Pet. 507, 512 [35 U. S. bk. 9, L. ed. 512, 514]; Carpenter v. Providence W. Ins. Co. 16 Pet. 496, 508 [41 U. S. bk. 10, L. ed. 1044, [495] 1048]; Ætna Ins. Co. v. Tyler, 16 Wend. 386, 397; Wilson v. Hill, 3 Met. 68; Powles v. Innes, 11 M. & W. 18; MaDonald v. Black's Admr. 20 Ohio, 185; Plimpton v. Ins. Co. 43 Vt. 497.

Carroll v. Boston Marine Ins. Co., Powles v. Innes, and MaDonald v. Black's Admr., were cases of marine insurance, and the same rule was followed in those cases as in cases of insurance against fire.

It is not an irrelevant consideration in this regard that the owner of the property is under no obligation to have it insured. It is purely a matter of his own option. And being so, it would seem to be only fair and right, and a logical consequence, that if he chooses to insure, he should have the benefit of the insurance. He does not take the price of insurance from the thing insured, but takes it out of the general mass of his estate, to which his general creditors have a right to look for the satisfaction of their claims. They are the creditors who have the best right to the insurance.

Stress is laid upon the hardship of the case. It is said to be unjust that the shipowner should be entirely indemnified for the loss of his vessel, and that the parties who have suffered loss from the collision by the fault of his employees should get nothing for their indemnity. This mode of contrasting the condition of the parties is fallacious. If the shipowner is indemnified against loss, it is because he has seen fit to provide himself with insurance. The parties suffering loss from the collision could, if they chose, protect themselves in the same way. In fact they generally do so; and when they do, it becomes a question between their insurers and the shipowner, whether they or he shall have the benefit of his insurance. His insurers have to pay his loss. Why should not the insurers of the other parties pay their loss? The truth is, that the whole question, after all, comes back to this: whether a limited liability of shipowners is consonant to public policy or not. Congress has declared that it is, and they, and not we, are the judges of that question.

Having, as we think, ascertained the true construction of the statute, the point in dispute is really settled. It is a question of construction, and does not require an examination of the general maritime law to determine it. If the rule [496] of the maritime law is different, the statute must prevail. But from such examination as we have been able to make, we think that the weight of maritime authority is in accord with the disposition of our statute as we have construed it, and that the statute has adopted the maritime law on this point as well as on the question of time for estimating the value of the ship.

The contract of insurance is of modern origin. It is not mentioned in the early treatises or compilations of the maritime law. It is but little noticed prior to the sixteenth century. On a question like the present we naturally turn to the French writers, who are distinguished for their great learning and acumen on maritime subjects. The principal text law on which they rely, prior to the Code of Commerce adopted in the present century, is the Ordinance de la Marine of 1681. By this ordinance it is declared that the owners of ships shall be responsible for the acts of the master; but they shall be discharged therefrom by abandoning their vessel and the freight. The Code of Commerce, art. 216, has substantially the same provision. Beyond this general declaration, which is simply an announcement of the maritime law on the subject, the special rules applicable to particular cases, and necessary for securing the benefit of the general rule in all, have to be drawn from the general principles of the same maritime law. Whether in abandoning the ship to the creditors the owners are, or are not, obliged to abandon the insurance effected on the ship, is a question which had to be decided by the application of the general principles referred to.

The history of opinion amongst maritime writers on this subject is briefly this: Valin and Emerigon, two great French jurists, contemporaries and friends, wrote on the maritime law. In 1760 Valin published his New Commentary on the Ordinance of the Marine of 1681. In 1783 Emerigon published his Treatise on Assurances and Contracts of Bottomry. (Traite des Assurances et Contrats a la Grosse). Emerigon furnished Valin a large portion of the materials of which the latter's commentary was composed. Both of them are regarded as great authorities on maritime law. These jurists differed on the question we are considering. Valin thought that those who furnished materials and supplies for a ship and those who labored on its construction or repair should have the power of transferring their lien on the vessel to the insurance money received by the owner for its loss. He reasons that this should be so because the materialmen and the workmen helped to make the thing which forms the subject of the insurance; whilst he admits that the Parlement of Bourdeaux had decided otherwise as late as September, 1758. So that the views expressed by Valin seem to be his opinion of what the law ought to be rather than what it was. Valin, Com. Vol. I.. 315, 316, lib. I. tit. XII. art. III.

Emerigon strenuously opposes Valin's opinion. His reasons are, that liens are stricti juris, and are not to be extended by construction; that if Valin's rule is well founded, a vendor on credit would have a lien on the price arising on a subsequent sale of the same thing by his vendee after the thing itself had ceased to exist, which was contrary to repeated decisions; that, by stronger reason, materialmen and workmen have no lien on the assurance of a ship which never belonged to them, for there is nothing essentially common between the right of pledge and that of property; that the ordinance gives no privilege to the materialmen and workmen, except on the ship; and, therefore, they have none on the insurance according to the rule of strict construction already stated; that if the ship were represented by the insurance, it would be necessary to give the same privilege to the seamen and all other privileged creditors, which would destroy the whole object of insurance; that, on the same principle, insurance ought to be represented by reinsurance, which, it is well settled, cannot be done. Emerigon, Contrats a la Grosse, chap. 12, sec. 7.

The opinion of Emerigon was followed with but little dissent until a recent period. The most prominent writer who disagreed with him was Pardessus, who, in the first edition of his Droit Commercial, published in 1814 (art. 663), after stating the general rule that the owner may discharge himself from responsibility by abandoning the ship and freight, added. "If these things have been insured, he ought to abandon also his rights against the insurers." This sentiment is repeated as his personal opinion in the subsequent editions of his work (same art. 663), but he is obliged to concede that the law is otherwise. In the edition of 1841, article 594, 2d, after asking the question whether a creditor, having a privilege or a hypothecation on a thing insured, could require a distribution of the insurance money as would be made of the price on a sale, he says: "I think not; there is not the same reason. In the case of sale the price must, in the nature of things, represent the thing sold, the owner parting with it only for that; in the case of insurance the thing has perished—it has not been assigned in consideration of any price. The debtor has procured, it is true, a guaranty, by the effect of which the insurer pays him the value of it; but this guaranty is the result of an agreement, independent of the engagements of the assured with any particular creditors. The value paid does not represent the thing insured, except in the relations between the insurer and the insured; not in the relation between the latter and his creditors, except as an accession to the mass of his property, against which the creditors may prosecute their actions according to the principle of the civil law by which all the property of a debtor is the common pledge of his creditors; but without any preference, none of them having a peculiar right to a privilege on the contract of insurance which has caused the amount assured to be added to the assets of the common debtor. It would be otherwise, undoubtedly, if the debtor, in borrowing upon a hypothecation of a house insured, should at the same time assign to his creditor the contingent benefits of the insurance to serve for his discharge to that extent, and if the creditor should duly notify the insurer," etc.

This passage shows that even Pardessus admitted the law to be as Emerigon had declared it.

Boulay-Paty, the contemporary of Pardessus, who published his work on Maritime Commercial Law (Droit Commercial Maritime) in 1831, warmly espouses the views of Emerigon. His observations on the subject are exceedingly sensible and persuasive. After quoting the views of Valin and Emerigon, he says: "We must agree that Emerigon's opinion is most conformable to principle, and that the transfer or subrogation of which Valin speaks is not admissible;" that is, the transfer of the lien from the property to the insurance. He adds: "The axiom subrogatum tenet locum subrogati should be understood as applicable, when the thing has been changed into something else by the owner, who has received the other thing in its place; as in the case when the owner of a ship has sold it, it is certain that the lien is transferred according to undoubted law to the price. But when the thing is perished in the hands of the debtor certainly all lien is extinct. (L 8 ff quibus modis pignus vel hypotheca solvitur). Is it possible to suppose that an insurance, which is an agreement foreign to the creditors holding liens, which has been effected between the owners and a third party, can have the effect to bring again into life the lien on the ship?" Vol. I. p. 185.

He goes on to argue the question at great length, and with much force; but it would extend this opinion too much to quote his argument at length. One more extract will suffice.

After showing the difference between abandonment to the lien creditors and surrender to the insurers, and that the latter does not interfere with or prevent the former, he says:

"The product of the insurance is the price of the premium which the ship owner has paid to insure the ship. This premium is not bound as a security for debts and obligations contracted by the captain; the law expressly binds the ship and freight alone to that. The Code of Commerce gives to shippers a lien only on ship and freight; consequently they have none on the insurance. In general the ship is not represented by the insurance, which, after the loss of the ship, becomes a right existing by [500] itself which gives a direct personal action in favor of the insured.

"All these principles, besides, agree with equity and the well understood interests of commerce. Without this rule, indeed, insurances on the hull of a ship would become illusory for her owner, since he would have no way, even by stipulating for a guaranty against barratry of the master, which it is customary to do, to protect himself against any other loss than that of the premium; and yet this is both the object of insurance and the motive for which the premium is paid." Vol. I. pp. 291, 292.

During the seven years from 1827 to 1834 an animated controversy was carried on in France on the question whether article 216 of the Code of Commerce, in speaking of the "acts" (faits) of the master, meant to include his contracts lawfully made in the course of the voyage, or only his wrongful acts; and finally the matter came before the legislative body for solution. In 1841 that body modified article 216 so as to expressly embrace contracts of the master, as well as other acts. It was, at the same time, sought to introduce a clause which should render it the owner's duty, in abandoning the ship and freight to obtain the benefit of limited liability, also to abandon his claim for insurance on them; but this provision failed to receive assent. The law remained as it had always been.

In 1859 two very able works were published in France in which the subject was again discussed; one by Edmond Dufour, entitled "Droit Maritime," and one by J. Bedarride, entitled "Droit Commercial," a commentary on the Code de Commerce.

Dufour attempted to renew the controversy, although he admitted that the views of Emerigon had been acquiesced in even by Pardessus, and that Valin stood alone. He says: "Doctrine and jurisprudence, after some hesitation, pronounced themselves, as is well known, against the existence of a privilege or hypothecation on the indemnity due from the insurer; and in that way the general principle which Emerigon had adopted as the basis of his theory penetrated men's minds as an indisputable truth which ought thenceforth to govern all indemnities of insurance. Thus it is, for example, that M. Pardessus, speaking of this question in relation to maritime credits, comes back for its solution to the general principles relating to insurance. So that the opinion of Valin seems to be crushed under this imposing unanimity." Dufour, Droit Maritime, art. 261.

Dufour then devotes many pages to argue the question ab origine, persuading himself that he has established the correctness of Valin's views. But his admission at the beginning of his argument demonstrates that the maritime jurisprudence of France was in accordance with the opinion of Emerigon.

In consequence, probably, of this effort to bring the matter again into question, Bedarride [501] examined the subject with great care, both on principle and authority, and showed that the law was not only settled, but should not be disturbed. Bedarride, Droit Commercial, art. 295. But the advocates of change persisted in their efforts, until finally, on the 22d of December, 1874, on the passage of a law to render ships susceptible of hypothecation, they procured a section to be inserted (§ 17) declaring that, in case of loss or disablement of the ship, the rights of the creditors (that is, hypothecation creditors) may be enforced, not only against the portions saved, or their proceeds, but (in the order of registry) against the proceeds of any assurances that may have been effected by the borrower on the hypothecated ship. This law, however, does not extend to tacit liens or privileges.

For further authorities in the French law, to the same effect as Boulay-Paty and Bedarride, see Pouget, Principles de Droit Mar. Vol. 2, pp. 415–419, ed. 1858; Eloy et Guerrand, Des Capitaines, Vol. 8, art. 1894 (1860); Caumont, Dict. de Droit Mar. tit. Abandon Mar. §§ 54, 55; De Villeneuve et Mass6, Dict. du Contentieux Commercial, verb, Armateur, 20.

In Germany the history of the question has been, to some extent, the reverse of what it has been in France. The Prussian Code, adopted in 1794, allowed shipowners to "free themselves from responsibility in all cases by a surrender of the ship, including all benefits of the voyage and their rights against the insurers." But Prussia was the only country that adopted this rule in relation to insurance. In 1856 a scheme was set on foot to have a conference to prepare a general commercial code for all the German States. Commissioners were appointed by the several States for this purpose, who held repeated sessions, but came to no agreement on a general code until March, 1862. The Prussian commissioners strenuously urged the adoption of their law on the subject of subrogation to the claims for insurance. The arguments presented by them are spread before us at some length in one of the briefs of the counsel for the appellants. The convention, however, were not convinced, and rejected the proposition, and the Prussian commissioners were obliged to yield the point, and now all [502] Germany, under this new commercial Code, adheres to the old maritime law. It is only necessary to add that, in the discussions of the convention it was conceded that the maritime law had never required the surrender of the insurance, but only that of the ship and freight. By the Commercial Code of Holland and the Ordinance of Bremen this rule is expressly formulated.

It appears, therefore, that the disposition of our statute is in conformity with the general maritime law of Europe; and that the recent legislation in France (1874) is an innovation upon that law.

It is next contended that the Act of Congress does not extend to the exoneration of the ship, but only exonerates the owners by a surrender of the ship and freight, and, therefore, that the plea of limited liability cannot be received in a proceeding in rem. But this argument overlooks the fact that the law gives a twofold remedy: surrender of the ship or payment of its value; and declares that the liability of the owner, in the cases provided for, shall not exceed the amount or value of his interest in the ship and freight. This provision is absolute, and the owner may have the benefit of it, not only by a surrender of the ship and freight, but by paying into court the amount of their value, appraised as of the time when the liability is fixed. This, as we have seen, enables the owner to reclaim the ship and put it into complete repair, without increasing the amount of his liability. The absolute declaration of the statute, that his liability shall not exceed the amount or value of the ship and freight, to wit: at the termination of the voyage, has the effect, when that amount is paid into court under judicial sanction, of discharging the owner's liability, and thereby of extinguishing the liens on the vessel itself and of transferring those liens to the fund in court. This is always the result when the owner is allowed to bond his vessel by payment of its appraised value into court, or by filing a stipulation with sureties in lieu of such payment. The vessel is always discharged from the liens existing upon it, when it has been subjected to a judicial sale by order of the admiralty court, or when it has been delivered to the owner on his stipulation, with sureties.

The claim that the lien attaches to the repairs and betterments which the owner puts upon [503] the vessel after the amount of his liability has been fixed is repugnant to the entire drift and spirit of the statute. In ordinary cases it may be true, and undoubtedly is true, that a lien or privilege on the ship extends to and affects all its accretions by repair or otherwise; but in the case of a claim for limited liability under the statute, the dispositions of the statute are to govern; and these, as we have seen, fix the amount of liability at a certain time; and when that liability is discharged the lien is discharged, no matter what the then value of the ship may have come to be by means of alterations and repairs.

The time when the amount of liability should be paid into court will depend upon circumstances. If the owner sets up his claim to limited liability in his answer, and does not seek a general concurrence of creditors, it will be sufficient if the amount is paid after the trial of the cause and the ascertainment of the amount of liability in the decree. Payment and satisfaction of the decree will be a discharge of the owner as against all creditors represented in the decree.

To say that an owner is not liable, but that his vessel is liable, seems to us like talking in riddles. A man's liability for a demand against him is measured by the amount of property that may be taken from him to satisfy that demand. In the matter of liability, a man and his property cannot be separated, unless where, for public reasons, the law exempts particular kinds of property from seizure, such as the tools of a mechanic, the homestead of a family, etc. His property is what those who deal with him rely on for the fulfillment of his obligations. Personal arrest and restraint, when resorted to, are merely means of getting at his property. Certain parts of his property may become solely and exclusively liable for certain demands, as a ship bound in bottomry, or subject to seizure for contraband cargo or illegal trade; and it may even be called "the guilty thing"; but the liability of the thing is so exactly the owner's liability that a discharge or pardon extended to him will operate as a release of his property. It is true, that in United States v. Mason, 6 Bissell, 350, it was held that in a proceeding in rem for a forfeiture of goods, the owner might be compelled to testify, because the suit is not against him but against the goods. That decision, however, was disapproved by this court in the case of Boyd v. United States, 116 U. S. 616, 637 [Bk. 29, L. ed. 746, 753], in which it is said: "Nor can we assent to the proposition that the proceeding [in rem] is not in effect a proceeding against the owner of the property as well as against the goods; for it is his breach of the laws which has to be proved to establish the forfeiture, and it is his property which is sought to be forfeited. In the words of a great judge, 'Goods, as goods, cannot offend, forfeit, unlade, pay duties or the like, but men whose [504] goods they are.'" Vaughan, C. J., in Sheppard v. Goenold, Vaugh. 159, 172, approved by Ch. Baron Parker in Mitchell v. Torup, Parker, 227, 236.

But the argument is at war with the spirit as well as the text of our decisions on the subject of limited liability. The case of The Benefactor, 103 U. S. 214; S. C. 103 U. S. 239 [Bk. 26, L. ed. 157, 351, 466], is precisely in point. That was a case of libel in rem against the vessel in fault, and the proceeding for a limited liability was sustained. It is true that this particular point was not raised; but the parties in the case were represented by able and experienced counsel, and the point would certainly have been raised if they had regarded it as tenable.

We are not only satisfied that the law does not compel the shipowner to surrender his insurance in order to have the benefit of limited liability, but that a contrary result would defeat the principal object of the law. That object was to enable merchants to invest money in ships without subjecting them to an indefinite hazard of losing their whole property by the negligence or misconduct of the master or crew, but only subjecting them to the loss of their investment. Now, to construe the law in such a manner as to prevent the merchant from contracting with an insurance company for indemnity against the loss of his investment is contrary to the spirit of commercial jurisprudence. Why should he not be allowed to purchase such an indemnity? Is it against public policy? That cannot be, for public policy would equally condemn all insurance by which a man provides indemnity for himself against the risks of fire, losses at sea, and other casualties. To [505] hold that this cannot be done tends to discourage those who might otherwise be willing to invest their money in the shipping business. It would virtually and in effect bring back the law to the English rule, by which the owner is made liable for the value of the ship before collision—the very thing which, in all our decisions on the subject, we have held it was the intention of Congress to avoid by adopting the maritime rule. That this would be the result is evident, because all shipowners insure the greater part of their interest in the ship, and by losing their insurance they would lose the value of their ship in every case. No form of agreement could be framed by which they could protect themselves. This is a result entirely foreign to the spirit of our legislation.

When it was urged upon the Chamber of Peers of France, in 1841, to pass a law requiring the abandonment of insurance, as well as of ship and freight, in order to relieve the owner from liability, the suggestion was not entertained. The opinion of the majority was that the relations between the ship owner and lenders or shippers ought to remain entirely independent of contracts of insurance which either could make; that an obligation to abandon insurance would have no other tendency than to prevent insurance by the owner, since he would be deprived of the benefit of it in case of loss. Bedarride, art. 295, Vol. 3, p. 361.

The argument that to allow the owner to keep his insurance would encourage negligence and recklessness on his part can always be made in every case of insurance. It has been made and answered a hundred times. Generally a sufficient portion of the value of the thing insured remains uncovered by insurance to prevent indifference to loss; and if the temptation to wish it does exist in any case, the retributions are so fearful as to repress the thought. To the honor of human nature, the exceptions to the rule are exceedingly rare.

It is also contended that the right to proceed for a limited liability is waived and lost by a surrender of the vessel to the insurers, because it is then out of the owner's power to abandon the ship to the claimants who have liens upon 506] her. This argument assumes that abandonment is necessary, which is not the case under our law. Payment of the ship's value into court, or setting up the matter as a defense, is quite as efficacious. But if abandonment were necessary, as it is by the maritime law, a surrender to the insurers does not interfere with or prevent a subsequent abandonment to the creditors. The insurers take the ship cum onere, and stand in no better plight than the original owners. The liens against the ship are not extinguished by the surrender to the insurers, but may be prosecuted by the creditors, notwithstanding such surrender, unless proceedings for a limited liability are instituted. This is fully shown by Boulay-Paty, Vol. 1, pp. 293–297, and by Bedarride, in article 291 of his work, before cited. The former, after showing that abandonment to the lien creditors may be made notwithstanding a previous surrender to the insurers, and explaining the reason of it, says: "It follows from thence that the owner may, by abandonment, turn the shippers (of cargo) over to the insurers (now become the owners by the surrender of ship and freight to them), and thus make abandonment and surrender at the same time." Boulay-Paty, Vol. 1, p. 295.

This disposes of all the important points in the case, and leads to the conclusion that the decree of the Circuit Court was right; and it is affirmed.

James H. McKenney, Clerk, Sup. Court, U. S.

Mr. Justice Matthews delivered the following dissenting opinion, entitled in this (No. 62) and the two following cases (Nos. 333 and 748):

Mr. Justice Miller, Mr Justice Harlan, Mr. [526]
Justice Gray and myself are unable to concur in the opinion and judgment of the court in the three cases just disposed of. The importance of the question decided justifies a statement of the grounds of this dissent.

The principal question, stated generally, involved in all the cases is whether under sections 4282 to 4285 inclusive, of the Revised Statutes, being re-enactments of sections 1, 8, and 4 of the Act of March 3, 1851, limiting the liability of shipowners, so that for the losses specified it shall not in any case exceed the amount or value of the interest of such owner in such vessel and her freight then pending, that value shall be estimated as including or excluding any sum received or receivable by the shipowner, on account of insurance upon his interest in the vessel or freight.

Although that is the main question in all the cases now decided, the circumstances which [527] give rise to it in them, respectively, differ in some important particulars, a consideration of which will throw light upon the principle according to which it is to be determined.

The case of Dyer v. National Steam Navigation Company [post] was a libel in personam, in a cause of collision, for the loss of the ship Kate Dyer, run down on the high seas by the fault of the steamship Scotland, of which the respondents were owners. A former appeal in the same case decided by this court is found reported under the name of "The Scotland," 105 U. S. 24 [Bk. 26, L. ed. 1001]. The Kate Dyer was sunk immediately, and the steamship Scotland sank soon after, from the effects of the collision, and was a total loss, a portion of the wreck being saved. It was held on the former hearing that the respondents were entitled to the benefits of the statute limiting their liability. The decree for the several libelants amounts in the aggregate to $255,047.70. It is also found that The Scotland at the time of the collision was worth £100,000, was insured to the amount of £63,500, and that within nine months after the collision the respondents had received the amount thereof, equal to $299,867.42; but that the value of the articles saved from the wreck is the sum of $4,927.85, which the decree ascertains to be the amount for which alone the respondents are liable.

The case of Thommessen v. Whitwill [post] was a cause of collision in which the loss of the bark Daphne was found to be from the fault of the steamship Great Western, of which the respondents were owners, the libel being against them in personam. The libelants were domiciled subjects of the Kingdom of Norway and Sweden, and the respondents, of Great Britain. The libelants were found to have sustained damages from the injuries to the bark by the collision in the sum of $7,023.44, and the value of the steamship, both before and after the collision, until her subsequent stranding, was from $140,000 to $150,000. After the collision, while on the same voyage to New York, the steamship was stranded and wrecked from a cause in no way growing out of or connected with the collision, by the careless navigation and fault of the persons in charge of her. Immediately thereafter, the owners of the steam-[528] ship made an abandonment of her to various underwriters who had insured her to the amount of £34,000, which was paid by them to the owners as a total loss. There was saved from the wreck materials which, on sale, realized to the owners $1,796.14. The decree limited the liability of the respondents to this amount.

The remaining case of Place and others, libelants, claimants of the schooner General S. Van Vliet and of the cargo, against the Norwich and New York Transportation Company presents other features. The collision in this case was caused by the negligence of the steamboat "City of Norwich," owned by the appellees. Immediately after the collision the steamboat took fire, her deck and upper works were burnt off, and she sank in about twenty fathoms of water. Her cargo of merchandise was thereby totally lost. The steamboat itself was raised by salvors, and taken to the Port of New York, where she was repaired. On May 9, 1866, less than a month after the disaster, William A. Wright and others, owners of the schooner, filed in the District Court for Connecticut a libel in personam against the appellees, as owners of the steamboat, and obtained a decree for the loss of the schooner and her cargo for $26,657.38, which on appeal to this court was affirmed, and will be found reported in 18 Wall. 104. On August 28, 1866, while that suit was pending in Connecticut, and after the steamboat had been raised, repaired, and brought into the Port of New York, two of the appellants, George and Charles Place, as owners of part of the cargo on the steamboat, filed their libel in rem against her in the District Court of the Eastern District of New York. Other libels in rem by other owners of cargo were also filed. The steamboat was seized under process in these suits, and the appellees intervened as claimants; an appraisement was ordered, and a stipulation for the appraised value in the sum of $70,000 having been given, the steamboat was released to them. This appraisement was of the value of the vessel, in her condition at the time, after the repairs had been made. Decrees were entered in favor of the libelants in all these cases. In July, 1872, after the final decision by this court in the case of Norwich & N. Y. Trans. Co. v. Wright, 18 Wall. 104 [80 U. S. bk. 20, L. ed. 585], on appeal from the Circuit [529] Court for the District of Connecticut, and after the decrees in the District Court for the Eastern District of New York in the proceedings in rem, the owners of the steamboat, the present appellees, filed their petition in the last named court, praying for the benefit of the Act limiting their liability. Such proceedings were thereupon had that an appraisement was made of the value of the steamboat in the condition and situation in which she was, after the collision and before she was raised, and it was found to be $3,500, being the difference between $25,000, her value when raised, and $22,500, the amount expended in raising her. A decree was finally entered in the circuit court on appeal, limiting the liability of the appellees to this amount, and it was distributed among the libelants, after refunding to the appellees $1,008.41, part thereof, for their costs in the litigation. The decree thereupon also perpetually enjoined all the libelants who had obtained decrees in their favor in the suits in rem in the Eastern District of New York from the enforcement of those decrees, and thus deprived them of their right to recover against the stipulators, who had filed a stipulation in the sum of $70,000 to answer the decrees in those causes. So that in these cases the owners are exonerated from all personal liability in excess of the sum of $2,500, but have received back their vessel free and discharged from all liens established by the decrees against her in rem in the Eastern District of New York. It is also found as a fact that when the collision occurred, the steamboat was insured against fire but not against marine disaster, and of the insurance money the appellees have recovered and received from the underwriters the sum of $49,283.07.

It thus appears that in one case the owners of a vessel, whose fault caused a loss to others of more than $250,000, escape all liability over $5,000, having received more insurance than necessary to pay the whole amount of the loss; in another, the owners are repaid the whole value of the vessel in insurance, and are exonerated from a decree against them of over $7,000 on payment of less than $2,000; and in the other, the owners keep their vessel discharged from all liens, and receive nearly $50,000 of insurance with which to repair and restore her, and relieve themselves of all liability on ac-[530] count of losses, decreed against them, to the amount of over $26,000, on payment of less than $2,000. The question is whether these results can be justified by a reasonable interpretation of the law limiting the liability of shipowners.

The question is now for the first time decided by this court. None of its previous decisions have expressly or by implication involved it. It is true, however, that in the opinion of the court in Norwich Company v. Wright, 18 Wall. 104, 117 [80 U. S. bk. 20, L. ed. 585], in stating the rule of the maritime law of the States of Continental Europe, limiting the liability of shipowners to their interest in their ship and its freight, the passage from Pardessus is quoted (Droit Commercial, part 8, tit. 2, chap. 8, § 2) as follows: "The owner is bound civilly for all delinquencies committed by the captain within the scope of his authority, but he may discharge himself therefrom by abandoning the ship and freight; and if they are lost, it suffices for his discharge to surrender all claims in respect of the ship and its freight," and it is added by the court, "such as insurance," etc. The court then further said: "The same general doctrine is laid down by many other writers on maritime law, so that it is evident that by this law the owner's liability was coextensive with his interest in the vessel and its freight, and ceased by his abandonment and surrender of these to the parties sustaining loss."

But the question of including insurance in the estimate of the value of the owner's interest in the ship and freight, and whether it followed the surrender of the latter to the parties sustaining loss, was not directly involved; and the expression of an opinion to that effect must be taken to be casual and obiter dictum merely. Inasmuch, however, as the Act of Congress of 1851, which is the law of the case, may be supposed to have adopted the rule of liability fixed by it, in view of what was believed to be the rule of the general maritime law of Continental Europe, the quotation from Pardessus, and the application of it to the instance of insurance, as an incident which is involved in the surrender of the ship or in the estimate of its value, is not without significance. It is some evidence, indeed, of the very view of the rule of the maritime law which may have been in the contemplation of Congress when it passed the Act 531] of 1851, and proof to that extent of the meaning of that Act. And this is rendered more reasonable from the fact that Baron Parke, in Brown v. Wilkinson, 15 Mees. & Wels. 396, seems to have taken the same view as to the foreign maritime law. In that case, he said it was contended by counsel that the effect of the Statute, 53 Geo. III, chap. 159, § 8, "was to give to British shipping all the protection which the navigation of some foreign States extended to theirs; and this protection goes to the extent of permitting the owners, at the end of the voyage to give up the vessel in its then state by way of satisfaction to the parties injured, and, if it be lost the owners are altogether exempt, on abandoning the benefit of insurance, if any, and salvage."

If, now, on a more critical and extended inquiry into the maritime law of the modern States of Continental Europe, it should appear that the opinion of Pardessus, as quoted in the case above cited, was not universally accepted, and that the codes and commentators of various of those States differ in their legislation and interpretation of the general maritime law on the subject, it would not necessarily follow that Congress, in passing the Act of 1851, may not have intended to adopt the rule as stated by Pardessus and those who agreed with him, rather than that now insisted on as more generally prevailing.

There was, in fact, a controversy among writers on commercial and maritime law, both in France and Germany, on the point. The opinion of Pardessus coincided with that of Valin, while Emerigon, who was followed by Boulay-Paty and others, maintained the opposite opinion. This controversy was settled for French law by an amendment to article 216 of the Code de Commerce, which expressly excluded insurance from the abandon of ship and freight, in exoneration of the shipowner from his liability, though the debate seems to be reopened as a consequence of additional legislation by article 17 of the Law of December 10, 1874, which, in case of loss of the ship through becoming unnavigable or otherwise, allows subrogation in favor of hypothecation creditors. It also appears that the Prussian Code, adopted in 1794, and continued in force until 1862, provided expressly that "When the ship has been insured the right against the insurer must also 532] be ceded to creditors;" and, applying the principle to the particular case now under consideration, Kaltenborn, in a treatise on the subject, published at Berlin in 1851, says: "The Roman law, which held the owner absolutely liable with all his property, is nowhere put in practice, and was not current as early as the Middle Ages. Indeed, the Consulate of the Sea (c. 183, 224, 236), the Law of Wisby, reasoning from articles 18 and 68, that the Hanse Towns, reasoning from article 2, title X, render the owners, as a rule, answerable only to the extent of the ship's value; and the modern maritime laws free the owners, by the abandon of the ship and their several shares in the vessel, from all further liability for the ship enterprise, particularly for the acts and contracts of the captain. In the ship are included all gains arising during the voyage, as well as the insurance. Should the ship and the freight have perished, it is sufficient for exoneration of the owners if all claims and causes of action having reference to the vessel and freight are abandoned by them." This was the law of Prussia in 1851, when the Act of Congress of that year on the subject was passed, and continued to be so until March 1, 1862, when the Prussian Code was superseded by that of the Germanic Confederation, which omitted any provision on the subject, overruling the proposals of the Prussian delegates to the contrary.

This statement of the contemporary law of modern Continental Europe on the point is condensed from the very able and learned brief in these cases, prepared and submitted by Mr. Harrington Putnam, one of the counsel, who supports it by elaborate extracts and translations from foreign writers on the subject, whose citations have not in any way been questioned or impugned by opposing counsel, and have, therefore, been relied on as accurate. He states the further fact that, besides Holland, two other countries, Belgium, by a law of June 19, 1855, and Finland, Maritime Code of 1874, article 17, have expressly enacted that the insurance shall not be comprised in the shipowner's abandon to creditors. The inference is that there was nothing in the maritime law of Continental Europe in 1851 which justifies the conclusion that Congress must have intended to exclude insurance from the surrender required of the ship owner to limit his liability, but, on the contrary, the argument is strong, if not convincing, from the examples of European Codes [533] that it would require express language to effect that exclusion, if such was the intention.

But whatever bearing the foreign law may be thought to have upon the meaning of the statute, it is clear that the latter must be interpreted in the light of the antecedent domestic law which it modified and displaced. What that was is not a matter of dispute.

The passage of the Act of March 3, 1851, was no doubt due to the decision of this Court in the case of New Jersey Steam Navigation Co. v. Merchants Bank, 6 How. 344 [47 U. S. bk. 12, L. ed. 465], where it was held that in admiralty, as at common law, the owners of a steamboat were liable in personam for the loss by fire of specie carried by their boat, notwithstanding a contract of exemption, the loss having occurred from want of ordinary care on the part of those engaged in the navigation of the vessel.

Accordingly it was provided, in the first section of the Act of March 3, 1851, that owners of vessels should not be liable for losses by fire of goods carried by them, unless such fire was caused by the design or neglect of the owner himself, with a proviso, now omitted from the corresponding section 4282 of the Revised Statutes, that the parties, nevertheless, might extend or limit the liability of shipowners by "making such contract as they please."

A reference to the debates in Congress upon the bill during its progress will show that this was the only provision which excited any comment; and while allusion was made to English legislation on the subject of limiting the liability of shipowners, and to the Statutes of Massachusetts and Maine on the same subject, there was no mention whatever made of any supposed rule of general maritime law prevailing on the subject of Continental Europe, and no explanation of the expected operation and effect of the provision fixing the limit of liability at the value of the interest of the owner in the ship and freight, and of the effect of a surrender of the vessel and freight in exonerating the shipowner from any recovery beyond that limit.

In all cases of liability covered by the statute, there were provided by the existing law of admiralty jurisdiction a remedy against the vessel itself in rem when it could be seized, and the alternative remedy in personam against the owners. There was no limit to their liability but, as in other cases of personal liability, all property of the defendants was subject to process in payment of the judgment or decree. The procedure in rem has for its object the enforcement of a liability which by the maritime law is a lien upon the vessel, which is a jus in re, and is treated as a proprietary right, capable of being realized by judicial process. Ward v. Chamberlain, 2 Black, 430 [67 U. S. bk. 17, L. ed. 319]; Vandewater v. Mills, 19 How. 82 [60 U. S. bk. 15, L. ed. 554]; The Lottawanna, 21 Wall. 558 [88 U. S. bk. 22, L. ed. 654]. And in cases of torts, as well as in many cases of contract, where the general owner has entrusted a special owner or charterer with authority to bind the ship but not himself, the vessel is treated by the maritime law as an actor and juridical person, capable of committing wrongs, and is pursued as a delinquent without regard to ownership or agency. The China, 7 Wall. 53 [74 U. S. bk. 19, L. ed. 67]; The Malek Adhel, 2 How. 210 [43 U. S. bk. 11, L. ed. 239]. And when the liability is not only a lien on the vessel, but a claim against the owner personally, if satisfaction is not secured by process in rem, the deficiency may be made good by proceedings in personam.

The subject matter of the Act of March 3, 1851, was the personal liability of shipowners to answer for the losses specified, and its limitation. It does not deal with the liability of the vessel itself to answer in rem for such losses, as it had no occasion to do; for the sole purpose of the Act was to limit the personal liability of owners, so that it should not exceed the value of the ship and freight. It left the vessel, therefore, to be proceeded against in rem precisely as before, leaving that procedure entirely untouched and unaffected. There is nothing whatever in the statute to forbid parties having suffered from its fault from prosecuting the offending vessel, as a res, to the full extent, as previously authorized by the maritime law, and with all the necessary consequences. On the contrary, the Act proceeds throughout on the assumption of that right and liability. It only adds that in cases where the owners are not personally guilty of the alleged wrong, on taking the steps pointed out in the law, there shall be no recovery against them personally in excess of the value of their interest in the ship and freight. The Act only operates as a limitation upon the personal liability of the owners, as distinguished from the liability of the offending vessel itself.

This seems to us very clear; and yet, in the case of Place and others v. The Norwich and New York Transportation Company, the libelants have been perpetually enjoined from prosecuting their decrees actually obtained against the steamboat City of Norwich, because the owners have obtained under the statute a release from their personal liability on account of its wrong. It is not to the purpose to say that, in a proceeding against the vessel, its appraisement included the cost of raising and repairs put upon it by the owners, which ought not to have been included; for that is a question which could only properly have been litigated in the case in which the decree complained of was rendered. Besides, it is difficult to see on what grounds an owner can rightfully complain who has voluntarily raised his sunken vessel and repaired her, that those having maritime liens upon her seek to enforce them, or how he can claim, as against them, a prior or any lien on his own vessel for raising and repairing her And we think it is quite plain that it was an error in the decree appealed from to deprive the libelants, who had obtained their decrees against the vessel, from prosecuting them to their legitimate results, when the whole force of the statute authorizing the proceeding is expended in a limitation of the recovery in suits against the owner in personam.

It is not to be assumed, however, that, because the proceeding in rem remains unaffected by the Act of 1851, the personal liability of owners in proceedings against them in personam is restricted to the same extent as it would be if the proceeding in rem were declared to be the sole remedy; for that would be to declare that, in all the cases within the purview of the Act, when a proceeding in rem could be brought against ship or freight, or the proceeds of either, there should be no personal liability of the owner and no proceeding in personam against him. But the statute does not proceed upon the idea that, in such cases, the personal liability of the owner is altogether superseded by the proceeding in rem, but only that it is restricted within certain expressed limits, on compliance with certain definite conditions. In all cases the owner must surrender the vessel and its pending freight, or their value; whereas, in many such, as suits for pilotage and for damage by collision, no process in rem against freight is given by the fourteenth and fifteenth Rules in Admiralty, such as is authorized by the twelfth and thirteenth in suits by materialmen and for mariners' wages. So that the statute is not to be treated as if it confined the recovery of the party suffering loss strictly to what he might obtain by a proceeding in rem against the vessel alone. It, therefore, does not conclude the inquiry to say that, in a proceeding in rem against the vessel, the libelant had no lien which he could follow on any policies of insurance taken out by the owners, or the proceeds of any such when payable or paid. The question still recurs, what does the Statute of Congress require the owner to give up or account for, as a condition of his release from personal liability for the loss and wrong suffered by the libelant?

For the same reason, it is irrelevant and im-material to say that the policy of insurance, taken out by the owner on his interest in the ship or freight, is a contract of personal indemnity, collateral to his ownership, which does not pass by operation of law with a transfer of the title to the thing which is the subject of the insurance, and to the benefit of which those having liens on the thing are not entitled, in case of its loss, on the principle of subrogation. All that may be true; but, if it is, it nevertheless remains to ascertain whether, recognizing the owner's independent right to recover for his own use insurance accruing to him by the loss of its subject, the statute has not said that he shall not have the privilege of release and exoneration from his personal liability for injuries inflicted by his agents and representatives, except upon the condition, as a price for its purchase, that he shall voluntarily surrender, as the value of his interest in the vessel and freight, whatever they have procured for him of pecuniary advantage, including the insurance money recoverable for their loss.

[537] The language of the statute (§ 4283, R. S.) is, that "the liability of the owner of any vessel," etc., in the cases described, "shall in no case exceed the amount or value of the interest of such owner in such vessel and her freight then pending." By section 4285 it is enacted "that it shall be deemed a sufficient compliance, on the part of such owner, with the requirements of this title * * * if he shall transfer his interest in such vessel and freight, for the benefit of such claimants, to a trustee," * * * "from and after which transfer all claims and proceedings against the owner shall cease." It was decided in the case of The Scotland, 105 U. S. 24 [Bk. 26, L. ed. 1001], that it is not necessary that ship owners should surrender and transfer the ship in order to entitle them to the benefit of the law. That is only one mode of relief. In the alternative, they may retain their interest in the ship, abiding a decree for the value of the ship and freight as ascertained by the court upon the proofs. But this double method of executing the purpose of the statute does not imply any difference in the estimated amount of the possible recovery. The limit of that, in every case, is the value of the owner's interest in the ship and freight, and is the same whether he makes an actual transfer, or whether he submits himself personally to the payment of the ascertained amount.

The question, then, upon the statute is reduced to this: Whether the insurance money payable or paid to the owner in case of the loss of or damage to the ship is to be included in the estimate of the value of the owner's interest in it. And that question turns, as we think, on another and a very simple one: Whether the value of the owner's interest in his lost or damaged ship, in the sense of the statute, means its money value to him, computed with reference to every pecuniary advantage and benefit it brings to him, or whether it means the price brought by the material things which remain when put to sale to the best bidder, leaving him still in possession of all those legal rights springing out of and supported by his interest in it, which, as a case of insurance, or a right of action against the cause or instrument of its loss, may result in restoring to him in money its full original value. It is true that the Act declares that a transfer of the owner's interest in the ship and freight shall be a sufficient com- [538] pliance with its conditions; and by construing this with narrow and literal exactness, this transfer may be confined to the mere wreck and physical remnant of the broken ship, or, if sunk to the bottom of the sea, the mere spes recuperandi. But this construction, we think, hæret in cortice. The whole language of the Act must be taken together, and nothing less will satisfy its meaning or its policy than such a transfer or payment as will include the full money value to the owner of his interest in the ship, which the statute requires him to sacrifice in order to purchase the immunity which it bestows on that condition alone. For the policy of the Act was to encourage investments in ships by limiting losses from the risks of navigation to the amount and value of the investment, and that includes the insurance recovered by force of a premium which, when paid, constitutes part of the investment, the insurance money itself being the produce of the investment, which restores it when lost or impaired. Insurance adds to the ship a value of its own, by imparting to the subject of insurance the quality of reproducing itself or its value in case of injury or loss. It was the policy of the Act to encourage the shipping interest by a protection against the unlimited personal liability of shipowners for the acts and defaults of their agents and representatives, with reasonable regard to the rights and interests of others engaged in the same pursuit, and not to put a premium on its destruction by taking away from shipowners a principal motive for regarding either their own or the interests of others. And the language of the statute seems to us not only to bear such a meaning, but fairly to imply it. For certainly every pecuniary advantage or profit which the ownership of a thing actually secures by necessary operation of law may be estimated to ascertain the value of the thing to its owner. The insurance which in case of damage or loss repairs and restores the vessel or stands in its place, and is its produce and earning, being the purchase money paid for it by virtue of the contract which assumes the risks insured against, is strictly an accessory of the ship insured, as much so as the freight which she earns; and the express mention of [539] the latter, as part of the interest to be transferred, is not to be held as excluding insurance because not expressly mentioned, for the reason that the mention of freight is sufficient to characterize the nature of the owner's interest to be valued, as including not merely the material remnants of the broken or sunk vessel in specie, but as well that which it produces, and which is in truth her representative, and of which it is the meritorious cause and consideration. For the insurance is the price paid by the insurer to the insured as the purchase pro tanto of the thing insured when damaged or lost, and, in the hands of the owner, or due to him, still remains as the value of an interest in the ship as that existed when damaged or lost, and ought to be accounted for as part of that value; as much so as freight paid, though no longer freight money in kind, must still be valued and accounted for by the owner who has received it. The insurance money is the interest of the owner in the ship reduced to money and, therefore, most accurately measures its value; for, in cases of total loss, actual or constructive, all interest of the owner, even though it be a mere spes recuperandi, on payment of the insurance money, passes by operation of law to the insurer. Yet that very interest, thus the property, on abandonment or payment of a total loss, the title to which passes to the insurer, is the same interest, the value of which, by the terms of the statute, must be decreed to the libelant to exonerate the owner from personal liability to any additional extent.

An effort was made in argument by counsel to restrict the meaning of the words "the interest of such owner," as used in section 4283, R. S., so as merely to distinguish between the several liabilities of part owners; but there is no foundation for this. The words are used as well with reference to the interest of a single owner as of part owners where there are more than one. It means, we are constrained to believe, and naturally suggests, not merely the naked title of the owner to the physical materials which constitute the ship, or its wreck, or its remnants, but every interest in, attached to, or growing out of it, capable of pecuniary valuation and measurement, so as to include every right of action accruing to its owner, by contract or by operation of law, growing out of its ownership, or any damage or loss previously occasioned to it by others, embracing rights of actions against others for torts causing the injury, if any there be, and upon policies of insurance or other contracts of indemnity, taking effect in consequence of or notwithstanding the loss. Suppose, for instance, that after the collision which gave to the libelants the lien and right to proceed against the offending vessel for the loss and damage, the latter had been effectually sold while still pursuing her voyage, and the title transferred to a purchaser, would not the purchase money, either in the hands of the vendor when paid, or in those of the vendee until paid, notwithstanding the subsequent total loss of the ship itself during the same voyage before reaching her home port, be the measure of the value of the owner's interest, to the full amount of which the injured party might recover? It seems to us there can be but one answer to that question, and that in the affirmative. It seems to us equally clear that no distinction can be drawn between the case just supposed and that of insurance. For the policy of insurance in cases of total loss is analogous to a contract of sale, by which the ship, or what remains of her, or the hope of her recovery, becomes on the happening of the contingency the property of the insurer, and the insurance money payable, the price, as upon a conveyance. In both cases, the interest of the owner is transferred from the thing to the money which represents it and stands in place of it, and the money is the measure of the value of the interest of the owner in the thing, for it is the price and equivalent paid for it. We cannot bring ourselves to think that Congress intended, by limiting the personal liability of the ship owner, in cases where previously his whole fortune was responsible for the wrongs committed through his agents and representatives, to the value of his interest in the ship, which was the instrument of the injury, to permit the innocent party suffering the damage to go entirely without redress, when the vessel in fault, by disaster subsequently happening during the whole period of the same voyage, has been totally lost, and the owner, by a contract in force when the wrong was done, receives full compensation by way of insurance for the loss he has incurred, and has thus restored to him the offending vessel, not indeed in specie, but in value. It seems to us it is the meaning of the statute that the owner shall receive no pecuniary benefit from his interest in the vessel doing the wrong, which shall not inure to the compensation of him who has suffered the loss which it has caused. And that meaning Congress has taken pains to express by the use of the word "interest," as the subject which, or the value of which, the owner must surrender and transfer or account for, as the price of his immunity from personal liability, because it is appropriate to convey the idea, being large enough to embrace, not the mere legal title to the vessel or the wreck and remnant of her which may be saved from the perils of the voyage, but every claim and benefit which constitutes to the owner its substance and value, capable of measurement in money.

Admiralty—Limited Liability Act of 1851 construed—preceding case followed—interest.

*1. The decision in the previous case of Place v. Norwich & N. Y. Trans. Co., repeated on the question relating to the time when the value of ship and freight is to be taken for fixing the liability of the owner, and on the question of insurance.

2. Where a collision occurred by which the offending ship and her cargo were sunk at sea, but strippings from the ship were rescued before she went down, from which the owners afterwards realized several thousand dollars: held, that in awarding damages against the owners, limited to the amount of their interest in the ship, the court is not bound to allow interest on the proceeds of the wreck or strippings; but may, in its discretion, allow interest or not.

3. The circuit court is not bound to allow interest on costs awarded by the district court, although such costs are included in the decree of the circuit court.

4. The allowance of interest by way of damages in cases of collision and other cases of pure damage, as well as the allowance of costs, is in the discretion of the court.

the opinion of the court and in the report of the opinion of this court when the case was here in 1881: The Scotland, Bk. 26, L. ed. 1001. See also the preceding case of Place v. The Norwich and New York Transportation Company, and the following case of Thommessen v. Whitwill.

Mr. James C. Carter, for appellants:

The question shortly stated is, "What is included under the words 'amount or value of the interest of such owner in such vessel and her freight then pending,' contained in section 4283 of the R. S.?"

The interpretation of the statute in question cannot properly be removed from the control of those considerations of public policy from which the statute itself springs.

It is first to be observed that the principal field of the operation of this Act is the relations between carriers and the shippers of goods. By general law a most rigorous liability is imposed upon public carriers for the safety of goods and passengers. As to goods, they stand in the place of insurers; and as to passengers, they are bound to the exercise of the highest degree of diligence. These rigorous obligations are imposed in accordance with the supposed necessities of a sound public policy.

In view of that policy, the requisite measure of diligence can be secured only by that ever present sense of its necessity which is produced by the imposition of this severe obligation.

Railroad Company v. Lockwood, 17 Wall. 357, 377 (84 U. S. bk. 21, L. ed. 627, 639).

There has been from time immemorial in many continental nations, and more recently by express statute in this country, a relaxation of this severe obligation in respect to carriers by water; and such relaxation, like the rule itself, springs from the teachings of public policy, being an indulgence designed to encourage the building and employment of ships.

Norwich and N. Y. Trans. Co. v. Wright, 13 Wall. 104 (80 U. S. bk. 20, L. ed. 585).

Serious question has been made as to whether, in ascertaining the value of an owner's interest, for the purpose of determining the extent of his liability, the value is to be taken before or after the casualty. Either construction of the statute is admissible; but, reasoning from grounds of public policy and imputing to Congress the intent to act in accordance therewith, it has been determined that the value to be ascertained is the value of the interest after the happening of the casualty.

Norwich Co. v. Wright, supra.

Applying the same methods to the determination of the question now brought before the court, there should be little doubt that the true construction of the language "the amount or value of the interest of such owner," should embrace any insurance upon such interest.

In all ordinary dealings the insurance is treated as simply incidental to the subject insured. Whenever there is a sale of the subject, be it ship or cargo, the insurance is transferred, along with the subject, to the purchaser.

Phillips, Ins. § 76; 2 Duer, Ins. § 35.

Unless in cases like the present, the amount of an insurance upon the offending vessel is, in case of loss, to be made subject to the claims of those who have suffered damage from such offending vessel, the plain consequence is that the owner of the guilty ship is enabled by the mere fact of an insurance upon his interest to achieve two things: first, full indemnity to himself for the loss of his own property; second, complete exemption from liability for the consequences of his own culpable negligence.

The procuring of insurance by the payment of a premium is only a mode of adding to the value of the subject insured, which the owner is at liberty to avail himself of or not, as he may choose. It is a part of the owner's investment in the adventure. One man might prefer to build his ship of iron instead of wood, and dispense with insurance; another might think it better economy to build of wood, and expend the additional cost of an iron vessel upon insurance. In either case, the whole amount expended is invested in the adventure; and it is the amount of this investment, or what may survive of it, which the law fixes as the limit of liability.

Mr. E. N. Taft, for Henry H. Rollins, appellant:

When the statute says "the value of the interest," etc., it plainly must mean one of two things: either the value to others, or the value to the owner. It would be no strained construction of the statute to make it read "the value to him of the interest, etc." And if it is to be the value to the owner, such value must include the amount of insurance.

Does the word "value" mean anything other than that value which the owner, by reason of his interest in the vessel at the time she does the wrong, can himself realize? We submit that that is precisely where the line was intended to be drawn by the statute, and that all the interest which the owner had in the vessel at the time of the wrongful act which resulted in damage and loss, is to be brought into account for the injured parties, either directly, as in cases of transfer, or indirectly as a measure of liability.

The rule should be the value of the interest of the owner in the vessel when it proceeds to commit the wrong, so far as that value can be realized in any way by the owner.

At the moment of threatened destruction the value of the owner's interest in the vessel is fixed almost entirely by the insurance he has upon it, and that interest after the destruction of the vessel takes the form of a claim upon the insurer for such value.

In a statute which changes our former maritime law and interposes a limitation where none before existed, the exact extent of that limitation, in view of what our former law deemed just, is to be found by going no further in the way of limitation than is clearly expressed.

Mr. John Chetwood, for appellee.

Mr. Justice Bradley delivered the opinion of the court:

This case presents nearly the same questions which have just been considered in the case of Place v. Norwich & N. Y. Trans. Co. [ante]. It was before this court in October Term, 1881, and was decided in March, 1882. See The Scotland, 105 U. S. 24 [Bk. 26, L. ed. 1001]. From the report of the case, but not from the record now before us, we learn that the ship Kate Dyer and the steamship Scotland, the latter belonging to the appellee, came into collision in December, 1866, opposite Fire Island Light, and the former immediately sank and was lost. The Scotland, being badly injured, put back for New York, but sank outside and south of Sandy Hook, only some strippings being rescued from [508] her before she went down. The owners of The Kate Dyer and others who had suffered loss, filed libels in personam against the National Steam Navigation Company, respondent and now appellee, who filed an answer denying that The Scotland was in fault, and pleading that she was sunk and destroyed, and, therefore, that there was no liability against the respondent. The circuit court, on appeal from the district court, found The Scotland in fault, and rendered a decree in favor of the libelants for the full amount of their damage, amounting with interest to upwards of $250,000, besides the costs of the libelants in the district court amounting to $2,173.10.

This decree was reversed by this court in March, 1882, so far as it condemned the respondent to pay the whole amount of damages sustained by the libelants and intervenors, and affirmed as to the residue; the court, in its opinion, holding that the amount of the respondent's liability was the value of the ship's strippings which were saved from the wreck.

The case went back to the circuit court, but was not further prosecuted until June, 1883, when the libelants applied for leave to file a supplemental allegation to their libel, for the purpose of showing that the respondent had received a large amount of insurance for the loss of The Scotland, which the libelants claimed should be included in the amount of the respondent's liability. The amendment was allowed, without prejudice to the respondent and with a reservation of the question as to the legality of such an amendment after the decree of this court had been rendered and a mandate sent down. The case was then referred to ascertain the amount realized from the strippings, and from the insurance, of The Scotland. The finding of facts in the court below, based on the report of the commissioner, on evidence and on admissions of the parties, states that the amount realized from the strippings was $4,927.85, received on or before the 27th of July, 1868; that the freight for the voyage was $13,703.20, but no part of it was earned or received; that the passage money was $1,708.65, but was all absorbed in refunding part, and employing the residue in transferring and reshipping the passengers; that the value of The Scotland before the collision was £100,000; and [509] that the insurance effected on her and received by the respondent was £61,647, equal to $299,807.42. As conclusions of law, the court held that the proper amount to be paid by the respondent, as depending upon the value of the articles saved, was $4,927.85; and that the insurance received by the respondent formed no part of its interest in the steamship to be surrendered in limitation of its liability under the statute. A decree was thereupon made that the respondent pay into the registry of the court the sum of $4,927.85 as the value of the strippings and remnants of The Scotland; and the sum of $2,173.10, the costs of the libelants in the district court, and the costs in the circuit court; and that upon such payment the respondent should be discharged from all liability to the libelants and intervenors.

To the findings of fact and conclusions of law of the circuit court the libelants excepted, on the following grounds, to wit:

1. That interest should have been allowed on the sum of $4,927.85.

2. That all freight and passage money should have been added.

3. That the amount of insurance received should have been added.

4. That the libelants should have had a decree for their entire loss.

On the argument it was also claimed that interest should have been allowed on the costs of the district court, $2,173.10.

These points are all disposed of in the previous case of Place v. National Steam Navigation Company, except the question of interest. Were the libelants entitled to interest on the amount received from the strippings? In answering this question it must be borne in mind that this is not a question of debt, but of damages. The limitation of those damages to the value of the ship does not make them cease to be damages. The allowance of interest on damages is not an absolute right. Whether it ought or ought not to be allowed depends upon the circumstances of each case, and rests very [519] much in the discretion of the tribunal which has to pass upon the subject, whether it be a court or a jury. The record now laid before us contains no part of the pleadings or proceedings in the cause prior to the first decree of the circuit court. We are without any means of knowing the circumstances in the pleadings or the evidence upon which the court was called upon to act, except the bare facts stated in the finding of facts before referred to. The right to a limitation of liability seems to have been denied to the respondent from the beginning. If it offered to pay the value of the strippings into court in its discharge from liability, or desired to do so, it is evident that the court would not allow it to do so, and that the libelants resisted it with all their power. The respondent was obliged to wait till the decision of this court in March, 1882, before getting a declaration of its rights in the matter; and the first move afterwards made was the attempt of the libelants to change the whole form of the controversy by setting up the new claim to the insurance money received by the respondent. Without stopping to decide whether this amendment of the proceedings was lawfully allowed after the decision of this court, it is sufficient to say that the circuit court, so far as we have anything before us to show to the contrary, may have had very good reasons for not allowing interest on the value of the strippings. We are not disposed to disturb its decree in this respect.

The question relating to interest on the costs requires but brief examination. Costs in admiralty, as well as in equity, are in the discretion of the court. Benedicts, Adm. § 549. Appeals in matter of costs only are not usually entertained; but when the entire case is before the appellate court, it has control of the subject of costs, as well as of the merits. Trustees v. Greenough, 105 U. S. 527 [Bk. 26, L. ed. 1157]; 2 Conk. Adm. Pr. 373. In the present case, the circuit court by its original decree, made in 1878, adjudged to the libelants their costs in the district court, amounting to $2,178.10. In March, 1882, we affirmed this part of the decree, but without interest. In affirming a decree in admiralty in this court, if interest is not [520] expressly allowed, it is not included. Hemmenway v. Fisher, 20 How. 255 [61 U. S. bk. 15, L. ed. 799]. No interest on these costs, therefore, can be claimed up to the date of our decree. The new departure then taken by the libelants in claiming the insurance, opened the matter so as to postpone a final decree in the case in the circuit court until the decree now appealed from was made. This decree adjudges to the libelants their costs in the district court precisely in accordance with our mandate. All delay in entering the decree was caused by the libelants themselves. If any interest was allowable on the costs in question, it would only have been that accruing from the date of our decree, March 20, 1882, to the time of rendering the decree appealed from, September 22, 1884. In view of the circumstances of the litigation which took place in that period, we do not think that the decree of the circuit court is open to objection.

Decree affirmed.

MARK WHITWILL.

(See S. C. "The Great Western" Reporter's ed. 520–526.)

Admiralty—Limited Liability Act of 1851 construed—how limited liability claimed.

*1. The decision in Place v. Norwich & N. Y. Trans. Co., in relation to the time when the value of the owner's interest in the ship is to be taken for fixing the amount of his liability, applied to a case where the offending ship did not sink in consequence of the collision, but was afterwards sunk and wrecked in the same voyage by the negligent navigation of those in charge of her; this sinking being held to be the termination of the voyage.

2. The decision in the same case as to insurance repeated.

3. Limited liability may be claimed, 1, merely by way of defense to an action; or, 2, by surrendering the ship or paying her value into court. The latter method is only necessary when the shipowner desires to bring all the creditors claiming damage into concourse for distribution.

Argued Oct. 19, 20, 1885. Decided May 10, 1886.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of New York. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court. See also the preceding cases of Place v. Norwich & N. Y. Trans. Co. and Dyer v. National Steam Nav. Co.

*Head notes by Mr. Justice BRADLEY.

Messrs. C. Van Santvoord, Harrington Putnam, James K. Hill and Wing & Shoudy, for appellants:

By the common and general admiralty and maritime law of the United States the rule in cases of collision is that the party in fault must suffer his own loss and compensate the other party for what loss he may sustain.

1 Pars. Adm. and Mar. Law, ed. 1869, 525, citing The Scioto, Daveis (2 Ware), 359; The Woodrop Sims, 2 Dods. 83; Reeves v. Ship Constitution, Gilpin, 579; The Sappho, 9 Jur. 560.

The first question to be considered is how far the rule has been altered by the Act of Congress.

The limitation in section 4283, R. S., is not a limitation of the liability of the owner of a vessel for any and all of the causes of action therein described, but a limitation of his liability only for any one of the several causes for which an action is brought against him.

The time of the valuation of the vessel and freight pending, for the purpose of determining the extent of the limitation in this section, is the time of the loss or of the accruing of the cause of action.

The words "pending freight" in the description of the subject to be valued is freight previously contracted for; it is not freight lost nor freight earned. As freight contracted, it is capable of being valued, and in every day's experience is covered by insurance.

The vessel and her freight pending is a description of the vessel proceeding on her voyage; and the word "then" in the limitation to the value of the vessel and her freight pending is an express reference to the time of the loss, or the accruing of the cause of action as the time of the valuation.

In the English decisions of an earlier date than the Act of Congress of 1851, it was well established that in applying the provisions of the English Acts (26 Geo. III. chap. 86, A. D. 1786, and 53 Geo. III. chap. 159, A. D. 1813), limiting the liability of a ship owner to the value of the vessel and the freight due and to grow due, when no time was mentioned in the Act, that the existing value at the time of the loss or of the accruing of the cause of action determined the limitation.

Wilson v. Dickson, 2 B. & Ald. 3; Cannan v. Meaburn, 1 Bing. 465.

In Norwich Co. v. Wright, 13 Wall. 104 (80 U. S. bk. 20, L. ed. 585), as applied by Judge Strong, in Re Petition of the Norwich, etc. Co. 17 Blatchf. 229, 232, the limitation of the recovery against the offending ship was to her value as left by or as reduced by the collision.

In the case of The Scotland 105 U. S. 24 (Bk. 26, L. ed. 1001), in this court, judgment was given in favor of the libelants, to the amount of the value of the wreck and strippings to which The Scotland, the offending ship, was reduced by or in consequence of the collision through her fault.

The limitation of the recovery involved in this judgment to the value of the offending ship, as reduced by or in consequence of the collision, is the same in principle as that adopted by Judge Strong in Re Petition of Norwich Co. v. Wright, supra.

The system of limitations of the liability of a shipowner prescribed by the Act of Congress, being a limitation only of his liability in actions for certain enumerated causes of action, is so far inconsistent with and repugnant to the above supposed system of limitation of the general maritime law that it repealed it by substituting a different, narrower system of limited liability of the ship owner.

United States v. Claflin, 97 U. S. 546 (Bk. 24, L. ed. 1082); Butler v. Russell, 3 Cliff. 251; S. C. 11 Int. Rev. Rec. 30; Heckman v. Pinkney, 81 N. Y. 211; People v. Gold and Stock Tel. Co. 96 N. Y. 76.

There being no proof that the systems of limitation of the liability of a ship owner in Norway and Sweden and Great Britain are the same, the only limitations applicable to the case are the limitations of the law of the forum, of which the above mentioned system of the limitations of the general admiralty law forms no part.

Messrs.* James Thomson and E. C. Henderson for appellee:

The insurance effected upon The Great Western by her owners is not an element in their interest in such vessel and her freight pending, within the meaning of the Revised Statutes.

Neither the maritime law nor the continental authorities extend the liability of the shipowner to the insurance upon the vessel.

The Phebe, 1 Ware, 265; Norwich Co. v. Wright, 13 Wall. 104 (80 U. S. bk. 20, L. ed. 585); The Scotland, 105 U. S. 24 (Bk. 26, L. ed. 1001); The Rebecca, 1 Ware, 188; Watson v. Marks, 2 Am. Law Reg. 157; Matter of Petition N. & N. Y. Trans. Co. 17 Blatchf. 227.

The history of the phrase "interest of the owner in such vessel and her pending freight," proves that it has always been used with reference to part owners, to relieve them from a liability in solido to the extent of the value of the vessel and freight, and to limit their liability to the value of their shares therein.

The history of English legislation on this subject, prior to the Act of 1851, has been related in Norwich Co. v. Wright, in Walker v. Ins. Co. 14 Gray, 288, and by Mr. Lathrop, in his article in 1 Am. Law Rev. 598.

The limit of liability prescribed by the English Acts, whether in the case of a part owner or of an owner of the whole ship, is the same, the value of the vessel and freight. The phrase, "interest of the owner in vessel and freight," does not appear, because it would have no application.

The Act of 1851 was principally drawn from the Act 26 Geo. II. chap. 86, and from either the Revised Statutes of Maine (Revision 1840, chap. 47, § 2 et seq.), or the Revised Statutes of Massachusetts (Revision 1836, chap. 32, § 1 et seq.), probably the former.

The phrase "interest in the ship and freight," in both revisions, is taken from the Act of Massachusetts (Laws 1819, chap. 122), which constituted the earliest legislation in the United States on this subject, and was almost literally copied in the Maine Statute (Laws 1821, chap. 14), the phrase, of course, on well settled principles, retaining in the revisions the meaning which it had in the statute revised.

Bish. Wr. L. §§ 98, 144; United States v. Bowen, 100 U. S. 508 (Bk. 25, L. ed. 631).

The language of the Act of 1851 shows that in that statute the phrase retains this meaning.

Re Norwich & N. Y. Trans. Co. 17 Blatchf. 221.

It is impossible from the nature of the contract of insurance that it should be an interest in the subject matter insured.

Lynch v. Dalzell, 4 Bro. Cas. in Parl. 431; Sadler's Co. v. Babcock, 2 Atk. 544; Lucena v. Crawfurd, 2 N. R. 270; Dixon, Marine Ins. 6; 2 Duer, Ins. 52, 58; Marshall, Ins. 7; 1 Phillips, Ins. 1; Dalby v. India & London Life Assur. Co. 15 C. B. 365, p. 387; May, Ins. § 6; Wood, Fire Ins. § 249; Columbia Ins. Co. v. Lawrence, 10 Pet. 512 (35 U. S. bk. 9, L. ed. 514); Carpenter v. Providence Wash. L. Ins. Co. 16 Pet. 496 (41 U. S. bk. 10, L. ed. 1044).

The purpose of this legislation will be frustrated if insurance be held to be an interest in the vessel.

The Phebe, 1 Ware, 265; The Rebecca, 1 Ware, 198; Holmes, Com. L. p. 25.

If the surrender of insurance should be enforced, the consequence would be, not to secure the insurance for the injured party, but to prevent the shipowner from collecting it.

Since the decision of this court in the case of Norwich Co. v. Wright, there has been a practical unanimity of opinion, whenever the question has been presented, that insurance is not an interest in the vessel.

Petition of N. & N. Y. Trans. Co. 8 Ben. 317; The C. H. Foster, 1 Fed. Rep. 734; Re Long Island etc. Trans. Co. 5 Fed. Rep. 612; Petition of Norwich & N. Y. Trans Co. 17 Blatchf. 234, 237; Watson v. Marks, 2 Am. Law Reg. 157.

Although this question has never been, in terms, adjudicated by this court, its utterances in construing this statute have been, it is submitted, inconsistent with any construction of the Act extending the shipowner's liability to the insurance upon the ship.

Norwich Co. v. Wright, supra; The Benefactor, 103 U. S. 239 (Bk. 26, L. ed. 351); The Scotland, 105 U. S. 24 (Bk. 26, L. ed. 1001); Ex parte Slayton, 105 U. S. 451 (Bk. 26, L. ed. 1066); Providence & N. Y. Steam Ship Co. v. Hill Mfg. Co. 109 U. S. 578 (Bk. 27, L. ed. 1038).

The policies of insurance effected on The Great Western by her owners were not effected for the benefit of the libelants; but if they had been, this fact would be entirely immaterial, and could not increase the limit of the respondent's liability for the collision stated in the pleadings.

By the general maritime law, the liability of the shipowner was limited to his interest in the ship and freight for all torts of the master and seamen, whether by collision or anything else, and his liability was so strictly limited that he was discharged by giving up that interest, or by the vessel being lost on the voyage.

The City of Norwich, The Scotland, The Phebe and The Rebecca, supra.

The Act of 1851 adopted this rule of the maritime law for the cases to which the Act applies.

Norwich Co. v. Wright, Providence & N. Y. Steamship Co. v. Hill Mfg. Co. and The Scotland, supra.

Interpreted and administered as statute law, this rule of the maritime law remains unchanged. The Act has provided that for these maritime torts a recovery in personam shall not be greater than a recovery in rem.

This case grew out of a collision which occurred on the 25th of March, 1876, on the high seas, 150 miles from Sandy Hook, between the Norwegian bark, Daphne, belonging to the appellants and bound to Marseilles, and the British steamship, Great Western, belonging to the respondent and others and bound to New York. [524] The Daphne was injured about $7,000 worth, and the court below found that The Great Western was in fault, and was worth $150,000, both before and immediately after the collision; but that after the collision, and on the same day, the steamer, while still on her voyage to New York, was stranded and wrecked on the south coast of Long Island by the careless navigation and fault of those in charge of her, and from no cause connected with the collision. No freight was received by her owners. On the 29th of March they abandoned her to the underwriters, and received from them insurance to the amount of £34,000 as for a total loss. After this the wreck and materials saved were sold for account of the underwriters and by direction of the owners, and realized $1,796.14. On the 27th of March, 1876, the libel was filed in this case on account of the owners of The Daphne, and Whitwill, the respondent, appeared and answered, denying that The Great Western was in fault, and claiming that if she should be found in fault, the owner's liability was limited to the amount or value of his interest in the vessel and her freight, and that this interest was of no value whatever; and to this he added, by leave of the court during the trial, the following words: "And he hereby surrenders the same to the libelants." He also during the trial tendered an assignment of his interest to the libelants, and offered to give another assignment to a trustee for the benefit of the libelants under section 4285 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. The court below held that the owners of The Great Western were only liable for the proceeds of the wreck, amounting to $1,796.14, and gave a decree for that amount and interest, and for the costs of the libelants in the district court.

The errors assigned for the reversal of this decree are substantially as follows, to wit: First, That the limitation of the respondent's liability to the value of the ship and freight in the condition in which they were after the stranding and wreck is contrary to the rule contained in section 4283 of the Revised Statutes. Secondly, Because the insurance received by the owners was not included in the value of their interest in the ship, liable to be surrendered in order to [525] obtain a limitation of liability, and was not taken into account in fixing the measure of such liability. Thirdly, Because the court allowed the respondent to amend his answer by the words "and he hereby surrenders the same to the libelants;" and permitted him to give in evidence his written surrender of his interest in the steamer to the libelants; and his offer to make a like surrender to a trustee for the benefit of the defendants. Fourthly, Because, without proof that the laws of Sweden and Great Britian are the same on the subject, the only law applicable to the case was the law of the forum, of which the general admiralty law forms no part.

The points raised in the first and second assignments have been already discussed and decided in the case of Place v. Norwich and New York Trans. Co. [ante, 184]. There is nothing peculiar in the present case, unless it be that The Great Western was not sunk or wrecked by means of the collision, but afterwards, by the carelessness of her master or crew. This can make no difference. We showed in the opinion referred to that the termination of the voyage is the point of time at which the value of the offending vessel is to be taken. The voyage in the present case was not terminated until the vessel was sunk and stranded on the Long Island coast. The carelessness of the master and crew cannot vary the result. It is against their faults and negligence that the law was intended to protect the shipowner, provided the loss and damage sustained were caused without his privity or knowledge.

The third assignment of error cannot be maintained, because the evidence referred to therein, which the court allowed to be given on the trial, could not affect the result; nor was the amendment of the answer material. The answer, as originally framed, set up the defense that the liability of the respondent was limited to the amount or value of his interest in The Great Western and her freight upon the voyage, and averred that that interest was of no value. The issue being thus raised, the respondent was entitled to have the decree against him in that cause limited to the amount which should be shown, by the proofs on the trial, to [526] be the value of said steamer and freight at the termination of the voyage. He did not need to make any surrender or attempt at a surrender. A surrender of the vessel, or payment of her proceeds, or value, into court would have been necessary in order to bring other creditors into concourse with the libelants; but for the mere defense of that cause it was not necessary. This disposes of the supposed difficulty in making an abandonment to the libelants after a surrender or abandonment to the insurers; a difficulty which we have already shown to be groundless, in the opinion referred to.

The fourth assignment of error is not well taken, because the case was altogether decided according to the maritime law of this country, which is the law of the forum.

The decree of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

v.
MARTIN HERZ ET AL.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 180-198.)

Patent law—new matter in reissue—what is not a patentable invention.

1. In an action brought for the alleged infringement of reissued (second reissue) letters patent No. 9094, for an improvement in chair seats, this court holds that, the fabric being old, the suggestion to construct chair seats out of it being old, the shaping of it in a former being old, the perforation of a seat for ventilation and ornamentation being old, and the giving of a concave shape to a wooden seat by pressure being old, there cannot, in view of the disclaimers, be anything patentable in the structure.

2. The suggestion in the second reissue, that "the seat is adapted to be secured to any chair frame, as it is easily cut and fitted to the same," not being found in the original patent or in the first reissue, is new matter, and does not confer patentability on the article. No ground for patentability can be derived from the insertion of such matter in suggestions in the second reissue.

Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court: [181]

This is a suit in equity, brought in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York, by William Gardner, Oliver L. Gardner and Jane E. Gardner against Martin Herz and John K. Mayo, for the infringement of reissued letters patent No. 9094, granted to the plaintiffs, February 24, 1880, for an improvement in chair seats (the original patent, No. 127045, having been granted to George Gardner and Gardner & Gardner, as assignees of George Gardner, as inventor, May 21, 1872, and having been reissued as No. 7208, to George Gardner, William Gardner and Jane E. Gardner, July 4, 1876). The application for the first reissue was filed April 8, 1876, and that for the second, October 31, 1879. The drawings annexed to the original patent and each of the reissues were substantially the same. Those of the second reissue were as follows:

The specification and claim of the original patent were in these words:

This invention relates to chair seats; and it consists in constructing a seat out of veneers of wood, with the grain running across each other and glued together.

I have shown, in the drawing accompanying this specification, three layers of veneers, they being represented by the letters A B C. The grain of veneer A crosses that of veneer B, as shown in section in figure 1, and the grain of veneer B crosses that of veneer C, as seen in figure 2. Veneers when thus arranged, that is to [183] say, with the grain running in diverse directions, will make a seat which, for economy and durability, will be found to be a very useful improvement. The seats may be left solid, or perforated after some design agreeable to the fancy of the one having them made. A slightly concave configuration may be given to the seat, as shown in figure 2.

Seats thus made do not cost as much as those that are made of cane, and are better by far in point of durability.

The veneers rest upon a shoulder, f, of a frame, F, which surrounds them.

Having thus described my invention, what I claim and desire to secure by letters patent is:

As a new article of manufacture, a chair seat constructed of veneers of wood with the grain running crosswise of each other and glued together, all substantially as set forth, and for the purpose specified."

The specification and claims of the first reissue were in these words:

This invention relates to bottoms for seats, and consists in constructing the said seats of two or more veneers of wood, with the grains crossing each other, the said veneers of wood being glued together by an adhesive substance.

I have shown in the drawing accompanying this specification three layers of veneer, applied to the construction of and forming a seat for chairs. These layers of veneer are represented by the letters A, B and C. The grain of veneer A crosses that of veneer B, as shown in section in figure 1, and the grain of veneer B crosses that of veneer C, as seen in figure 2. Veneers, when thus arranged, that is to say, with the grains crossing each other, or diversified, will make a seat which, for durability and economy, will be found to be a very useful improvement. I make the seat either solid, or perforated as shown in figure 1. A slight con [184] cave configuration may be given to the seat.

The perforated seats are made by boring a round hole of any design desired; and they may be bored either by hand or by machinery adapted for the purpose. The perforated seats are desirable, as they are ventilated and ornamental.

I have especially shown and described my improved seat for chairs. The veneers of which this seat is constructed rest upon a shoulder, f, of a frame, F, which surrounds them, as shown in figure 2 of the drawing. The veneers, with the grains crossed or diversified and glued together, become homogeneous, thus making a solid piece of wood, from which I make the bottom of the seat, which, when perforated and varnished, is ready for the market.

Veneers, when thus arranged, that is to say, with the grain running crosswise or in diverse directions, will make a bottom for a seat which, for economy and durability, will be found to be a very useful improvement. The bottoms thus made may be left solid, or perforated after some design agreeable to the fancy of the one having them made. A slightly concave configuration may be given to the bottom, as shown in figure 2, which greatly adds to the comfort of the party using it. The bottom thus made is secured to a frame, F, which surrounds it, and through the latter is secured to the seat frame K.

Having thus described my invention, what I claim is:

1. As a new article of manufacture, a bottom for a seat, constructed of two or more veneers or thin layers of wood, with the grain of the one layer crossing that of the other, and the whole secured together with an adhesive substance, substantially as set forth.

2. As a new article of manufacture, a bottom for a seat frame, constructed of two or more veneers or thin layers of wood, with the grain of the one layer crossing that of the other, said layers being secured together by an adhesive substance, and having perforations formed therein for the purpose of ventilation or ornamentation, substantially as set forth.

3. The combination of a seat bottom, constructed of two or more veneers or thin layers [185] of wood, with the grain of the one layer crossing that of the other, and the whole secured together by an adhesive substance, with the frame of the seat, substantially as set forth.

4. The combination of a seat bottom, constructed of two or more veneers or thin layers of wood, the grain of the one layer crossing that of the other, and the whole secured together by an adhesive substance, and provided with perforations for the purpose of ventilation or ornamentation, with the frame of a seat, substantially as set forth.

5. As a new article of manufacture, a wooden bottom for seats, provided with perforations for the purpose of ventilation or ornamentation.

6. As a new article of manufacture, a seat bottom constructed of two or more veneers or thin layers of wood, the grain of the one layer crossing that of the other, and secured together by an adhesive substance, said bottom thus formed having a curved or concave configuration on its upper side, substantially as set forth."

The specification and claims of the second reissue were in these words:

"The state of the art in relation to devices having a similarity to my invention may be set forth as follows: In letters patent No. 15552" granted to John H. Belter, "August 19, 1856, a bedstead is described made of veneers glued together, with the grains crossing; and in such patent there is a statement that veneers crossing and glued together had been used for combining strength and lightness. In letters patent No. 19405," granted to John H. Belter, "February 23, 1858, chairs and other articles of furniture are described as made of layers of wood or veneers crossing each other, glued together, and pressed to shape. In letters patent No. 40509, granted November 3, 1863, boxes are described as made of veneers or layers of wood crossing each other and glued together. In letters patent No. 23225, granted" to Zebulon B. Bellows, "March 15, 1859, a chair bottom is described as made of a piece of board softened by steam and pressed up to shape in molds.
[186] In letters patent No. 110096, December 13, 1870, a barrel is described of laminæ of wood with the grain crossing and glued together. Sheet metal perforated to form chair bottoms is set forth in A. S. Smith's patent, reissued" to Isaac P. Tice, "June 27, 1865. Chair seats of enameled hard rubber and gutta-percha perforated are set forth in letters patent No. 54863," granted to J. W. Cochran, "May 7, 1866. Letters patent No. 51735, granted December 26, 1865, to J. K. Mayo, sets forth numerous articles made of laminæ of wood; and in a subsequent reissue, dated August 18, 1868, mention is made of a chair seat, but the same was neither concave nor perforated.

My invention, as distinguished from the foregoing, relates to a new article of manufacture, consisting of a chair seat made of veneers of wood, with the grains of one veneer crossing the other and glued together, and having a concave or dishing form, and perforated.

From the foregoing it will be apparent that I do not lay any claim to the veneers crossing each other and glued together, as these have been used for various purposes, and even for furniture, and have become public property. Neither do I claim the pressing of a chair seat into a concave form by dies. Neither do I claim a perforated seat, as sheet metal has been employed; but it is cold to the person, and liable to break and to catch the clothing. Neither do I claim a single layer of such material as hard rubber or gutta-percha perforated. This is so expensive as not to be adapted to general use.

My chair seat is a new article, possessing great strength and durability. It is very light and cheap. It forms an agreeable seat. It is not hot in summer or cold in winter. The perforations give the wood a handsome appearance and afford the required ventilation; and the seat is adapted to be secured to any chair frame, as it is easily cut and fitted to the same, and the cost of these seats is less than those made of cane, and they are much more durable.

In the drawings, figure 1 is a plan, with the upper layer of veneer partially removed. Figure 2 is a vertical section of the chair and seat.

I have shown three layers of veneers, A, B, C. The grain of the veneer A crosses that of the veneer B, and the grain of the veneer B crosses [187] that of the veneer C, and these are cemented together by suitable adhesive substance, such as glue.

The seat is of a concave or dishing form, so as to be better adapted to the shape of the person, and the under side of the seat is convex.

The perforations through the seat are to be arranged to produce any design that may be agreeable to the fancy of the person making or using the chair. These perforations make the seat light, and also ventilate the same.

The edges of the seat rest upon and are secured to the chair frame; and in Fig. 2 the frame is rabbeted to form shoulders f, upon which the edges of the seat rest.

I claim as my invention:

1. As a new article of manufacture, a chair seat formed of laminæ of wood with the grain crossed, glued together, and concave on the upper surface and convex on the lower surface, adapted to a chair frame, substantially as set forth.

2. A chair seat made of laminæ of wood glued together, with the grains in one layer crossing those of the next, concave on the upper surface, convex on the lower surface, and perforated, as a new article of manufacture, substantially as set forth."

While the first reissue was in life the owners of it brought a suit in equity against the present defendants, in the same court, alleging infringement of the first five claims of the first reissue. An application being made for a preliminary injunction it was denied, in May, 1879. 16 Blatchf. 303. The patent of December, 1865, to the defendant Mayo, and division E of its reissue of August 18, 1868 (both of them mentioned in Gardner's second reissue), being put in evidence, it was held that what was claimed in the first claim of Gardner's first reissue was described in the two Mayo patents, both of which were reissued prior to Gardner's original patent. This related to the veneers, with crossing grains, glued together, of the first four claims of Gardner's first reissue. As to the perforations of the second, fourth and fifth claims of that reissue, the Tice reissue of June 27, 1865, and the Cochran patent of May 22, 1866 (both of them mentioned in Gardner's second reissue), were put in evidence, and it [188] was held that they showed a chair seat of perforated sheet metal, and one of perforated enameled India rubber or gutta-percha, containing every feature of ventilation and ornamentation, resulting from perforations, which Gardner's perforated chair seat exhibited; and that, in view of those prior perforated seats, there was no patentable novelty in perforating a wooden bottom. The conclusion of the court was that there was nothing new or patentable in the first five claims of Gardner's first reissue, in view of the patents referred to. It was not claimed that the sixth claim of that reissue had been infringed. The defendants' seat bottom involved in that case was made of two or more veneers or thin layers of wood, with the grain of the one layer crossing that of the other, and the whole secured together with an adhesive substance; and there were slots or slits cut through the seat, as long as the length of the seat bottom from front to rear, leaving longitudinal holes of that length, and thus forming ribs or slats, the effect of which was to make the seat bottom yielding and elastic.

A little over five months after this decision was made, the second reissue was applied for, and about four months after it was granted this suit was brought. The answer attacks the novelty and patentability of the invention and the validity of both reissues. After issue, proofs were taken, and in June, 1882, the circuit court rendered a decision, dismissing the bill (20 Blatchf. 538), and from the decree to that effect the plaintiffs have appealed.

The second claim is the only one in question. It will be well here to repeat it: "2. A chair seat made of laminæ of wood glued together, with the grains in one layer crossing those of the next, concave on the upper surface, convex on the lower surface, and perforated, as a new article of manufacture, substantially as set forth." The defendants made and sold such chair seats.

Referring to the decision as to the first reissue, to the effect that veneers, with the grains of the successive layers crossed and cemented together, adapted for the construction of chairs and settees, were shown in the two Mayo patents, and that the Mayo reissue, division E, described the shaping of the material, when made pliable, by compression in a matrix or on formers, and that the Tice and Cochran patents showed perforated chair seats of metal and gutta-percha, the circuit court held, in this case, that the only question open, as to the second reissue, was whether the concavity of form, made an element of the second claim of that reissue, would support the patent. Concurring, as we do, in the views and conclusions of the court, and finding them well expressed in its opinion, we repeat them here:

"Chair bottoms made of board and softened by steam and pressed to a concave shape in a mold, so that the form of the seat will conform to the shape of the person who may occupy it, are shown in the letters patent issued to Z. B. Bellows, bearing date March 15, 1859. So, also, the concave or dishing form of chair seats had been adopted long before Gardner's patent, in ordinary chair seats. In the specification of the present reissue the inventor states that he does not lay any claim to the veneers crossing each other and glued together, as these have been used for various purposes and have become public property, and that he does not claim the pressing of a chair seat into the concave form by dies.

If there was no patentable novelty in using the perforations of the metal or gutta-percha chair seats in the veneer seat by Gardner, neither can there seem to be any in employing a well known form of chair seat in his veneer seat. As it had been pointed out by Mayo that the material used is pliable and can be pressed into any desired form, and as the reissue disclaims the pressing of a chair seat into a concave form, and as chair seats had been so formed, it is difficult to see how there was any invention in Gardner's chair seat. Gardner merely applied a process that was old to a material that was old, to obtain an old form. Considered as a combination, it is hardly possible to believe that the perforations or the concavity performed any new functions in the Gardner seat. An ingenious feature has been presented, to the effect that the perforations and concavity cooperate, in Gardner's seat, to prevent warping and curling of the material used. If this is true, the same elements were combined in the Baillie chair back and performed there the same functions they performed in the Gardner seat. It may be that the Gardner seat is mechanically a better seat than any which preceded it, but his improvement is not a patentable one.

It is strenuously insisted that the popularity and success achieved by the Gardner seat, beyond those of his predecessors, affords cogent evidence both of the utility and patentable novelty of his invention. The answer to this argument is that the success of his seat is probably due to a feature which is not suggested in the original patent; that is, its adaptability for use by unskilled workmen. His seats, as now made, can be fitted without mechanical skill to a bottomless chair, and are largely used to repair chairs in which the original seats have been worn out, and can be so used without any special skill. They are, also, largely sold to chair manufacturers, because they can be easily adapted to chairs of different sizes and seats of different forms. But the chair seat described in Gardner's original patent, and shown in the drawings, did not practically possess this characteristic of adaptability, but was a frame seat, which could only be fitted to a chair by a skilled laborer. Such a chair seat would fail to meet the peculiar want which the present chair seat supplies. Considered as a new article of manufacture, if the complainant's chair seat has no frame, and its novelty and utility consist in its adaptability to be sold separate from the frame, and to be readily applied by any person to any chair, then the reissue is for a different invention from that disclosed in the original patent.

In conclusion, in view of the former decision of this court, the complainant can only succeed upon the theory that, by imparting a concave form to his chair seat, he has imparted sufficient patentable novelty to his article to sustain a patent; and this, when such a form of chair seat was old, the material used was old, and the method of imparting the form to the material was old. This theory cannot stand."

On the argument of the appeal the following considerations were strongly urged, as grounds for reversing the decree: an article of manufacture is patentable under section 4886 of the 191] Revised Statutes, if it is new and useful. This chair seat was new and useful. There did not exist before, as an article of manufacture, a chair seat composed of laminæ of wood, with the grains crossed and glued together, molded to be concave, and perforated. The statute makes novelty and utility the only test of patentability. In a suit for infringement, the decision of the Commissioner of Patents is final, as to the matters involved in granting a patent, except as to the questions specifically enumerated as defenses in the five subdivisions of section 4920 of the Revised Statutes. Unless substantially the same thing existed before, the article, if useful, is new and patentable. The decision of the Commissioner of Patents to that effect is not reviewable in a suit on the patent.

It is a sufficient answer to these suggestions to say that the questions presented are not open ones in this court.

In Mahn v. Harwood, 112 U. S. 354, 358 [Bk. 28, L. ed. 665, 667], it was said: "The statutory defenses are not the only defenses which may be made against a patent. Where it is evident that the Commissioner, under a misconception of the law, has exceeded his authority in granting or reissuing a patent, there is no sound principle to prevent a party sued for its infringement from availing himself of the illegality, independent of any statutory permission so to do. * * * In cases of patents for inventions, a valid defense not given by the statute often arises where the question is whether the thing patented amounts to a patentable invention. This being a question of law the courts are not bound by the decision of the Commissioner, although he must necessarily pass upon it." Several cases in this court were there cited to this effect.

On the other point presented it was said, in Thompson v. Boisselier, 114 U. S. 1, 11 [Bk. 29, L. ed. 76, 79], that, under article 1, section 8, subdivision 8 of the Constitution, a patentee "must be an inventor and he must have made a discovery;" that "the statute has always carried out this idea," referring to section 6 of the Act of July 4, 1836, 5 Stat. at L. 119, and section 24 of the Act of July 8, 1870, 16 Stat. at L. 201, and section 4886 of the Revised Statutes; that "it is not 192] enough that a thing shall be new, in the sense that, in the shape or form in which it is produced, it shall not have been before known, and that it shall be useful, but it must, under the Constitution and the statute, amount to an invention or discovery." A large number of cases in this court were there referred to, and one especially where the thing claimed was new, "in the sense that it had not been anticipated by any previous invention, and it was shown to have superior utility; yet it was held not to be such an improvement as was entitled to be regarded in the patent law as an invention." A case to the same effect at this term is Yale Lock Mfg. Co. v. Greenleaf, 117 U. S. 554 [Bk. 29, L. ed. 952].

It is strongly urged that Gardner's seat is cheap, strong, durable, can be applied to different chair seat frames, can be sold separate from chair seat frames, and can be applied to chair seat frames by unskilled labor; and that, therefore, it was patentable. But these views are fully met by the observations of the court below, above set forth.

The fabric being old, the suggestion to construct chair seats out of it being old, the shaping of it in a former being old, the perforation of a seat for ventilation and ornamentation being old, and the giving of a concave shape to a wooden seat by pressure being old, there cannot, in view of the disclaimers in the second reissue, be anything patentable in the structure. It was convenient to sell and convenient to buy, and commercially a good article. But a patent cannot be taken out for an article, old in purpose and shape and mode of use, when made for the first time out of an existing material, and with accompaniments before applied to such an article, merely because the idea has occurred that it would be a good thing to make the article out of that particular old material. Beyond that, the suggestion in the second reissue, that "the seat is adapted to be secured to any chair frame, as it is easily cut and fitted to the same," is not found in the original patent, or in the first reissue, and is new matter, so far as anything in it can be invoked to confer patentability on the article.

The second reissue appears, by the decision of the examiners-in-chief of the Patent Office, on appeal, found in the record, to have been granted on the sole ground that Gardner's chair seat was an independent article, formed and shaped as described, to be put on the market by itself, and ready to be attached to a chair frame, and not to be marketed as a component part of [193] a chair, but as a seat ready to be fitted and affixed to a chair. Nothing to this purport being found in the original patent, or in the first reissue, and the first reissue having been applied for more than three years and ten months, and the second reissue more than seven years and five months, after the original patent was granted, no ground for patentability can be derived from the insertion of such suggestions in the second reissue.

There was a recent instructive case in England, in the Court of Appeal, before Lord Coleridge and Justices Field and Bowen (Saxby v. Gloucester Waggon Co. 7 Q. B. Div. 305), where the question was, whether "the invention specified was such a substantial improvement on what had already been known and published as to render it the proper subject of a patent." The specified patented combination did not before exist, but it existed with the exception of two pieces of mechanism, and their use for the purpose of doing what they did in the combination was well known. But it was held that the combination might have been made "by any intelligent mechanical workman," with no other instructions than those contained in a prior patent to the same inventor; and that there was no novelty in the combination sufficient to constitute a patent. In regard to another branch of the case, it appeared that, taking two prior separate inventions together, every element of the patent in question was to be found in one or the other of those inventions, and it was held that the combination of the two prior inventions did not require "an exercise of such an amount of skill and ingenuity as to entitle it to the protection of an exclusive grant." This case is referred to for the purpose of showing that the question of patentability, as depending on the quantum of inventive skill in a given case, is one which the courts of England consider in a suit for infringement. See also Pa. R. R. Co. v. Locomotive Truck Co. 110 U. S. 490 [Bk. 28, L. ed. 222], and the cases there collected.

The decree of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

UNITED STATES, Appt.,
v.
JOHN M. LANGSTON.

Salary of minister to Hayti—repeal of statute by implication.

A statute fixing the salary of a public officer at a named sum, without limitation as to time, should not be deemed abrogated or suspended by subsequent enactments which merely appropriate a less amount for the services of such officer for particular fiscal years, and which contain no words that expressly or by clear implication modify or repeal the previous law.

Submitted April 26, 1886. Decided May 10, 1886.

APPEAL from the Court of Claims. Affirmed.

The case is stated by the court.

Messrs. A. H. Garland, Atty-Gen. and Ed. M. Watson, for appellant.

Mr. Geo. A. King, for appellee.

Mr. Justice Harlan delivered the opinion of the court:

From September 28, 1877, until July 24, 1885, the claimant, John M. Langston, held the office of Minister Resident and Consul-General of the United States at the Republic of Hayti. At the time he entered upon the discharge of his duties it was provided by statute as follows: "There shall be a diplomatic representative of the United States to each of the Republics of Hayti and Liberia, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall be accredited as Minister Resident and Consul-General. The representative at Hayti shall be entitled to a salary of $7,500 a year, and the representative at Liberia to a salary not exceeding $4,000 a year." R. S. § 1683. The sum of $7,500 has been annually appropriated for the salary of the minister to Hayti, from the creation of the office until the year 1883. 12 Stat. at L. 534, 569; 13 Id. 139, 424; 14 Id. 225, 414; 15 Id. 58, 321; 16 Id. 219, 417; 17 Id. 142, 471; 18 Id. 67, 321; 19 Id. 170, 233; 20 Id. 92, 267; 21 Id. 134, 339.

In the Act making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, it is provided "That the following sums be and the same are hereby appropriated for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, out of any money in the treasury, not otherwise appropriated, for the objects hereinafter expressed, namely: * * * For minister resident and consul-general to Hayti, $7,500 * * * And the salaries provided in this Act for the officers within named, respectively, shall be in full for the annual salaries thereof from and after July 1, 1878; and all laws and parts of laws in conflict with the provisions of this Act are hereby repealed." 20 Stat. at L. 91, 92, 98. Similar provisions were in the Diplomatic and Consular Appropriation Act for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880. Id. 267, 274. A like sum was appropriated for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1881, and June 30, 1882; [391] but the appropriation Acts for those years did not repeat the declaration contained in the Acts for the fiscal years of 1879 and 1880, to the effect that "The salaries provided in this Act for the officers within named, respectively, shall be in full for the annual salaries thereof," etc. 21 Stat. at L. 138, 134, 339.

In the Diplomatic and Consular Appropriation Act of July 1, 1882, certain sums were appropriated "for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, out of any money in the treasury, not otherwise appropriated, for the objects therein expressed," one of them being "for ministers resident and consuls-general to Liberia, Hayti, Switzerland, Denmark and Portugal, at $5,000 each, $25,000." 22 Stat. at L. 128. The same Act provided that "hereafter the Secretary of State shall, in the estimates for the annual expenditures of diplomatic and consular service, estimate for the entire amount required for its support, including all commercial agents, and other officers, whether paid by fees or otherwise, specifying the compensation to be allowed or deemed advisable in each individual case." Id. 133. It is stated in the brief of the Attorney-General that the Secretary of State made a specific estimate for the salary of the minister resident and consul-general to Hayti for the fiscal years commencing July 1, 1883 and 1884, and that estimate was $5,000 in each report. For each of the fiscal years ending June 30, 1884, and June 30, 1885, the appropriations for the minister resident and consul-general at Hayti was $5,000, and in the same language as that employed in reference to that officer in the Act for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883.

In the Consular and Diplomatic Appropriation Bill of 1884, the Committee on Appropriations in the House of Representatives reported the following paragraph as part of the bill:

"And the foregoing appropriations for Envoys Extraordinary and Ministers Plenipotentiary, Ministers Resident and Charges d'Affaires, Ministers Resident and Consuls-General, Secretaries of Legation, and Interpreters, shall, after June 30, 1884, be the salary of each officer respectively; and all Acts or parts of Acts inconsistent or in conflict therewith, or which allow a larger salary to any officer or employé herein named, shall be, and are hereby, repealed." Cong. Rec. 48th Cong. 1st sess. part [392] 4, p. 4194. This paragraph was omitted from the Act as passed.

The claimant was paid at the rate of $7,500 a year up to and including June 30, 1882, and for the balance of his term at the rate only of $5,000 a year. He brought this suit to recover the difference between those amounts for the period from June 30, 1882, to July 24, 1885. His claim was sustained in the court below, and judgment was rendered in his behalf for $7,666.66.

This case is distinguishable from United States v. Fisher, 109 U. S. 143, 146 [Bk. 27, L. ed. 885, 887], and United States v. Mitchell, Id. 146, 149 [Id. 887]. In Fisher's Case it was held that the clause in the Revised Statutes, fixing the salary of the Chief Justice and Associate Justices of Wyoming at $3,000 per annum, was suspended by the provision in each of the appropriation Acts for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1879, and 1880, which declared that the sums therein specified—among which was $2,600 each to the Governor, Chief Justice, and two Associate Judges of Wyoming—were appropriated "in full compensation," for the service of those years. The claim of Fisher for compensation, on the basis fixed by the Revised Statutes, was consequently rejected. This court said: "We cannot adopt the view of the appellee, unless we eliminate from the statute the words 'in full compensation,' which Congress, abandoning the long used form of the appropriation Acts, has ex industria inserted. Our duty is to give them effect. When Congress has said that the sum appropriated shall be in full compensation of the services of the appellee, we cannot say that it shall not be in full compensation, and allow him a greater sum."

In Mitchell's Case the claim was for compensation as an Indian interpreter under sections 2070 and 2076 of the Revised Statutes, the first one of which declared that interpreters of a certain class shall be paid $400 a year each, and by the second one of which it was provided that the several compensations prescribed "shall be in full of all emoluments and allowances whatsoever." During the period for which Mitchell claimed compensation at that rate, he received pay at the rate of $800 per annum, under Acts appropriating various sums for interpreters, including seven interpreters [393] for the Indian Tribes among whom Mitchell was assigned to duty, "at $300 per annum, $2,100." 19 Stat. at L. 271. In those Acts there was also a clause to this effect: "For additional pay of said interpreters, to be distributed in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, $6,000." It was held that these Acts manifested a change of policy upon the part of Congress, "namely: that instead of establishing a salary for interpreters at a fixed amount, and cutting off all other emoluments and allowances, Congress intended to reduce the salaries, and place a fund at the disposal of the Secretary of the Interior from which, at his discretion, additional emoluments and allowances might be given to the interpreters." The appropriation by those Acts of a fixed sum as compensation for certain interpreters during a prescribed period, followed by the appropriation of a round sum as additional pay, to be distributed among them in the discretion of one of the Executive Departments, evinced the intention of Congress not to allow further compensation to such appointees during the periods specified.

The case before us does not come within the principle that controlled the determination of the other cases. The salary of the minister to Hayti was originally fixed at the sum of $7,500. Neither of the Acts appropriating $5,000 for his benefit, during the fiscal years in question, contains any language to the effect that such sum shall be "in full compensation" for those years; nor was there in either of them an appropriation of money "for additional pay;" from which it might be inferred that Congress intended to repeal the Act fixing his annual salary at $7,500. Repeals by implication are not favored. It cannot be said that there is a positive repugnancy between the old and the new statutes in question. If by any reasonable construction they can be made to stand together, our duty is to give effect to the provisions of each. Chew Heong v. United States, 112 U. S. 549 [Bk. 28, L. ed. 778]; State v. Stoll, 17 Wall. 425, 430 [84 U. S. bk. 21, 650]; Ex parte Yerger, 8 Wall. 85, 105 [75 U. S. bk. 19, L. ed. 332, 339]; Ex parte Crow Dog, 109 U. S. 556, 570 [Bk. 27, L. ed. 1030, 1035]. The suggestion of most weight in support of the view that Congress intended to reduce the salary of the diplomatic representative at Hayti is the improbability that that body would neglect, in any year, to appropriate the full sum to which that officer was entitled under the law as it then existed. On the other hand, it is not prob- [394] able that Congress, knowing, as we must presume it did, that that officer had, in virtue of a statute—whose object was to fix his salary—received annually a salary of $7,500 from the date of the creation of his office, and after expressly declaring in the Act of 1878, 20 Stat. at L. 91, 98, that he should receive that salary from and after July 1, 1878, and again in 1879, that he should receive the same amount from and after July 1, 1879, should, at a subsequent date, make a permanent reduction of his salary without indicating its purpose to do so, either by express words of repeal or by such provisions as would compel the courts to say that harmony between the old and the new statute was impossible. While the case is not free from difficulty, the court is of opinion that, according to the settled rules of interpretation, a statute fixing the annual salary of a public officer at a named sum, without limitation as to time, should not be deemed abrogated or suspended by subsequent enactments which merely appropriated a less amount for the services of that officer for particular fiscal years, and which contained no words that expressly or by clear implication modified or repealed the previous law.

The judgment is affirmed.

Equity jurisdiction—sufficiency of legal remedy.

A bill, the object of which is to have the defendants enjoined from interfering with the pilot business of the complainant, in which the gist of the complaint is that the defendants do not treat the plaintiff as having a right to use his vessel as a pilot boat, and have so publicly stated, and that some of the parties mentioned have been subjected to suits for their acts in piloting, is obnoxious to demurrer. Upon the allegations of the bill the plaintiff had a complete legal remedy.

Argued and submitted April 20, 1886. Decided May 10, 1886.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Louisiana.
Reversed.

Statement by Mr. Justice Field:

This is a suit in equity to restrain the defendants from doing certain things charged against them intended to injure the plaintiff, and destroy his property and business. The bill alleges that he is a citizen of Florida, and brings the bill against Richard Francis, individually and as agent for others, and W. T. Levine and thirty-seven others, who are named, and who are citizens of Louisiana. It sets forth that he is a one eighth owner of the steam pilot boat Mary Lee, a decked vessel of over fifty tons burden; that his interest exceeds the value of $5,000; that she was built, and is manned and equipped, [386] and in all respects fitted for the purposes of a pilot boat, and for some months has been, and is now, used as a pilot boat at South Pass, known as The Jetties, at one of the mouths of the Mississippi River; that by Act of Congress of June 1, 1874, the pass, or channel, has been since the beginning of the construction of the jetties under control of the Secretary of War; that the Government has caused the obstructions formerly existing in the channel, known as the bar, to be removed; that the pass is subject to no other regulations than those prescribed by the Secretary; that the plaintiff in his business of pilot has, in all respects, conformed to them; that the captain and other officers of his vessel are duly commissioned under the laws of the United States; that certain persons named Pliny Cox, George A. Falconi, and Hiram Follett are on board as branch pilots, and they act as pilots on vessels inward and outward bound to and from the sea through the South Pass; and, as part owners of the pilot boat, they are licensed under the laws of the United States as branch pilots for the Port of New Orleans; and that as such they are entitled to pilot vessels from the sea to the Mississippi River, and from the river to the sea.

The bill further alleges that, under the laws of the United States relating to the channel known as The Jetties, and to the vessels and steamers of the character of The Mary Lee, the plaintiff, as owner, has a right to have the captain and the pilots, Cox, Falconi, and Follett, protected in the business of piloting through the channel to and from the sea, and is entitled to a decree recognizing his right to render services with his pilot boat to all vessels to and from the sea through the said pass and channel whenever any one of such branch pilots employed by him shall be on board of such vessel, inward and outward bound, drawing more than twelve feet of water; and that any law of Louisiana, or any rules or regulations made by the defendants in contravention of the laws of Congress and the regulations of the Secretary of War, are null and void.

The bill also alleges that the defendants have combined and confederated together for the pur-[387] pose of destroying the business and property of the plaintiff by publications in the newspapers and by divers and sundry suits, and by injunctions, and "in various other and divers ways," and have instituted suit against J. W. Black, George A. Sheldon, Hiram Follett, Pliny Cox, and George A. Follett [Falconi], all of whom are part owners of The Mary Lee, and three of whom are branch pilots for the Port of New Orleans.

The bill mentions three suits thus brought, one in the United States Circuit Court and two in the state courts, and alleges that they were instituted at the instance of the defendants, and that in them they have charged that Black and others are towing vessels drawing more than twelve feet of water through The Jetties, without branch pilots of the Port of New Orleans; that Follett and Cox are not such branch pilots, but intruders into office; and that Falconi, although a branch pilot, has no right to pilot vessels through The Jetties in the service of the owners or agents of The Mary Lee, because of some agreement with the defendants not to act as pilot on any ship or vessel against their interest. The bill also alleges that the defendants have formed themselves into a pretended partnership, and bound themselves not to do any service as branch pilots for the Port of New Orleans with any other persons than those mentioned in the said confederation; and that these acts are intended to injure and will injure the plaintiff and make his property worthless unless they are restrained by the court. Then follows a prayer that the defendants be enjoined from interfering with the business of the plaintiff in the use of the pilot boat, and with its captain, and with Hiram Follett, Pliny Cox, and George A. Falconi, branch pilots of the Port of New Orleans, in the exercise of their duty as such while in the service of the plaintiff pending the proceedings, "with a view of preserving from waste and destruction his business and property;" and, after due proceedings had, that the injunction be made perpetual, and a decree be entered adjudging that the association or confederation of the defendants, so far as it was designed to interfere with the rights of the plaintiff, his pilot boat and business and branch pilots, is contra bonos mores, and in violation of law and of good order, and that all acts done in pursuance thereof are null and void, and that [38 the right of the plaintiff to pursue his occupation with his pilot boat to pilot vessels through the South Pass to and from the sea be recognized pursuant to the Acts of Congress, and for general relief.

The defendants demurred to the bill on various grounds, and, among others, that it does not state any sufficient cause for equitable cognizance or relief in favor of the plaintiff against them, or either of them. The court overruled the demurrer and, the defendants' answer and replication having been filed, proofs were taken and the case heard thereon and on the pleadings. An injunction pendente lite was granted, and the decree of the court made the injunction perpetual, from which an appeal was taken to this court.

Mr. J. R. Beckwith, for appellants.
Mr. Joseph P. Hornor, for appellee.

Mr. Justice Field delivered the opinion of the court:

The bill does not state what the publications were of which the plaintiff complains, or what the divers suits instigated by the defendants were other than those mentioned, in which charges were made as to towing vessels through the pass without pilots, and as to certain persons not being branch pilots, or contracting not to serve as such. Nor does it state any of the other "various and diverse ways" in which he is injured by the defendants.

The whole gist of the complaint is that the defendants do not treat the plaintiff as having a right to use his vessel as a pilot boat, and have publicly so stated, and that some of the parties mentioned have been subjected to suits for their acts in piloting. But if this be so, the plaintiff has a full remedy for his alleged wrongs in the courts of law. They furnish no ground for the interposition of a court of equity. If the plaintiff has a right to pilot vessels with his boat through the pass and is wrongfully interfered with by the defendants or others, he can prosecute them for the wrong. If his vessel is arrested in its passage, without lawful warrant, he can bring the defendants before the courts [289] to answer for their conduct. If his pilots are duly licensed, and they are hindered or prevented from the exercise of their business, both he and they have the same means of redress which are afforded to every citizen whose rights are invaded and obstructed. If the publications in the newspapers are false and injurious, he can prosecute the publishers for libel. If a court of equity could interfere and use its remedy of injunction in such cases, it would draw to itself the greater part of the litigation properly belonging to courts of law.

We think the court below should have sustained the demurrer of the defendants for want of equity in the bill.

The decree must, therefore, be reversed and the cause remanded, with instructions to dismiss the bill; and it is so ordered.

Removal of causes—questions of fact arising on the petition to be tried in federal court—when petition to be filed.

Where, had the defendant answered on the 4th of November, which was the earliest day she could have been required so to do, there would not have been fourteen days between that and the term of court; and under the Code of Practice of South Carolina the case could not have been tried until the next February Term without her consent; and the same would be true if she had put in her answer on the 16th of December, which was probably the day it was really due, and her petition for removal of the cause had been presented at the February Term, it was held that it was presented "at the term at which the cause could be first tried," according to the meaning of that phrase in the Act of 1875 for the removal of causes.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of South Carolina.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of South Carolina. Reversed.

The case is stated by the court.

Messrs. H. E. Young, James Lowndes, Clarence A. Seward and A. G. Magrath, for plaintiff in error and appellant.

Messrs. Edward McCrady, Jr. and Edward McCrady, for defendants in error and appellees.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

The records in these cases show that William [280] A. Carson, a citizen of South Carolina, died on the 17th of August, 1856, leaving a will, by which he devised the bulk of his property, real and personal, to his executors, Alexander Robertson and John F. Blacklock, substantially in trust for his widow, Caroline Carson, and his sons, William Carson and James P. Carson, but with a power of sale in the executors. Under these circumstances the executors sold a plantation known as "Dean Hall" to Elias N. Ball, and for the unpaid purchase money he, on the 2d of March, 1857, executed his bonds conditioned for the payment in all of the sum of $31,000, in five equal annual installments from January 14, 1857, with interest from March 2, payable annually, and secured by mortgage on the property. The debts of the estate were all paid in June, 1857, and from that time the executors held the bonds and mortgage of Ball in trust for Mrs. Carson and her two sons. The sons afterwards assigned their interest in the bonds to their mother. Mrs. Carson left South Carolina early in 1861 and went to New York to live. She has never since returned to South Carolina. Her son William came of age in 1863, but he left South Carolina before the late civil war and has been absent ever since. James did not come of age until [281] after the war; and the executor Blacklock was absent from the United States during the whole of it.

In March, 1863, the firm of Hyatt, McBurney & Company, doing business in Charleston, bought "Dean Hall" from Ball, and he, at their request, induced Robertson, the only trustee then in America, to accept payment of the bonds held for Mrs. Carson in confederate treasury notes and discharge the mortgage. This being done, Ball conveyed the property to Edmund Hyatt, William McBurney, William Hasseltine, Thomas R. McGahan, and Alfred L. Gillespie, who composed the firm of Hyatt, McBurney & Co. On the 8th of May, 1863, Hyatt sold his interest in the firm to his other partners, and executed to them a conveyance of this property among the other assets, and the remaining partners gave to him a bond for $40,000, secured by a mortgage on these premises.

After the war ended, Mrs. Carson, then a citizen of New York, brought suit in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of South Carolina to re-establish the mortgage and to set aside the release which had been executed by Robertson, and for a foreclosure. A decree was entered by the circuit court in accordance with the prayer of the bill; but on appeal to this court that decree was reversed for want of proper parties, and the cause sent back for further proceedings. Robertson v. Carson, 19 Wall. 94 [86 U. S. bk. 23, L. ed. 178]. When the case got back to the circuit court the required additional parties were made, and another decree was finally entered, establishing the rights of Mrs. Carson, and ordering a sale of the property. This decree was affirmed here at the October Term, 1878. McBurney v. Carson, 99 U. S. 567 [Bk. 25, L. ed. 378]. Hyatt was not a party to that suit, he being then a citizen of New York, the same as Mrs. Carson at that time. Under this decree the property was sold, and bought by Mrs. Carson. Hyatt died in New York on the 20th of September, 1876, leaving a will appointing his daughter, Mary A. Hyatt, executrix, and Joaquin Delmonte, executor. Mary A. Hyatt and Julia Delmonte are devisees under the will and heirs at law of his estate, and Mary E. Hyatt is his [282] widow and an heir at law. Joaquin Delmonte is a citizen or subject of Spain, and all the others are citizens of New York. At some time, but precisely when does not appear from the records, these parties filed in the Court of Common Pleas of Charleston, South Carolina, their complaint, which was sworn to on the 15th of October, 1879, against William McBurney, William Hasseltine, Alfred L. Gillespie, and Thomas R. McGahan, "members of the late firm of Hyatt, McBurney & Co.," and Caroline Carson, for the foreclosure of the mortgage given Hyatt on his retirement from the firm. It does not appear how or by what process the defendants were brought into court, but there is in the record a stipulation of which the following is a copy:

"Mary A. Hyatt, as Executrix and as Devisee and Heir at law of the late Edmund Hyatt; Joaquin Delmonte, Executor of the said Edmund Hyatt; Mary E. Hyatt, Widow and Heir at law of the said Edmund Hyatt, deceased; and Julia Delmonte, as Devisee and Heir at law of the said Edmund Hyatt,

"William McBurney, William Hasseltine, Alfred L. Gillespie, and Thomas R. McGahan, members of the late firm of Hyatt, McBurney & Co., and Caroline Carson.

"The time for the defendants in this case to answer having expired, on motion of McCrady & Son, plaintiffs' attorneys, it is ordered that the case be referred to W. D. Clancy, Esq., one of the masters of this court, to take testimony and report the same; and, with the consent of the said plaintiffs' attorneys, it is further ordered that the defendant Caroline Carson do have further time to answer the complaint herein, to wit: until the twenty-fourth day of January next, and that she be allowed to file the same, under the signature of her counsel, who has entered an appearance in the cause, without oath thereto.

"December 16, 1879. A. P. Aldrich.
"We consent. McCrady & Son.
A. G. Magrath."

The record shows an answer of Mrs. Carson, [283] not under oath, and signed only by her counsel, setting up her defense upon the same facts on which she recovered in the other suit. In this answer it is, among other things, stated that early in 1861 she "left South Carolina and went to New York, where she has ever since resided and had her domicil." This answer was filed January 31, 1880, and, on the 16th of February, Mrs. Carson presented her petition for the removal of the suit to the Circuit Court of the United States, the material parts of which are as follows:

"To the Honorable the Judges of the said court:

"Your petitioner, Caroline Carson, respectfully sheweth that the above entitled suit is of a civil nature, and is now pending in this court; the matter or amount in dispute is, exclusive of costs, the sum or value of $500, and is of the value of over $10,000; that the controversy in the said suit is between citizens of different States and between citizens of a State and a citizen or subject of a foreign State; that your petitioner was, at the beginning of this suit, and still is, a citizen of the State of Massachusetts; that the said Joaquin Delmonte then was, and still is, a citizen or subject of Spain, and all the other parties, plaintiffs above mentioned, then were, and still are, citizens of the State of New York; that William McBurney and Thomas R. McGahan then were, and still are, citizens of South Carolina; that Alfred L. Gillespie then was, and still is, a citizen of Tennessee; and William Hasseltine then was, and still is, a citizen of California.

"Your petitioner further says that in the above mentioned suit there is a controversy which is wholly between citizens of different States and between a citizen of a State and a foreign State, namely: between the said plaintiffs and your petitioner, and which can be wholly determined as between them."

Accompanying this petition was the following affidavit:

"Personally appeared before me James Lowndes, and made oath that he is the attorney of Caroline Carson, and has read her petition for the removal of the said cause to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of South Carolina, and that the facts therein stated are true to the best of his information and be- [284
lief, save that he cannot aver that Dean Hall is of greater value than five thousand dollars and five hundred dollars; that his information as to the domicil of Hasseltine is drawn from a statement made to him by some person, whose name he cannot recall; that his information as to the domicil of Caroline Carson is drawn from these facts, viz.: That about the 1st July, 1877, he received in due course of mail a letter from the said Caroline Carson, dated at Brookline, Massachusetts, in which she informed the deponent that she had made a declaration or affidavit of her change of domicil from New York to Massachusetts; and that deponent continued to receive letters from her in the latter State during the month of July, 1877, and he knows her purpose to have been to become a citizen of Massachusetts; and he knows that she has not in fact for many years resided in New York.

"James Lowndes."

On the 25th of March the court refused to stop further proceedings, giving its reasons therefor as follows:

"The plaintiffs in this case, except one a Spanish subject, are citizens of the State of New York, and the controversy, as appears by the pleadings, is wholly between them and the defendant, Caroline Carson, who in her answer states that she is also a citizen of that State. She has also filed with her answer an exhibit of a previous case in the United States Court relating to the same matter, in which cases she was plaintiff, suing as a citizen of the State of New York. No motion has been made by her for leave to amend or withdraw her answer, nor has any affidavit or other testimony been submitted showing that her answer was erroneous and the matter therein in reference to her citizenship was inserted by inadvertence or mistake. After this case had been referred to the master, and after the filing of her said answer by the said defendant, and the master, attended by the attorneys for plaintiffs and said defendant, had finished taking the testimony offered by the plaintiffs, the said defendant filed a petition in this court praying a removal of this case to the Circuit Court of the United States, and alleging that she is a citizen of the State of Massachusetts.

[285] "That petition is not properly verified, and the insufficient affidavit by her attorney does not state any matter which would justify me in disregarding the positive statement in her answer and exhibit.

"I, therefore, hold that the controversy in this case is between a citizen of the State of New York on the one side, and other citizens of the same State and a Spanish subject on the other side; and further, that the petition of defendant for the removal of the case was not filed until after the trial had commenced.

"She is, therefore, not entitled to have the case removed from this court, and her motion to that effect is refused."

On the 9th of March, 1880, a transcript of the record was filed by Mrs. Carson in the Circuit Court of the United States, and on the 10th of December, 1881, the cause came up for hearing in that court on a motion to remand. At this time affidavits were filed showing clearly that Mrs. Carson, in May or June, 1877, changed her citizenship from New York to Massachusetts, and that she had not from that time resided in New York or represented that State as her home. The answer was drawn by her counsel and her domicil in New York stated by inadvertence, without her knowledge. As soon as the answer was seen by her she called attention to the mistake which had been made in this particular. The court, upon consideration of the record and the affidavits, granted the motion to remand, on the ground that, as the petition had not been filed in the state court until after answer and after the master had under the order of reference proceeded to take testimony, it was too late, as the trial had been begun. From this order an appeal was taken, which is one of the cases now under consideration.

Before the motion to remand was decided in the circuit court the state court proceeded with the suit, and on the 30th of August, 1880, a decision was rendered in favor of Mrs. Carson. An appeal was thereupon taken to the supreme court, where the judgment of the common pleas was reversed, on the 16th of July, 1881, and the cause remanded for further proceedings. Afterwards, on the 9th of September, 1881, a decree was rendered in the common pleas against Mrs. Carson, from which she appealed, on the ground, among others, [286] that because of her petition for removal all rightful jurisdiction of the court of common pleas ceased, and its proceedings thereafter were null and void. Afterwards the supreme court affirmed the decree, and in so doing sustained the jurisdiction of the common pleas, giving its reasons as follows:

"The facts stated in this petition were, perhaps, sufficient to entitle the petitioner to the order had the petition been filed within proper time, and had the facts stated been sustained by the record as a whole, but the petition broke down at both of these points. It was not filed as required by the Act of Congress (1875) at or before the term at which the suit could have been tried; nor did it appear upon the face of the record that the citizenship of Mrs. Carson was in Massachusetts. True, this fact was stated in the petition, but her answer distinctly stated that she was a citizen of New York. Thus the record on its face failed to show the important fact required for removal. Meyer v. Construction Co. 100 U. S. 457 [Bk. 25, L. ed. 593]. Hence, Judge Pressley had no other alternative but to dismiss the petition upon both of the grounds mentioned."

From this decree of affirmance a writ of error has been taken to this court, which presents the other of the two cases now before us.

In our opinion the state court erred in retaining jurisdiction of the suit after the petition for removal was presented, and the circuit court in remanding it after it had been docketed there. The record presents but a single controversy in the suit, and that between the plaintiffs and Mrs. Carson as to the priority of her lien. This is conceded. In this controversy all the other defendants may properly be arranged on the same side with the plaintiffs, and thus leave Mrs. Carson at liberty to apply for a removal without joining the others with her. Removal Cases, 100 U. S. 457 [Bk. 25, L. ed. 593]. So far there is no dispute, but the objections to the removal are:

1. That upon the face of the record, as the case stood in the state court, after the petition for removal was presented, Mrs. Carson appeared as a citizen of the same State with some of those on the other side of the controversy; and,

2. That the petition was not in time, because it was not presented "before or at the term at which said cause could be first tried, and before the trial thereof." [287]

1. As to the citizenship. In Stone v. South Carolina, 117 U. S. 430 [Bk. 29, L. ed. 962] it was said, following the former cases on the subject, that a state court is not bound to surrender its jurisdiction until a case has been made which, on its face, shows that the petitioner for removal has a right to the transfer; but it was also said that "all issues of fact made upon the petition for removal must be tried in the circuit court." The state court is only at liberty to inquire whether, on the face of the record, a case has been made which requires it to proceed no further.

In the present case the petition stated, in positive terms, that Mrs. Carson was, at the beginning of the suit, and still continued to be, a citizen of Massachusetts. With that fact established, the necessary citizenship for a removal existed. Whether it was a fact or not, could, under the ruling in Stone v. South Carolina, only be tried in the circuit court, unless the statement in the answer filed on behalf of Mrs. Carson estopped her from denying her citizenship in New York. The record of the former suit, which is referred to in the opinion of the common pleas judge, we put entirely out of this branch of the case, because the statements there related to a time long anterior to that in which, according to the affidavit, the change of her citizenship occurred. At most it was only evidence, and had nothing to do with the "face of the record." Neither can we look on the statement in the answer as to her domicil, signed by her counsel only, and not under oath, which was filed some days before her petition for removal was presented, as estopping her from asserting the truth. The affidavits on that subject, filed in the circuit court, show how the mistake arose, and that the statement was promptly denied by Mrs. Carson as soon as it was brought to her attention. Upon the hearing of the motion to remand in the circuit court, there was a full argument by McCrady & Son for the complainants, and by Mr. Young for Mrs. Carson; and the evidence, which was submitted and which was uncontradicted, sufficiently established a change of citizenship [288] from New York to Massachusetts as early as the middle of 1877, and long before this suit was brought.

2. As to the time. The record is silent as to the manner in which Mrs. Carson was brought into court. The complaint could not have been filed before October 15, 1879, because that is the date of its verification. The evidence establishes the fact beyond question that Mrs. Carson was not in South Carolina between October 15 and December 16, 1879. Consequently she could not have been served personally with process in the State between those days. By the Statutes of South Carolina the terms of the Common Pleas of Charleston County began on the second Monday of February, June, and November in each year. The second Monday of November, 1879, fell on the 10th of the month. Consequently, there were only twenty-five days between the 15th of October and the beginning of the November Term of the court for that year. By the Code of Practice of South Carolina, Mrs. Carson, if she had been served personally with process on the 15th of October, could not have been required to answer before November 4, and if by publication, as she might have been, not before December 16. A section of the Code, section 278, as amended, provides: "At any time after issue and at least fourteen days before court, the plaintiff shall file in the clerk's office the summons and complaint in the cause, indorsing thereon the nature of the issue and the number of the docket upon which the same shall be placed; and if the plaintiff fail to do so, the defendant, seven days before the court, may file copies of said papers, with like indorsement, and the clerk shall thereupon place said cause upon its appropriate docket, and it shall stand for trial without any further notice of trial or notice of issue."

The stipulation of December 16, 1879, amounted to a waiver of all default previous to that date, and put the parties in no worse condition than they would have been if Mrs. Carson had filed her answer and put the case at issue at rules. Certainly, we are not to presume, on the face of this record, that she could have been forced to trial at the November Term. Had she answered on the 4th of November, which was the earliest day she could [289] have been required to do so, there would not have been fourteen days between that and the term, and so, under the Code of Practice, the case could not have been tried until the February Term without her consent; and the same would be true if she had put in her answer on the 16th of December, which is probably the day it was really due. Her petition was presented at the February Term, and consequently it was "at the term at which the cause could be first tried," according to the meaning of that phrase in the Act of 1875, as it has been construed. Babbitt v. Clark, 103 U. S. 606 [Bk. 26, L. ed. 507]; Pullman Palace Car Co. v. Speck, 113 U. S. 84 [Bk. 28, L. ed. 925].

It remains only to consider whether the petition was presented before a trial was begun. The stipulation was not to send the case to the master for "trial," but "to take testimony and report the same." In its effect this was nothing more than an agreement for the appointment of an examiner before whom the testimony in the suit, which was in its nature a suit in equity, could be taken. The master had no authority to find either the facts or the law. His duty was to take and write out the testimony to be reported to the court for use on the trial when it should be begun.

We conclude, therefore, that the suit was removable, and that the petition therefor was presented in time.

The judgment of the Supreme Court of South Carolina is reversed and the cause remanded, with directions that it be sent to the Court of Common Pleas of Charleston County for removal to the Circuit Court, in accordance with the prayer of the petition for that purpose, and the order of the Circuit Court remanding the suit is reversed, and that court is directed to take jurisdiction and proceed to a final determination of the matter in controversy. Reversed.

JOHN MULLAN AND FRANCIS AVERY, [27
Appts.,
v.
UNITED STATES.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 271-279.)

Evidence that bill was filed by direction of Attorney-General—resulting benefit to private parties immaterial—coal lands not subject to selection as lieu school lands—when patent set aside.

1. The production of a certified copy of an order, from the Attorney-General to a United States District Attorney, to proceed in the case is sufficient to overcome the objection that the bill does not show on its face that it was filed by the Attorney-General.

2. Coal lands are mineral lands within the meaning of the term as used in the statutes regulating the disposition of the public domain, and were not subject to selection as lieu school lands by the State of California under the Act of March 3, 1853.

3. Notwithstanding the fact that coal lands were in fact listed to the State by the proper officers of the Government as lieu school lands, the selection can be vacated and the titles under it annulled in a suit in equity brought by the United States directly for that purpose.

Argued April 1, 1886. Decided May 10, 1886.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of California. Affirmed.

The case is stated by the court.

Mr. Walter H. Smith, for appellants.

Messrs. William W. Morrow and Wm. A. Maury, Assist. Atty-Gen., for appellee.

This is a suit brought by the United States to vacate and annul the title of John Mullan and Francis Avery to the N. ½, sec. 8, T. 1 N., R. 1 E., Mount Diablo meridian, listed by the Secretary of the Interior on the 3d of January, 1871, to the State of California as a school indemnity selection, on the ground that when the selection was made and when it was listed the land was coal land, and so known to be, both by the officers of the State who made the selection, and by Mullan and Avery when they afterwards acquired title from the State. The facts are these:

The land in question lies in the midst of a coal-bearing district, and has upon it a valuable coal bed. It is rugged and broken, and of very little if any value for agricultural purposes. As early as 1861 the Black Diamond Coal Mining Company took possession of it and opened a coal mine. The company erected at great expense, upon this and adjoining land, all the necessary works for mining, hoisting and shipping the coal, and continued its operations on the property extensively from the time it entered into possession until evicted in 1877, at the suit of Avery. Its possession was open and notorious; and the principal market for its coal was in San Francisco, or with persons trading there. There was also located on this and adjoining property quite a large mining town, which sometimes had more than one thousand inhabitants. The lands in the township were surveyed and divided into sections in March, 1864, under the direction of the United States Surveyor-General. In the progress of these surveys the mines were found, and to some extent indicated on the plats, which contained abundant evidence of the coal-bearing character of this particular tract.

[273] On the 13th of May, 1865, Frank Barnard, an officer or agent of the Black Diamond Coal Mining Company, applied to the locating agent of the State of California, under the provisions of a Statute of the State entitled "An Act to Provide for the Sale of Certain Lands Belonging to the State," approved April 27, 1866, to purchase these lands and to have them located under the authority of an Act of Congress of March 3, 1853, chap. 145, § 7, 10 Stat. at L. 247, in lieu of an equal quantity of school lands which had in some way been lost to the State. In accordance with this application the location was made for the use of Barnard on the 30th of June, 1865, and approved by the state surveyor-general on the 11th of August. Barnard, however, did not pay for the land, and consequently his title under the location was never perfected.

On the 23d of August, 1868, while the Black Diamond Company was in possession and actually working its mine, Mullan applied to the Surveyor-General of California to purchase the land from the State, as land which had before been selected as school section indemnity. The surveyor-general at first objected because the land was coal land. After some conversation on the subject, in which Mullan was told that the lands were in the neighborhood of the Mount Diablo coal mine and were probably coal lands, his application for the purchase was accepted, he insisting that the lands were state lands, and that the register of the land-office had acknowledged the right of the State to make the selection. This acceptance was on the 25th of August, 1868, and afterwards, on the 27th of April, 1869, the surveyor-general made a formal certificate, of which the following is a copy:

"State of California,
"Office of Surveyor-General,
"Sacramento, 27th April, 1869.

"I hereby certify that, in accordance with the provisions of an Act entitled 'An Act to Provide for the Management and Sale of the Lands Belonging to the State,' approved March 28, 1868, I have located, as a portion of the school lands, 320 acres of public land in the County of Contra Costa, at the request and for [274] the use of John Mullan. Said land is described as follows:

"N. ½ of sec. 8, T. 1 N., R. 1 E., Mount Diablo meridian.

"Taken in lieu of E. ½ of sec. 16, T. 2 N., R. 8 W., Mount Diablo meridian.

"This location has been made by me in the name and for the benefit of the State of California, at the United States Land-Office for the San Francisco District, in the City of San Francisco, and with the consent of John F. Swift, register of said district, bearing date the 28th day of May, A. D. 1865, and the same is entered and numbered upon my register of locations. The said location is hereby approved, and the treasurer of Contra Costa County shall receive in payment therefor, from John Mullan, one hundred and one $\frac{65}{100}$ (101.65) dollars, within fifty days from the date of the surveyor-general's approval, being 20 per cent of the purchase money, and interest on the balance in advance, at the rate of 10 per cent per annum from the date of the approval of the location in the surveyor-general's office.

"John W. Bost, Surveyor-General."

Afterwards, on the 21st of May, Mullan having made the advance payment, a certificate of purchase was executed and delivered to him.

The selection was at some time reported to the General Land-Office, and on the 3d of January, 1871, listed with other tracts, by the Secretary of the Interior, to the State, 'subject to any interfering rights that may exist in them."

On the 28th of March, 1871, Mullan got from Avery $1,000 and assigned the certificate of purchase to him as collateral security, at the same time agreeing that on the sale of the land Avery might retain one sixth of the purchase money, and also the $1,000 and interest. At the same time he also executed to Avery a formal assignment of all and every his right or cause of action against the Black Diamond Coal Company for taking coal from the premises. Afterwards Avery paid the State the balance due on the purchase money and received a state patent for the land on the 5th of April, 1871. Mullan had resided in San Francisco for [275] at least a year before he made his application for the purchase, and was engaged in real estate business. Avery had also resided there from December 3, 1868, and from his testimony appears to have been familiar with operations of the character of those in which Mullan was engaged.

Not long after Avery got his patent he brought suit against the Black Diamond Company, to recover possession of the property and $1,350,000 for the value of coal taken from it. This suit resulted in a judgment in his favor, on the 6th of June, 1877, for the land and $1,500 damages. He then brought another suit to recover the value of coal taken from the land during the pendency of the former one, in which he claimed damages to the amount of $8,000,000.

After the first suit was begun the coal company applied to the General Land-Office for a recall of the listing of the land to the State, but on an examination of the matter this was refused on the 14th of March, 1872. After the second suit was brought, the Attorney-General, on the application of the company, authorized a bill to be filed in the name of the United States to set aside the title of the State, "upon the understanding that any and all costs and expenses in the matter shall be defrayed by the applicants, and that the proceeding shall be subject to the direction and control of the Attorney-General, in order that the interests of the Government may be fully protected and justice done to any and all parties interested." Under this authority the present bill was filed by the United States Attorney for the District of California, and signed:

"Charles Devens, Attorney-General.
By Philip Teare,
United States Attorney for the District of California.
"Hoyt & M'Kee, Special Attorneys and Counsel."

Upon these facts the circuit court entered a decree vacating the title of the State and of Mullan and Avery, and from that decree this appeal was taken.

It is first objected that the bill should be dis- [276] missed, because it does not show on its face that it was filed by the Attorney-General. On the argument, however, the Assistant Attorney-General produced from the Department of Justice a certified copy of an order of the Attorney-General directing the United States Attorney for the District of California to proceed in the matter; and this it was held, in Western Pacific R. R. Co. v. United States, 108 U. S. 512 [Bk. 27, L. ed. 806], was enough to overcome such an objection. There is no doubt that the bill was filed on the request of the coal company, and that it is expected some advantage will accrue indirectly to that company from a decree vacating the title under the state selection; but if the title is vacated the lands will be restored to the public domain and be subject to sale by the United States, as coal lands. The United States has, therefore, a direct pecuniary interest in the suit, and this being the case, it is a matter of no importance that others may possibly be benefited by the decree which may be obtained. The Acts of July 1, 1864, 13 Stat. at L. 343, chap. 205, and March 3, 1865, 13 Stat. at L. 529, chap. 107, make ample provisions for the sale of such lands at a price not less than $20 an acre.

The important question in the case is whether the land, being coal land, was open to selection by the State as lieu school land. This was most elaborately considered by the circuit judge, and his opinion, reported in 7 Sawyer, 466, leaves little to be said on the subject. In Mining Company v. Consolidated Mining Co. 102 U. S. 167 [Bk. 26, L. ed. 126], this court decided that the grant of the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections of public land to the State of California for school purposes, made by the Act of March 3, 1853, was not intended to cover mineral lands. Such lands were by the settled policy of the General Government excluded from all grants at that time, and we quite agree with the circuit judge that "If sections 16 and 36, being mineral lands, do not pass by the terms of the statute, there certainly is no good reason for permitting the same kind of lands to be selected under section 7, in lieu of sections 16 and 36." The confirmatory Act of July 23, 1866, 14 Stat. at L. 218, chap. 219, expressly excludes from its operation all selections of mineral land. The case therefore turns on the question whether coal lands are mineral lands, within the meaning of that term [277] as used in the statutes regulating the disposition of the public domain.

The first statute which made any reference to minerals on the public lands was that of September 4, 1841, 5 Stat. at L. 453, chap. 16, sec. 10, which provided that no preemption entry should be made on "lands on which are situated any known salines or mines;" and by the Act of July 1, 1864, 13 Stat. at L. 343, chap. 205, sec. 1, it was provided that "Any tracts embracing coal beds or coal fields, constituting portions of the public domain, and which as 'mines' are excluded from the preemption Act of 1841, and which under past legislation are not liable to ordinary private entry," might be disposed of at a price not less than $20 an acre. This is clearly a legislative declaration that "known" coal lands were mineral lands within the meaning of that term as used in statutes regulating the public lands, unless a contrary intention of Congress was clearly manifested. Whatever doubt there may be as to the effect of this declaration on past transactions, it is clear that after it was made coal lands were to be treated as mineral lands. That the land now in dispute was "known" coal land at the time it was selected no one can doubt. It had been worked as a mine for many years before, and it had upon its surface all the appliances necessary for reaching, taking out and delivering the coal. That Barnard knew what it was when he asked for its location for his use is absolutely certain, because he was one of the agents of the coal company at the time, and undoubtedly acted on its behalf in all that he did. If Mullan and Avery were ignorant of the fact when they acquired their respective interests in the property, it was because they willfully shut their eyes to what was going on around them, and purposely kept themselves in ignorance of notorious facts. But the evidence satisfies us entirely that they were not ignorant. The assignment of Mullan to Avery of his claim against the company for coal taken out, made at the same time that he transferred the certificate of purchase, shows the knowledge of all the facts by both when Avery acquired his interest, and Mullan's information on the subject is shown by what took 278] place between him and the Surveyor-General of California when he made his purchase.

At the time the selection was actually made, therefore, it cannot be doubted that the land was mineral land, both in law and in fact, within the meaning of the Act under which the State and those who purchased from the State undertook to acquire title; and we agree with the circuit court in the opinion that the rights of the parties are to be determined by the law as it stood then. Such being the case, we have no hesitation in deciding that the land was not open to the State for selection.

It remains to consider whether, since the land was in fact listed to the State by the proper officers of the Government, the selection can be vacated and the titles under it annulled in a suit in equity brought by the United States directly for that purpose; and about this we have no more doubt than the circuit court seems to have had. The lands were, as we have seen, known coal lands. No one seriously disputes that now; and, in our opinion, upon the well established facts, Mullan and Avery occupy no better position than the State would if no patent had been issued to Avery. They are in every sense of that term purchasers with notice. The case is, therefore, directly within the decisions of this court in McLaughlin v. United States, 107 U. S. 526 [Bk. 27, L. ed. 621], and Western Pacific R. R. Co. v. United States, 108 U. S. 510 [Bk. 27, L. ed. 806], where it was distinctly held that patents to the Western Pacific Railroad Company for known mineral lands could be canceled on a bill in equity filed by the United States for that purpose. It is no doubt true that the actual character of the lands was as well known at the Department of the Interior as it was anywhere else, and that the Secretary approved the lists, not because he was mistaken about the facts, but because he was of opinion that coal lands were not mineral lands within the meaning of the Act of 1853, and that they were open to selection by the State; but this does not alter the case. The list was certified without authority of law, and, therefore, by a mistake against which relief in equity may be afforded. As was said in United States v. Stone, 2 Wall. 535 [69 U. S. bk. 17, L. ed. 767]: "The patent is but evidence of a grant, and the officer who issues it 279] acts ministerially and not judicially. If he issues a patent for land reserved from sale by law, such patent is void for want of authority. But one officer of the land-office is not competent to cancel or annul the act of his predecessor. This is a judicial act, and requires the judgment of a court." That language is equally applicable to the present case, and its correctness has been often recognized. Moore v. Robbins, 96 U. S. 533 [Bk. 24, L. ed. 850]; United States v. Schurz, 102 U. S. 396 [Bk. 26, L. ed. 171]; Steel v. Smelting Company, 106 U. S. 454 [Bk. 27, L. ed. 229]; Moffat v. United States, 112 U. S. 24 [Bk. 28, L. ed. 623].

The decree of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

Jurisdiction—practice.

A suit at law, the trial being by jury, can only be brought to this court by writ of error.

[No. 219.]

Submitted April 7, 1886. Decided May 10, 1886.

FROM the Supreme Court of the Territory of Idaho. Dismissed.

Mr. John Goode, Solicitor-Gen., for the United States.

No one appeared for appellee.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

This case has been docketed here as an appeal from the Supreme Court of the Territory of Idaho; but, on looking into the transcript, we find that the suit was at law and the trial by a jury. Under such circumstances the only proper way of bringing it here for review would have been by writ of error. Stringfellow v. Cain, 99 U. S. 610 [Bk. 25, L. ed. 421]; U. S. v. *Union Pac. R. R. In point of fact, however, there has been neither a writ of error, nor an appeal, nor a citation, nor an appearance by the defendant or respondent. It is clear, therefore, we have no jurisdiction, and the case is dismissed.

CENTRAL PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY.

"Thurman Act"—retention by the Government of earnings of Pacific roads on parts of lines not aided by the Government.

Where one construction of a section of a statute would not only render that section a breach of faith on the part of the United States but an invasion of the constitutional rights of the appellee, we are bound, if possible, so to construe the law as to lay it open to neither of these objections.

Argued April 29, 1886. Decided May 10, 1886.

APPEAL from the Court of Claims. Affirmed.

The case is stated by the court.

Mr. John Goode, Solicitor-Gen., for appellant.

Messrs. Joseph E. McDonald and John F. Dillon, for appellee.

[236] Mr. Justice Woods delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellee, the Central Pacific Railroad Company, brought this suit in the court of claims, against the United States, to recover compensation for services rendered the United States in transporting persons and freight over those parts of its railroad in the building of which it had not been aided by the Government. The United States demurred to the petition, on the ground that it did not allege facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The demurrer was overruled and judgment rendered in favor of the claimant for the sum demanded. From that judgment the United States has brought this appeal.

The appellee alleges in its petition that it was originally incorporated on June 28, 1861, under the laws of the State of California; that, with the aid of the grant of lands in alternate sections, and of bonds of the United States issued to it under the Acts of Congress approved July 1, 1862, and July 2, 1864, it built, either directly or indirectly, and became the owner of 865.66 miles of railroad. In addition to this line of road, the construction of which was so aided by the United States, the appellee, during the period covered by the petition, controlled and used 383.67 miles of railroad, acquired by consolidation with other companies, and 1,791.35 miles of railroad leased by it from other companies, making 2,175.02 miles; all of which had been constructed without any aid from the [237] United States under the said Acts of Congress. The petition demanded pay for service of transportation rendered the United States over the 2,175.02 miles of railroad which had been so constructed without its aid.

The contention of the United States was that it was justified in withholding the compensation sued for, by virtue of the provisions of section 2 of the Act of May 7, 1878, chap. 96, 20 Stat. at L. 56, commonly known as the Thurman Act. We do not think this contention is well founded.

The Act of July 1, 1862, chap. 120, 12 Stat. at L. 489, was passed "to aid"—so the title declared—"in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military and other purposes." The Act of July 2, 1864, chap. 216, 13 Stat. at L. 356, was an amendment to the Act of July 1, 1862. By these Acts certain railroad companies were aided in the construction of their roads. Among them was the appellee, which built the 865.66 miles above mentioned. It was aided in the construction of this part of its road by an issue of bonds made to it by authority of the Acts of July 1, 1862, and July 2, 1864. The Act of July 1, 1862, made the following provisions to secure the payment of the principal and interest of the bonds so issued:

Sec. 5. * * * "The issue of said bonds and delivery to the company shall ipso facto constitute a first mortgage on the whole line of the railroad and telegraph," etc.

Sec. 6. "The grants aforesaid are made upon condition that said company shall pay said bonds at maturity, and shall keep said railroad and telegraph line in repair and use, and shall at all times transmit despatches over said telegraph line, and transport mails, troops and munitions of war, supplies and public stores upon said railroad, for the Government, whenever required to do so by any department thereof; and the Government shall at all times have the preference in the use of the same for all the purposes aforesaid; * * * and all compensation for services rendered for the Government shall be applied to the payment of said bonds and interest, until the whole amount is fully paid; * * * and after said road is completed, until said [238 bonds and interest are paid, at least 5 per centum of the net earnings of said road shall also be annually applied to the payment thereof."

By the Act of July 2, 1864, it was provided as follows:

"Sec. 5. * * * Only one half of the compensation for services rendered for the Government by said companies shall be required to be applied to the payment of the bonds issued by the Government in aid of the construction of said roads."

These sections, taken together, constitute the contract between the United States and the appellee. U. S. v. Union Pacific R. R. Co., 91 U. S. 72 [Bk 23, L. ed. 224]; Sinking Fund Cases, 99 U. S. 700, 718 [Bk. 25, L. ed. 496]; Union Pacific R. R. Co. v. U. S. 104 U. S. 662 [Bk. 26, L. ed. 884]. This contract is binding on the United States, and it cannot, without the consent of the Company, change its terms by any subsequent legislation. Sinking Fund Cases, ubi supra.

These provisions of the statute law of the United States being still in force, Congress passed the Act of May 7, 1878, being the Thurman Act above referred to. The preamble of this Act mentions by name the companies which have been aided by bonds of the United States, under the Acts of July 1, 1862, and July 2, 1864. The first section declares how the net earnings referred to in those Acts shall be ascertained, and the second section provides as follows:

"That the whole amount of compensation which may, from time to time, be due to said several railroad companies, respectively, for services rendered for the Government, shall be retained by the United States; one half thereof to be presently applied to the liquidation of the interest paid and to be paid by the United States upon the bonds so issued by it, as aforesaid, to each of said corporations severally, and the other half thereof to be turned into the sinking fund hereinafter provided, for the uses therein mentioned."

The case turns on the true interpretation of this section, the appellant contending that it authorized it to retain compensation earned for transportation over all the roads owned or leased by the appellee, whether the construction of such roads had been aided by the issue of government bonds or not, and the appellee contending that the compensation referred to was that earned by transportation [2 over that part only of its lines which had been assisted by the government subsidy.

The Acts of July 1, 1862, July 2, 1864, and May 7, 1878, all relate to the same subject. The latter Act is declared by its title to be amendatory of the first two, and its last section provides that each and every of its provisions shall be "held as in alteration and amendment" of the two Acts first mentioned. The three Acts are, therefore, to be construed together as one Act, and one part to be interpreted by another. U. S. v. Freeman, 3 How. 556, 564 [44 U. S. bk. 11, L. ed. 724, 728]; Crespigny v. Wittenoom, 4 T. R. 793: Commonwealth v. Slack, 19 Pick. 304.

One of the provisions of the Act of July 1, 1862, closely allied to the one under consideration, was construed by this court in the case of U. S. v. Kansas Pacific R. Co. 99 U. S. 455 [Bk. 25, L. ed. 289]. The Kansas Pacific Railway Company was one of the companies to which the United States issued bonds in aid of the construction of its road under the Act just mentioned. Assisted by this issue of bonds, it had built 393¼ miles of road. It afterwards built 245 miles without aid from the Government. The United States brought suit against the company to recover the 5 per cent of net earnings, to be applied to the payment of the bonds and interest, as provided by section 6 of the Act of 1862. One of the controversies in the case was whether the Government was entitled to the 5 per cent net earnings on that part of the road which had been built without government aid. This court decided that it was not. Speaking by Mr. Justice Bradley it said: "We are of opinion * * * that the subsidy bonds granted to the company, being granted only in respect of the original road, * * * are a lien on that portion only, and that the 5 per cent of the net earnings is only demandable on the net earnings of said portion." With this decision in view, it would be impossible to hold with any show of reason that the compensation for services rendered the United States, which by the same section was required to be applied to the payment of the same bonds, included compensation for services rendered by a road the construction of which had not been aided by the issue to the company of government bonds.

[240] In the case of U. S. v. Denver Pacific R. Co., 99 U. S. 460 [Bk. 25, L. ed. 291], decided at the same term, and in which the judgment was delivered by the same justice, it was held that the United States had no right, under the sixth section of the Act of 1862, to retain compensation for services rendered upon a road, the construction of which it had not aided by its bonds. The ground upon which the court placed its decision was that the Government had no lien except upon a road which it had so aided, and could retain neither the 5 per cent of the earnings of a road to which it had issued no bonds, nor compensation for transportation services thereon.

This court having thus interpreted the Act of July 1, 1862, we cannot, consistently with the established rules of construction, give a different meaning to substantially the same words in the Act of May 7, 1878. Reiche v. Smythe, 13 Wall. 162 [80 U. S. bk. 20, L. ed. 566]. In the Act of July 1, 1862, the provision is, that "All compensation for services rendered for the Government shall be applied to the payment of said bonds." In the Act of May 7, 1878, the words are, that "The whole amount of compensation * * * for services rendered for the Government shall be retained by the United States," one half to pay interest and the other half to be turned into the sinking fund. If these two Acts are to be construed together and as one Act, we must give the same meaning to like expressions in both. We cannot say in one case that the compensation mentioned means compensation only for services on aided roads, and in the other that it includes compensation for services on roads not aided.

There is another view of this controversy which seems to us conclusive. As the contract between the United States and the Railroad Company contained in the Acts of July 1, 1862, and of July 2, 1864, has been interpreted by this court to authorize the retention by the Government of compensation for services only on those roads which the United States aided in building, the construction which the appellant seeks to put on the second section of the Act of May 8, 1878, would not only render that section a breach of faith on the part of the United States, but an invasion of the constitutional rights of the appellee. We are bound, if possible, so to construe the law as to lay it open to neither of these objections. Broughton v. Pensacola, 93 U. S. 266 [Bk. 23, L. ed. 896]; Red Rock v. Henry, 106 U. S. 596 [Bk. 27, L. ed. 251]; Hobbs v. McLean [Bk. 29, L. ed. 940] decided at the present term, and cases there cited. U. S. v. Coombs, 12 Pet. 72 [37 U. S. bk. 9 L. ed. 1004]. The construction contended for by the appellee preserves the good faith of the Government, and frees the Act from the imputation of impairing rights secured by the Constitution of the United States. [241]

In our view the construction of the second section of the Act of May 7, 1878, is plain, and not fairly open to controversy. By the Act of July 1, 1862, "all compensation for services rendered for the Government" was to be applied to the payment of the bonds issued by the United States to aid in building the road. By the Act of July 2, 1864, only "one half of the compensation for services rendered for the Government" by said Company was required to be applied to the payment of the bonds. The Act of May 7, 1878, merely restored the provisions of the Act of July 1, 1862, and again required all compensation for services rendered the Government to be applied to the payment of the bonds. This compensation, as we have seen, has been limited by the decisions of this court to compensation for services rendered by the aided roads. The construction of the second section of the Act of May 7, 1878, contended for by the appellee, is therefore right.

Judgment affirmed.

SALT LAKE CITY, Appt., v. ORLANDO J. HOLLISTER, Collector of Internal Revenue.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 256-263.)

Internal revenue tax—on spirits distilled by City—want of corporate power on part of City to engage in distilling business, no defense to payment of tax.

1. Corporations are responsible for acts not strictly within their corporate powers, but done in their corporate names and by corporation officers who were competent to exercise all the corporate powers. When such acts are not founded on contract, but are arbitrary exercises of power in the nature of torts, or are quasi criminal, the corporation may be held to a pecuniary responsibility for them to the party injured. This rule may require a more careful scrutiny in its application to municipal corporations than to corporations for pecuniary profit, but we do not agree that the former are wholly exempt from liability for wrongful acts done, with all the evidence of their being acts of the corporation to the injury of others or in evasion of legal obligations to the State or the public.

2. The question of the liability of corporations on contracts which the law does not authorise them to make, and which are wholly beyond the scope of their powers, is governed by a different principle from that which controls a municipal corporation which seeks to make its want of authority to engage in a particular transaction or business a shelter from the taxation imposed by the government on such business or transaction, by whomsoever conducted. The party entering into a contract with a corporation does so voluntarily. The powers of the corporation are matters of public law, open to his examination, and he must judge for himself as to the power of the corporation to bind itself by the proposed agreement.

3. In cases where corporations have been sued on contracts, the enforcement of which they have resisted, because they were ultra vires, the courts have gone a long way to enable parties, who have parted with property or money on the faith of such contracts, to obtain justice, by recovery of the property or the money specifically, or as money had and received to plaintiff's use.

Argued April 19, 22, 1886. Decided May 10, 1886.

APPEAL from the Supreme Court of the Territory of Utah. Affirmed.

This case is stated by the court.

Messrs. Franklin S. Richards and Sheeks & Rawlins, for appellant.

Mr. John Goode, Solicitor-Gen., for appellee.

Mr Justice Miller delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit was instituted by the City of Salt Lake to recover of Hollister the sum of $12,057.75, illegally exacted by him, as Collector of Internal Revenue for the District of Utah, from the City for a special tax upon spirits alleged to have been distilled by said City, and not deposited in the bonded warehouse of the United States by plaintiff, as required by law.

Plaintiff alleges that, under threat of selling sufficient property of the City to pay said tax, it paid the sum demanded under protest, appealed to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, who failed and neglected to make any decision or to refund the money, and after six months' waiting this suit was brought.

To the petition the defendant made the following answer:

"Now comes the defendant in the above entitled cause, O. J. Hollister, and for answer to the plaintiff's complaint admits that the plaintiff is a public, municipal Corporation, created and organized under and by virtue of the laws of the Territory of Utah, and that it has continued [257] to be such a Corporation since its organization in February, 1850, and that the defendant was at the time mentioned, and as alleged in plaintiff's complaint, and still is, the acting United States Collector of Internal Revenue for the District of Utah.

"Defendant admits that in June, A. D. 1876, the United States Commissioner of Internal Revenue set down to and assessed against the plaintiff a gallon tax of $10,760 upon spirits distilled by said plaintiff at various times between the 2d day of March, A. D. 1867, and the 26th day of August, A. D. 1868, and not deposited in the bonded warehouse of the United States by the plaintiff, as required by law; but denies that said gallon tax was illegally or erroneously set down to or assessed against the plaintiff by said Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and avers that the plaintiff, during all the time for which said assessment was made, was actually engaged in distilling, producing, and dealing in, as distiller, said spirits so assessed, and said assessment of said gallon tax was made upon distilled spirits actually produced by the plaintiff, and upon which plaintiff had not paid the gallon tax required by law, said spirits not having been deposited in the bonded warehouse of the United States by the plaintiff, as required by law, but taken from said distillery by the plaintiff, after having been produced and distilled as aforesaid, and sold by said plaintiff, and the proceeds of said sale turned into the treasury of the plaintiff.

"Said plaintiff, during all the time it operated said distillery, and especially from said 2d day of March, 1867, to said 26th day of August, 1868, was distilling and producing spirits as aforesaid, and receiving and appropriating the benefit arising therefrom.

"Defendant further alleges that the plaintiff, during the time mentioned in plaintiff's complaint, regularly reported and paid to the Collector of Internal Revenue of the United States the gallon tax due upon a quantity of spirits distilled and produced by plaintiff, but that plaintiff neglected to report all of the spirits it actually produced and distilled, and for and [258] upon which the said gallon tax was due and owing to the United States; and that the tax so assessed as aforesaid is the tax due upon the spirits produced and distilled in excess of the amount so reported by said plaintiff, and upon which no tax was ever assessed and collected up to the time of the payment mentioned in plaintiff's complaint, and hereinafter stated.

"Defendant, answering, admits that the list containing the said gallon tax assessed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue of the United States was placed in the hands of this defendant as Collector of Internal Revenue.

"And defendant alleges that said plaintiff having engaged in the business of distilling and producing spirits as aforesaid, and said tax having been assessed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue as aforesaid and placed in the hands of the defendant, as Collector of Internal Revenue, for collection, it became and was his duty as such Collector to collect said tax.

NOTE.—Taxation; exemption from. See, generally, Tucker v. Ferguson, 89 U. S. bk. 22, 805, note.

"Defendant denies that he knew that said gallon tax, so assessed as aforesaid, was erroneous and illegal, and avers that said tax was legal and correct, and was assessed and collected because plaintiff was liable to said tax.

"Defendant admits that he did threaten to seize and sell the property of plaintiff to pay said tax, as alleged by plaintiff, and that the plaintiff on the 14th day of August, 1877, paid the defendant the amount of the gallon tax, with interest which had accrued thereon from the date of said assessment; but for what reason plaintiff paid defendant said gallon tax defendant is not advised, and upon that subject has no knowledge, information or belief, and therefore cannot answer."

A demurrer to the answer was overruled, and the plaintiff refusing to plead further, a judgment was rendered for the defendant, which was affirmed on appeal to the Supreme Court of the Territory.

It will be perceived that this demurrer admitted that the plaintiff, the City of Salt Lake, had been for a period of about eighteen months engaged in the business of distilling and producing spirits and selling the same, and placing the proceeds of the sale in its treasury. That during this time the plaintiff made regular reports as to the quantity produced and paid the tax on the amount so reported. But that while it thus [259] operated said distillery, it failed and neglected to report all the spirits which it produced; and the tax assessed and collected, and which the present suit is brought to recover back, was for the spirits of which no report was made.

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue having assessed plaintiff for these distilled spirits and placed the assessment in the hands of defendant, he, as a means of collecting the tax, did threaten to seize and sell property of plaintiff; whereupon, plaintiff paid the sum mentioned.

It would seem that this unqualified admission that the City was actually engaged in the business of distilling spirits liable to taxation, and replenishing her treasury with the profits arising from the operation, ought to be a justification of the officer who collected the tax due for the spirits so distilled. And this argument is all the stronger since the City acknowledged its liability as a distiller by paying voluntarily the tax due on the larger part of the spirits produced.

But while the City does not deny the actual fact of distillation, and of fraudulent returns by it, it denies the whole affair by argument. It says that, though it is very true the City did distill spirits, did sell them, and did receive the money into its treasury, it cannot be held liable for this because it had no legal power to do so. Its want of corporate authority to engage in distilling is to be received as conclusive evidence that it did not do so, while by the pleading it is admitted that it did. Because there was no statute which authorized it as a City of Utah to distill spirits, it could engage in this profitable business to any extent without paying the taxes which the laws of the United States require of everyone else who did the same thing.

If the Territory of Utah had added to its other corporate powers that of making and selling distilled spirits, then the City would be liable to the tax; but because it had no such power by law, it could do it without any liability for the tax to the United States, or to anyone else.

It would be a fine thing, if this argument is good, for all distillers to organize into milling corporations to make flour, and proceed to the more profitable business of distilling spirits, [260] which would be unauthorized by their charters or articles of incorporation, for they would thus escape taxation and ruin all competitors.

It is said that the acts done are not the acts of the City, but of its officers or agents who undertook to do them in its name. This would be a pleasant farce to be enacted by irresponsible parties, who give no bond, who have no property to respond to civil or criminal suits, who make no profit out of it, while the City grows rich in the performance. It is to be taken as a fair inference on this demurrer that all that the City might have done was done in establishing this business. The officers who, it is said, did this thing, must be supposed to have been properly appointed or elected. Resolutions or ordinances of the governing body of the City, directing the establishment of the distillery and furnishing money to buy the plant, must be supposed to have been passed in the usual mode. Everything must have been done under the same rules and by the same men as if it were a hospital or a town hall. If the demurrer had not admitted this, it could no doubt have been proved on an issue denying it.

But the argument is unsound that whatever is done by a corporation in excess of the corporate powers, as defined by its charter, is as though it was not done at all. A railroad company authorized to acquire a right of way by such exercise of the right of eminent domain as the law prescribes, which undertakes to and does seize upon and invade, by its officers and servants, the land of a citizen, makes no compensation, and takes no steps for the appropriation of it, is a naked trespasser, and can be made responsible for the tort. It had no authority to take the man's land or to invade his premises. But if the governing board had directed the act, the corporation could be sued for the tort, in an action of ejectment, or in trespass, or on an implied assumpsit for the value of the land. A plea of ultra vires, in this case, would be no defense.

The truth is that with the great increase in corporations in very recent times, and in their extension to nearly all the business transactions of life, it has been found necessary to hold them responsible for acts not strictly within their corporate powers, but done in their cor- [261] porate name and by corporation officers who were competent to exercise all the corporate powers. When such acts are not founded on contract, but are arbitrary exercises of power in the nature of torts, or are quasi criminal, the corporation may be held to a pecuniary responsibility for them to the party injured.

This doctrine was announced by this court nearly thirty years ago in a carefully prepared opinion by Mr. Justice Campbell in the case of Philadelphia, W. and B. R. R. Co. v. Quigley, 21 How. 202 [62 U. S. bk. 16, L. ed. 73]. That was an action for libel by Quigley against the company for the publication of a letter addressed to the company in the course of an investigation by its directors in regard to the conduct of some of its subordinates. This letter contained statements in regard to plaintiff's skill and capacity as a mechanic, very disparaging in that respect. This, with much other testimony, was printed and published by the board of directors, and the court decided that the corporation could be held liable for the publication. The argument that only the individuals who ordered the publication could be made responsible was urged then as here, but the court held that if it was a libel the corporation was responsible for it in damages.

It was also insisted that the existence of malice was a necessary element in the action for libel, and that the abstract entity which constituted a corporation was incapable of malice, which could only be predicated of the officers who ordered the publication. This was likewise overruled, and it was held that if the act implied malice, the corporation was liable for it.

The whole question was very fully considered. We can here do no more than make a single extract from the able opinion. After examining the authorities, it was said: "With much wariness, and after close and exact scrutiny into the nature of their constitution, have the judicial tribunals determined the legal relations which are established for the corporation by their governing body and their agents, with the natural persons with whom they are brought into contact or collision. The result is that for acts done by the agents of a corporation, either [262] in contractu or in delicto, in the course of its business and of their employment, the corporation is responsible as an individual is responsible under similar circumstances. At a very early period it was decided in Great Britain, as well as in the United States, that actions might be maintained against corporations for torts; and instances may be found in the judicial annals of both countries of suits for torts arising from the acts of their agents of nearly every variety."

In the case of Reed v. Home Sav. Bank, 130 Mass. 445, the bank was held liable to an action for malicious prosecution. The court said: "It is too late to discuss the question, once much debated, whether a corporation can commit a trespass, or is liable in an action on the case, or subject generally to actions for torts as individuals are. The books of reports for a quarter of a century show that a very large pr portion of actions of this nature, both for n feasance and for misfeasance, are against corporations. * * * And, by the great weight of modern authority, a corporation may be liable, even where a fraudulent or malicious intent is necessary to be proved, the fraud or malice of its authorized agents being imputable to the corporation, as in actions for fraudulent representations, for libel or for malicious prosecution." Many authorities are cited in support of this proposition, which may be found on page 445 of the report of the case.

Another well considered case in which a corporation is held liable for malicious prosecution is that of Copley v. Grover & Baker Sewing Machine Co. 2 Woods, 494.

It is said that Salt Lake City, being a municipal corporation, is not liable for tortious actions of its officers.

While it may be true that the rule we have been discussing may require a more careful scrutiny in its application to this class of corporations than to corporations for pecuniary profit, we do not agree that they are wholly exempt from liability for wrongful acts done, with all the evidences of their being acts of the corporation, to the injury of others, or in evasion of legal obligations to the State or the public. A municipal corporation cannot, any more than any other corporation or private person, escape the taxes due on its property, whether acquired legally or illegally, and it cannot make its want of legal authority to engage in a particular transaction or business a shelter from the taxation imposed by the government on such business or transaction by whomsoever conducted. See McCreary v. Guardians of Poor of Phila. 9 Serg. & R. 94. [263]

It remains to be observed that the question of the liability of corporations on contracts which the law does not authorize them to make, and which are wholly beyond the scope of their powers, is governed by a different principle. Here the party dealing with the corporation is under no obligation to enter into the contract. No force, or restraint, or fraud is practiced on him. The powers of these corporations are matters of public law open to his examination, and he may and must judge for himself as to power of the corporation to bind itself by the proposed agreement. It is to this class of cases that most of the authorities cited by appellants belong—cases where corporations have been sued on contracts which they have successfully resisted because they were ultra vires.

But, even in this class of cases, the courts have gone a long way to enable parties who had parted with property or money on the faith of such contracts, to obtain justice by recovery of the property or the money specifically, or as money had and received to plaintiff's use. Thomas v. R. R. Co. 101 U. S. 71 [Bk. 25, L. ed. 950]; Louisiana v. Wood, 102 U. S. 294 [Bk. 26, L. ed, 153]; Chapman v. Douglas Co. 107 U. S. 355 [Bk. 27, L. ed. 381].

EXTEIN NORTON, Plff in Err.,

v.

SHELBY COUNTY, STATE OF TENNESSEE.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 425-454.)

Municipal bonds—construction of state statutes—when decision of state courts followed—officer de facto —existence of an office, essential—ratification of issue of bonds.

1. The Supreme Court of the State of Tennessee having authoritatively determined that the Act of that State of March 9, 1867, Stat. 1867, chap. 45, sec. 6, etc., creating the board of commissioners of Shelby County and vesting them with authority to issue bonds of the County, was unconstitutional and void, this court is bound by that decision and will not review the question.

2. There can be no officer, either de facto or de jure, if there be no office to fill. The apparent existence of an office created by an Act of the Legislature, which has been decided to be unconstitutional, does not render it possible that there should be an officer de facto. An unconstitutional Act is, in legal contemplation, as inoperative as though it had never passed.

3. The acts of the County Court of Shelby County, in voting taxes for the payment of the bonds in question did not amount to a legal ratification of the issue of the bonds, there not having been a majority of the justices present when these votes were passed, as required by the Act of February 25, 1867.

4. The new Constitution of Tennessee, providing that no county shall loan its credit to an incorporated company or become a stockholder in such company, except upon a prior election and the vote of three fourths of the qualified voters of the county, having gone into effect May 5, 1870, no subsequent act of the county court could operate to render valid a previous void issue of bonds to such a corporation without an election as required by the new constitution.

Argued March 24, 25, 1886. Decided May 10, 1886.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Tennessee. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Joseph H. Choate, D. H. Poston and W. K. Poston, for plaintiff in error:

That provision of the 25th section of the Act of March 9, 1867, creating the county commissioners of Shelby County, by which, in addition to vesting in them the powers and duties vested in the quarterly court of the County, they were expressly and specifically authorized, among other things, "to subscribe stock in railroads, which the County Court of Shelby County has been authorized by general and special law to subscribe, and under the same conditions and restrictions, and to represent such stock in all elections of directors, and provide for payment of subscriptions as made," was constitutional and valid; even though in deference to the subsequent decision of the Supreme Court of Tennessee, the first clause of the section should be condemned as unconstitutional and void. And the proposition here stated has not been passed upon or considered by any court of the State, but is an original question to be determined here and now.

The well settled rule is that although parts of an Act, or, indeed, most of the provisions of it, be unconstitutional, because beyond the scope of legislative power to enact, yet other provisions in the same Act, which are clearly within the power of the Legislature to enact, and are severable from the rest, may and must be saved from the judicial condemnation.

Cooley, Const. Lim., pp. 211–216, and cases there cited. Bank of Hamilton v. Dudley, 2 Pet. 526 (27 U. S. bk. 7, L. ed. 508); Packet Co. v. Keokuk, 95 U. S. 89 (Bk. 24, L. ed. 381); Allen v. La. 103 U. S. 80 (Bk. 26, L. ed. 318); Poindexter v. Greenhow, 114 U. S. 271 (Bk. 29, L. ed. 185); Presser v. Ill. 116 U. S. 252 (Bk. 29, L. ed. 615); People v. Briggs, 50 N. Y. 553; Mayor etc. of Hagerstown v. Daniel Dechert, 32 Md. 369.

Viewed in the light of these authorities, the provisions of the 25th section of the Act of March 9, 1867, by which, after completely vesting in the board of commissioners the entire powers which inhered in the county court, it proceeded to confer upon the commissioners, "in addition," certain express powers, which were not, by the Constitution, vested in that court, powers neither judicial nor legislative in their character, but purely administrative, respecting the business affairs of the county, and among the rest "to subscribe for stock in railroads," etc., may well be sustained as constitutional, although the first clause of the section (35), which attempts to substitute the commissioners in the place of the justices of the peace as judges of the county court, be condemned.

It will not be contended that the Legislature might not have created a board of county commissioners and conferred upon them these additional powers alone; or that it could not originally have conferred upon the County the right to subscribe for the stock of railroads by vesting the exercise of it in such a board; and if it could not do that, then clearly having once directed it to be exercised by the justices composing the county court, it could well by a subsequent Act substitute a new agent for the County to exercise the power in its behalf; and that is in substance what the 25th section of this Act does.

The fact that the good, and alleged bad parts of the Act in question appear in the same section is of no importance.

Cooley, Const. Lim. 5th ed. 212.

The decisions of the Supreme Court of Tennessee, relied upon by the defendant in error as declaring the 25th section of the Act of March 9, 1867, to be unconstitutional and void, do not touch the question of the validity of those parts of the section substituting the board of commissioners as the designated agent of the County to subscribe for stock in railroads and issue bonds for the same.

The Supreme Court of Tennessee itself has declared exactly what was decided in Pope v. Phifer and Walker v. Merriman, thus: "That the law creating the board of county commissioners, so far at least as it authorized said board to usurp the constitutional functions of the county court, was in violation of the Constitution, and their acts without authority of law, is a proposition not denied."

McLean v. State of Tenn. and Co. of Shelby, 8 Heisk. 287.

The power to subscribe for the stock of a railroad and to issue bonds therefor was certainly not one of the constitutional functions of the county court.

That the power to subscribe for stock of a railroad and to issue bonds therefor is a distinct and different power from the power of taxation, although after its exercise the power of taxation which resides in the County must also be exercised to provide for the payment of the bonds; and that it depends wholly on special legislative grant to the County; and that the Legislature may prescribe the mode of its exercise, and the agents by whom it may be exercised, are propositions habitually recognized in the decisions of this court.

There is nothing in the Constitution of Tennessee which expressly, or by implication, restricts or impairs the power of the Legislature to designate any agent it may select to make a subscription and issue bonds on behalf of a county or other municipal corporation.

See U. S. v. Baltimore & O. R. R. Co. 17 Wall. 322 (84 U. S. bk. 21, L. ed. 597); Louisville & N. R. R. Co. v. County Ct. 1 Sneed. 637.

We, therefore, confidently submit that the Legislature of Tennessee might have originally vested the power to subscribe for the railroad stock and issue the bonds therefor on the part of the County in commissioners designated by it for the purpose; and after first designating as such agents the justices of the peace composing the county court, it could by a subsequent Act transfer that agency to the commissioners; that by the 25th section of the Act of March 9, 1867, it did so transfer the agency; that this intent in the enactment was manifestly distinct from, independent of and additional to the intent to invest in the commissioners the inherent powers of the county court which were secured to it by the Constitution; and that although the latter intent may have been beyond the Legislature's power, and so the enactment to that extent may be declared unconstitutional, yet, as it is not merely possible but entirely practicable to separate the two provisions so that each can stand alone, the court will not, and indeed for want of power cannot, involve the separate sound enactment in the condemnation of the unsound, which is embraced in the same section, especially where vested rights have accrued upon the faith of the constitutional provision, and negotiable securities have been issued to bona fide holders upon the strength of it. And finally, that there is nothing in the decisions of the courts of Tennessee, on the general question of the unconstitutionality of the law, to embarrass this court in so holding.

Even though the 25th section of the Act of March 9, 1867, should be condemned as unconstitutional in all its parts; yet the subscription to the stock made by the commissioners, and the bonds issued by them while in the undisturbed tenure of their office as justices of the county court, are good and binding as regards third persons and the public, including the holders of the bonds, as the acts of a de facto court or of the de facto officers.

Clearly, there was legislative authority conferred upon the County itself, by the Act of February, 1867, to subscribe for the stock and to issue the bonds. The power was not vested in the agents, but in the principal, the County, to be exercised through the agents.

The authority to subscribe and issue the bonds having thus been conferred upon the County, to be exercised in its behalf by the county court, the board of commissioners attempted to be created by the Act of March 9, 1867, entered upon the discharge of all the official functions apparently conferred upon them by that Act, and continued to discharge them for more than two years and a half until November 15, 1869. Upon bill filed in the court of chancery they were adjudged by the Chancellor to be lawfully in office. "They were sustained therein by the state authorities," as was subsequently said by the Supreme Court of Tennessee, in the case of McLean v. State of Tenn. and County of Shelby, 8 Heisk. 285.

Thus under the supposed authority of the Legislature, of the executive power of the State, and of the branch of the judicial power of the State having jurisdiction in the premises in the first instance, the commissioners acted as justices of the county court; and in so doing, and in assuming to be such court, they made the subscription and authorized the issue of the bonds in suit at the regular term of the quarterly court of the County, held by them in January, 1869, at a time when for more than a year and a half all the world had apparently acquiesced in their official authority.

The court will particularly observe that the 25th section of the Act of March 9, 1867, did not abolish or attempt to abolish the county court, known as the quarterly court of the County. It merely substituted the commissioners as the judges to hold that court, in place of the justices of the peace, and vested in them all their powers and duties. The identity of the court was preserved, and its powers, functions and jurisdiction remained unaltered.

The question is, therefore, whether the acts and doings of the commissioners thus holding the county court, though wrongfully installed under an unconstitutional law, performing all the functions and duties of the court for more than two years and a half, are to go for nought, or whether, as to the public and third persons, they are binding and effectual. On this proposition we assert, without the fear of contradiction, that, although their tenure of office may have been unconstitutional and illegal, they were de facto officers, and their acts as such were, as to the public and third persons, just as binding and effectual as the acts of the justices of the peace assembled in the county court would have been, if the statute installing the commissioners in their place had not been passed.

Cocke v. Halsey, 16 Pet. 71 (41 U. S. bk. 10, L. ed. 891); Co. of Ralls v. Douglass, 105 U. S. 728 (Bk. 26, L. ed. 957).

Office held under a law enacted by the Legislature, though void as being unconstitutional, is, before it is adjudged to be so, held under such color of title and color of authority as to make the person holding the office an officer de facto; and acts of officers performed under such a law are valid as respects the public and third persons interested therein.

State v. Carroll, 38 Conn. 449; Brown v. O'Connell, 36 Conn. 447; Taylor v. Skrine, 8 Brev. 516; People v. White, 24 Wend. 520; Clark v. Comm. 29 Pa. 129; Comm. v. McCombs, 56 Pa. 436; Re Ah Lee, 5 Fed. The courts of Tennessee seem also to have acquiesced in the doctrine.

Ward v. State, 2 Cold. 605; Blackburn v. State, 3 Head, 690.

That, supposing the officer whose act is relied upon to be acting under such color of title as to constitute him an officer de facto, an obligation executed by him is as binding on behalf of third persons as any other official act, seems never to have been questioned.

Co. of Ralls v. Douglass, supra; Knight v. Corporation of Wells, 1 Lutwyche, 188.

By the acts of the county court subsequent to their reinstatement the previous issue of the bonds was ratified by the County.

The acts referred to consist of all those kinds of acts in pais, which are usually regarded by courts as equivalent to a formal and express ratification by a principal of acts previously done on his behalf and in his name by one assuming to act for him, but with imperfect authority or no authority at all.

They kept the stock obtained by the original subscription; they confirmed and collected the tax levied therefor by the commissioners, and applied the same to the payment of the bonds; they voted upon the stock at all meetings of the company; from year to year they levied and collected a special tax for the payment of the interest on the bonds, and the installments of principal falling due; in this way they paid the entire issue of the bonds except about 88 bonds, and the interest upon those up to the year 1875; finally they voted for the consolidation of the railroad with the new company, and upon that being consummated, exchanged the original stock for the stock of the new consolidated company, which they still hold and enjoy.

Of the quality and sufficiency of these acts to work a ratification there can be no doubt. The only questions raised are:

1. Whether the original issue of the bonds can be ratified at all.

2. As to the effect of the constitutional provision of 1870 denying power to the counties of the State to lend their credit without a prior vote of the people.

There was complete legislative authority to the County, the party sought to be charged, to make the subscription and issue the bonds. The question presented is whether, when such a power has been granted, and it has been exercised in the name and on behalf of the county by a different agent than that prescribed by the Legislature, the county can afterwards be bound by a ratification deliberately made by the very agent prescribed by the Legislature.

Legislative grants of such authority to a county court, or to any other representative body, have uniformly been construed and treated as grants to the county.

The taking of stock and voting it, and the levy and collection of taxes to pay the subscription or bonds issued therefor, estop the County from denying its liability, assuming it had the right to subscribe.

Nugent v. Supervisors of Putnam Co. 19 Wall. 241 (36 U. S. bk. 22, L. ed. 83); Anderson v. State, 8 Bart. (Tenn.) 542; Supervisors v. Schenck, supra; Co. of Pendleton v. Amy, 13 Wall. 297 (80 U. S. bk. 20, L. ed. 579); Co. of Ray v. Vansycle, 96 U. S. 687 (Bk. 24, L. ed. 800); Burr. Pub. Lea, 336; Bronson v. Chappell, 12 Wall. 683 (79 U. S. bk. 20, L. ed. 436).

All these acts had been done before the Constitution of 1870 went into effect.

The acts of the General Assembly which authorized the counties through which this road ran, to make subscriptions without a submission of the proposition to the vote of the people, was a valid amendment to its charter, conferring new and additional privileges upon the company not in violation of the Constitution, and as such are not rendered void by the Constitution of 1870, nor impaired thereby.

Co. of Scotland v. Thomas, supra; Tipton Co. v. Locomotive Works, 103 U. S. 533 (Bk. 26, L. ed. 340); Empire v. Darlington, 101 U. S. 87 (Bk. 25, L. ed. 878).

All the cases cited on behalf of the defendant in error, where ratification was held to be impossible, are cases where there was no grant whatever of legislative authority, or what is the same thing, where the grant offered by the Legislature was made expressly dependent upon a prior vote of the people of the County, which failing, the grant never took effect, and left the County as destitute of power as if the Act had not been passed.

The Constitution of 1870 left the county courts in full control of all previously made subscriptions and debts for them.

The bonds having been issued before the constitutionality of the Act of March 9, 1867, under which the issue was made, had been passed upon by the highest court of the State, its subsequent decisions holding said Act invalid are not binding upon this court.

Anderson v. Santa Anna, 116 U. S. 356 (Bk. 29, L. ed. 633).

We insist that the case of Pope v. Phifer, 3 Heisk. 682, and Walker v. Merriman, MS., are out of harmony with the plain reading of the Constitution of 1834, and the decisions of the Supreme Court of Tennessee in Moore v. State, 5 Sneed, 510, and Wilcox v. State, 3 Heisk. 110, decided before the Pope v. Phifer case, and with the case of Hulsey v. Gaines, 2 B. J. Lea, 319, decided afterwards.

In fact in Lauderdale Co. v. Fargason, 7 Lea, 153, Freeman, J., who delivered the opinion in Pope v. Phifer, supra, delivered the opinion and decided exactly the reverse of his former opinion, and held that these Acts were not partial laws and were not obnoxious to the Constitution of 1834. This court has uniformly followed the rulings of the Supreme Courts of the several States upon the construction of their own Constitutions and legislative Acts, in so far as they are harmonious, sustained by reason or authority and not violative of all truth, law and justice; but they refuse to follow the oscillating and unsatisfactory opinions rendered in conflict with previous well adjudicated opinions, and especially where to follow them would affect rules and rights of property acquired in good faith, and predicated upon such former adjudication and interpretation, legislative, executive and judicial.

A contract valid under the laws and adjudications existing, and understood at the time of its execution will not be invalidated by subsequent legislation or adjudication to the contrary.

Questions affecting the validity of commercial securities belong to the domain of general jurisprudence, and are not controlled by state adjudications. A construction tending to destroy contracts, already made, put by a state court upon its own statutes, will not be followed by this court.

Messrs. Julius A. Taylor, R. D. Jordan and W. B. Glisson, for defendant in error:

It is essential to the plaintiff that the bonds and coupons sued on should have been executed by persons authorized to execute them by the laws of Tennessee; for if there is a total want of authority to issue them, there can be no such thing as a bona fide holding.

The power to issue is claimed to have been conferred by the 25th section of the Act of March 9, 1867, on the persons who did issue them.

If this provision would otherwise be a grant of the power claimed, then no authority was conferred by it; for the Act of 9th March, 1867, has, by a course of decision in Tennessee, been held unconstitutional.

The County of Shelby did not have power to make a subscription, but its county court did for it; and while the Legislature is omnipotent, except when the Constitution imposes limitations, yet as it delegated the power of binding the counties of the State to their quasi local Legislatures, created each county a corporation, gave the justices of the peace in county court assembled the power to act so as to bind the County, that is the only mode and the only tribunal or agency under the laws of Tennessee which could make a valid subscription of stock to the Mississippi Railroad Company.

These cases all hold that where the act done was colore officii, the act is valid as to third parties and the public in a collateral proceeding. The distinction is, where the act is under color of office it is valid; where it is not, it is void; and such has been the holding of the Supreme Court of Tennessee.

The doctrine involved here is one of protection to the public and third persons, on the ground of public policy, they not being required to inquire into or be compelled to show title in an officer. When, therefore, in civil cases the public or third persons have knowledge that the officer was not an officer de jure, the reason for validating the acts to which they submitted or which they invoked, failed and the law no longer protected them.

State v Carroll, 12 Am. L. Reg. 175; Rex v. Lisle, Strange, 1090; Rex v. Level, 6 East, 356.

When the plaintiff in error appeared before the county court in October, 1871, he knew, as a matter of fact, that the highest tribunal of Tennessee had decided that the commissioners who issued the bonds in suit were usurpers, and that the Act under which they held office was unconstitutional and void. He cannot now be heard to say that the commissioners were de facto officers.

The State of Tennessee has passed no law creating a board of commissioners for Shelby County; no law imposing duties on them; no law abrogating the quarterly court; no law giving the powers hitherto vested in that court to the board of commissioners; for what it cannot do it certainly, in contemplation of law, has not done.

It is next insisted that the court below erroneously held that voting, and receiving the stock, levying taxes to pay the coupons and bonds as they matured, and the assurances of the county court given the plaintiff, were not a ratification by the defendant of the unauthorized act of the county commissioners.

If there had been a defective execution of a power to issue the bonds, they could be validated. But here there was no power to issue; the Act under which they were issued was void; hence they were void ab initio—even in the hands of an innocent purchaser.

Mr. Justice Field delivered the opinion of the court: [434]

This is an action upon twenty-nine bonds, of $1,000 each, alleged to be the bonds of Shelby County, Tennessee, issued on the first of March, 1869, and payable on the first of January, 1873, with interest from January 1, 1869, at 6 per cent per annum, payable annually on the surrender of matured interest coupons attached; and three coupons of $60 each. The following is a copy of one of the bonds and of a coupon:

"$1,000 UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, $1,000,

Issued under and by virtue of section 6 of an Act of the Legislature of the State of Tennessee, passed February 25, 1867, amended on the 12th day of February, 1869, and by authority conferred upon the county commissioners of Shelby County by section 25 of an Act passed March 9, 1867.

State of Tennessee.

A special tax is levied by authority of law upon all the taxable property in the County of Shelby, to meet the principal and interest of these bonds, collectible in equal annual instalments running through six years, as the bonds themselves mature.

Shelby County Railroad Bond No. 176.

Be it known that the County of Shelby, State of Tennessee, is indebted to the Mississippi River Railroad Company or bearer in the sum of one thousand dollars, payable in the City of Memphis on the first day of January, eighteen hundred and seventy-three, with interest at the rate of six per cent per annum from January 1, 1869, payable annually in said city, upon surrender of the matured interest coupons hereto attached.

This is one of three hundred $1,000 bonds, all of the same denomination and rate of [435] interest, issued by Shelby County in payment of a subscription of three hundred thousand dollars to the Mississippi River Railroad Company, made by the county commissioners under the authority of the Acts above recited, transferable by delivery and redeemable in six years, at the rate of fifty thousand dollars a year, commencing January 1, 1870.

Dated at the City of Memphis, County of Shelby, State of Tennessee, the first day of March, 1869.

Barbour Lewis,

President of the Board of County Commissioners of Shelby County.

Jno. Loague,

Clerk of County Court of Shelby County."

$60 STATE OF TENNESSEE. $60

Shelby County.

Coupon No. —— of Bond No. 264.

The trustee of Shelby County will pay to the bearer sixty dollars in the City of Memphis on the 1st day of January, 1875, being interest due on bond No. 264, for $1,000, of bonds issued to Mississippi River Railroad Company.

[Seal, County Court of Shelby County, Tenn.]
(Signed) John Loague,
Clerk of Shelby County Court."

The plaintiff contends:

1. That the commissioners, by whose direction the bonds were issued, and whose president signed them, were lawful officers of Shelby County, and authorized, under the Acts mentioned in the heading of the bonds, to represent and bind the County by the subscription to the railroad company, and that the bonds issued were, therefore, its legal obligations.

2. That if the commissioners were not officers de jure of the County, they were officers de facto, and, as such, their action in making the subscription and issuing the bonds is equally binding upon the County; and,

3. That the action of the commissioners, whatever their want of authority, has been ratified by the County.

The defendant contends:

1. That the commissioners were not lawful
[436] officers of the County, and that there was no such office in Tennessee as that of county commissioner.

2. That there could not be any such de facto officers, as there was no such office known to the laws; and, therefore, that the subscription was made and the bonds were issued without authority and are void; and,

3. That the action of the commissioners was never ratified, and was incapable of ratification by the County.

Upon the first question presented, that which relates to the lawful existence and authority of the county commissioners, we are relieved from the necessity of passing. That has been authoritatively determined by the Supreme Court of Tennessee, and is not open for consideration by us.

From an early period in the history of the State—indeed from a period anterior to the adoption of her Constitution of 1796, to the passage of the Act of March 9, 1867—the administration of the government in local matters in each county was lodged in a county court, or quarterly court as it was sometimes called, composed of justices of the peace, elected in its different districts. The Constitution of 1796 recognizes that court as an existing tribunal, and the Constitution of 1834 prescribes the duties of the justices of the peace composing it. This county court alone had the power to make a county subscription to the Mississippi River Railroad Company, to issue bonds for the amount, and to levy taxes for its payment unless the Act of March 9, 1867, invested the board of commissioners with that authority. Stat. of 1867, chap. 48, § 6. That Act created the board, and provided that it should consist of five persons, residents of the County for not less than two years, each to serve for the period of five years and until his successor should be elected and qualified. The twenty-fifth section vested in it all the powers and duties then possessed by the quarterly court of the county, and in addition thereto the authority "to subscribe stock in railroads which the County Court of Shelby County has been authorized by general and special law to subscribe, and under the same conditions and restrictions, and to represent such stock in all elections for directors, and provide for payment of subscriptions as made."

The validity of this Act superseding the county court was at once assailed as in violation of the Constitution of the State. Within a month after its passage, William Walker and other justices of the peace of the County, in [437] their official character and as citizens and taxpayers, filed a bill in chancery in the name of the State, at their relation, against the commissioners appointed, alleging that they had usurped and were unlawfully exercising the powers and functions of the justices, and had taken into custody the records of the County under the Act, which the relators insisted was in violation of the Constitution, mentioning several sections with which it conflicted; and praying that the Act be adjudged void, that the attempt of the commissioners to exercise the powers of the justices be declared an usurpation, and that the commissioners be perpetually enjoined from exercising them. The case having been decided adversely to the relators, an appeal was taken to the Supreme Court of the State and, pending the appeal, the subscription to the stock of the Mississippi River Railroad Company was made by the commissioners, and the bonds were issued. Before the appeal was heard the supreme court of the State had under consideration a similar statute passed on the 12th of March, 1868, for Madison County, and extended to White County, which, in like manner, undertook to supersede the quarterly courts of those counties and substitute in their place boards of commissioners with the same powers as those conferred upon the commissioners of Shelby County. The case in which such consideration was had was Pope v. Phifer, reported in 3 Heisk. 682, Reports of the Supreme Court of the State. Under this Act three Commissioners were appointed by the governor, being the number prescribed to constitute the board of White County. The bill was filed to restrain them from organizing as a board, to have the Act declared unconstitutional, and to perpetually enjoin them from acting under it. The court states in its opinion that the question as to the validity of the Act was argued with great ability by counsel on both sides, and the opinion itself shows that the question was carefully considered. The chancellor, as in the case of the State at the relation of Walker and others against the commissioners, dismissed the bill. The supreme court reversed the decree, and perpetually enjoined the defendants from acting as a board of commissioners. It held that the Act creating the board and conferring on the commissioners appointed by the governor the powers of justices [43 of the peace of the county court, was unconstitutional and void; that the county court was one of the institutions of the State, recognized in the Constitution; that the powers conferred by it upon the justices of the peace in their collective capacity were intended to be exercised by that court; and that the power to tax for purposes of the county could not, by any special or local law, be taken from the justices of the peace as a county court and conferred upon local tribunals of particular counties composed of commissioners appointed by the governor.

This decision was made in February, 1871. In June following the case mentioned above of the State at the relation of Walker and others against the Commissioners of Shelby County was decided in conformity with it, the supreme court holding that at the time the bill was filed the justices were entitled to the relief prayed, and that the decree dismissing the bill was erroneous, and it so adjudged and decreed. But it said that as the Act under which the bill alleged that the defendants had usurped office had since then been repealed, that as they had not afterwards assumed to exercise the powers and perform the duties named in the Act, it was only necessary, in addition to what was decreed above, to dispose of the costs; and that disposition was made by taxing them against the defendants and awarding execution therefor.

In the same month the supreme court decided the case of Butterworth against Shelby County, which also involved a consideration of the validity of the Act creating the Board of Commissioners of that County.* The action was upon county warrants issued by the board and signed by Barbour Lewis as its president, as the bonds in this suit are signed. The court held that the Act creating the board was unconstitutional, that the board was an illegal body, and that, as a necessary consequence, the warrants of the County were invalid. Judgment was accordingly rendered for the defendant. Chief Justice Nicholson, in delivering the [439] opinion of the court, referred to the two decisions mentioned, and said that they had "determined that the Legislature exceeded its constitutional powers in assuming to abolish the county court and substitute in its place a board of county commissioners, with the powers before belonging to the county court. The Act of March 9, 1867, was, therefore, a nullity, and the board of commissioners appointed and organized thereunder was an unauthorized and illegal body. The Act was inoperative as to the existing organization, powers and duties of the county court. Neither the board of commissioners nor Barbour Lewis, its president, had any more powers under said Act than if no Act had been passed."

Counsel for the plaintiff have endeavored to show that the adjudication in these cases has been questioned by later decisions, and therefore should have no controlling force in this litigation. A careful examination of those decisions fails to support this position. The opinion that the Act was invalid because it was special legislation applicable only to certain counties would seem indeed to be thus modified. But the adjudication that the Constitution did not permit the appointment of commissioners to take the place of the justices of the peace for the County, and perform the duties of the county court, stands unimpaired, and as such is binding upon us. Two of the cases, as we have seen, were brought against the commissioners, in one case, of Shelby County, and in the other, of White County, to test the validity of the Acts under which they were appointed, or about to be appointed, and their right to assume and exercise the functions and powers of the justices of the peace, and hold the county court in their place. From the nature of the questions presented we cannot review or ignore this determination. Upon the construction of the constitution and laws of a State, this court, as a general rule, follows the decisions of her highest court, unless they conflict with or impair the efficacy of some principle of the Federal Constitution, or of a federal statute, or a rule of commercial or general law. In these cases no principle of the Federal Constitution or of any federal law is invaded, and no rule of general or commercial law is disregarded. The determination made relates to the existence of an inferior tribunal of the State, and that, depending upon the constitutional power of the [440] Legislature of the State to create it and supersede a pre-existing institution. Upon a subject of this nature the federal courts will recognize as authoritative the decision of the state court. As said by Mr. Justice Bradley, speaking for the court in Claiborne County v. Brooks: "It is undoubtedly a question of local policy with each State, what shall be the extent and character of the powers which its various political and municipal organizations shall possess; and the settled decisions of its highest courts on the subject will be regarded as authoritative by the courts of the United States; for it is a question that relates to the internal constitution of the body politic of the State." 111 U. S. 400, 410 [Bk. 28, L. ed. 470, 474]. It would lead to great confusion and disorder if a state tribunal, adjudged by the state supreme court to be an unauthorized and illegal body, should be held by the federal courts, disregarding the decision of the state court, to be an authorized and legal body, and thus make the claims and rights of suitors depend, in many instances, not upon settled law, but upon the contingency of litigation respecting them being before a state or a federal court. Conflicts of this kind should be avoided if possible, by leaving the courts of one sovereignty within their legitimate sphere to be independent of those of another, each respecting the adjudications of the other on subjects properly within its jurisdiction.

On many subjects the decisions of the courts of a State are merely advisory, to be followed or disregarded, according as they contain true or erroneous expositions of the law, as those of a foreign tribunal are treated. But on many subjects they must necessarily be conclusive; such as relate to the existence of her subordinate tribunals; the eligibility and election or appointment of their officers; and the passage of her laws. No federal court should refuse to accept such decisions as expressing on these subjects the law of the State. If, for instance, the supreme court of a State should hold that an Act appearing on her statute book was never passed and never became a law, the federal courts could not disregard the decision and declare that it was a law and enforce it as such. South Ottawa v. Perkins, 94 U. S. 260 [Bk. 24, L. ed. 154]; Post v. Supervisors, 105 U. S. 667 [Bk. 26, L. ed. 1204].

The decision of the Supreme Court of Ten- [441] nessee as to the constitutional existence of the board of commissioners of Shelby County is one of this class. That court has repeatedly adjudged, after careful and full consideration, that no such board ever had a lawful existence; that it was an unauthorized and illegal body; that its members were usurpers of the functions and powers of the justices of the peace of the County; and that their action in holding the county court was utterly void. This court should neither gainsay nor deny the authoritative character of that determination. It follows that in the disposition of the case before us we must hold that there was no lawful authority in the board to make the subscription to the Mississippi River Railroad Company and to issue the bonds of which those in suit are a part.

But it is contended that if the Act creating the board was void, and the commissioners were not officers de jure, they were nevertheless officers de facto, and that the acts of the board as a de facto court are binding upon the County. This contention is met by the fact that there can be no officer, either de jure or de facto, if there be no office to fill. As the Act attempting to create the office of commissioner never became a law, the office never came into existence. Some persons pretended that they held the office, but the law never recognized their pretensions, nor did the Supreme Court of the State. Whenever such pretensions were considered in that court, they were declared to be without any legal foundation, and the commissioners were held to be usurpers.

The doctrine which gives validity to acts of officers de facto, whatever defects there may be in the legality of their appointment or election, is founded upon considerations of policy and necessity, for the protection of the public and individuals whose interests may be affected thereby. Offices are created for the benefit of the public, and private parties are not permitted to inquire into the title of persons clothed with the evidence of such offices and in apparent possession of their powers and functions. For the good order and peace of society their authority is to be respected and obeyed until in some regular mode prescribed by law their title is investigated and determined. It is manifest that endless confusion would result, [448] if in every proceeding before such officers their title could be called in question. But the idea of an officer implies the existence of an office which he holds. It would be a misapplication of terms to call one an officer who holds no office, and a public office can exist only by force of law. This seems to us so obvious that we should hardly feel called upon to consider any adverse opinion on the subject but for the earnest contention of plaintiff's counsel that such existence is not essential, and that it is sufficient if the office be provided for by any legislative enactment, however invalid. Their position is that a legislative Act, although unconstitutional, may in terms create an office, and nothing further than its apparent existence is necessary to give validity to the acts of its assumed incumbent. That position, although not stated in this broad form, amounts to nothing else. It is difficult to meet it by any argument beyond this statement. An unconstitutional Act is not a law; it confers no rights; it imposes no duties; it affords no protection; it creates no office; it is, in legal contemplation, as inoperative as though it had never been passed.

In Hildreth v. McIntire, 1 J. J. Marsh. 206, we have a decision from the Court of Appeals of Kentucky which well illustrates this doctrine. The Legislature of that State attempted to abolish the court of appeals established by her Constitution, and create in its stead a new court. Members of the new court were appointed and undertook to exercise judicial functions. They dismissed an appeal because the record was not filed with the person acting as their clerk. A certificate of the dismissal signed by him was received by the lower court, and entered of record, and execution to carry into effect the original decree was ordered to issue. To reverse this order an appeal was taken to the constitutional court of appeals. The question was whether the the court below erred in obeying the mandate of the members of the new court, and its solution depended upon another—whether they were judges of the court of appeals and the person acting as their clerk was its clerk. The court said: "Although they assumed the functions of judges and clerk, and attempted to act as such, their acts in that character are totally null and [443] void unless they had been regularly appointed under, and according to, the Constitution. A de facto court of appeals cannot exist under a written Constitution which ordains one supreme court, and defines the qualification and duties of its judges, and prescribes the mode of appointing them. There cannot be more than one Court of Appeals in Kentucky as long as the Constitution shall exist, and that must necessarily be a court "de jure." When the government is entirely revolutionized, and all its departments usurped by force or the voice of a majority, then prudence recommends and necessity enforces obedience to the authority of those who may act as the public functionaries, and in such a case the acts of a de facto executive, a de facto judiciary, and a de facto Legislature, must be recognized as valid. But this is required by political necessity. There is no government in action except the government de facto, because all the attributes of sovereignty have, by usurpation, been transferred from those who had been legally invested with them, to others who, sustained by a power above the forms of law, claim to act, and do act, in their stead. But when the Constitution or form of government remains unaltered and supreme, there can be no de facto department or de facto office. The acts of the incumbents of such department or office cannot be enforced conformably to the Constitution, and can be regarded as valid only when the government is overturned. When there is a constitutional Executive and Legislature, there cannot be any other than a constitutional judiciary. Without a total revolution there can be no such political solecism in Kentucky as a "de facto" court of appeals. There can be no such court while the Constitution has life and power. There has been none such. There might be under our Constitution, as there have been, "de facto" officers. But there never was and never can be, under the present Constitution, a "de facto office." And the court held that the gentlemen who acted as judges of the legislative tribunal were not incumbents of de jure or de facto offices, nor were they de facto officers of de jure offices, and the order below was reversed.

In some respects the case at bar resembles [444] this one from Kentucky. Under the Constitution of Tennessee there was but one county court. That was composed of the justices of the county elected in their respective districts. The commissioners appointed under the Act of March 9, 1867, by the governor were not such justices, and could not hold such court, any more than the legislative tribunal of Kentucky could hold the Court of Appeals of that State. In Shelby County v Butterworth, from the opinion in which we have already quoted, Chief Justice Nicholson, speaking of the claim that Barbour Lewis, the president of the board of county commissioners, was a de facto officer, after referring to the decisions of the Supreme Court of the State holding that the board of commissioners was an illegal and unconstitutional body, said: "This left the organization of the county court in its former integrity, with its officers entitled to their offices and creating no vacancy to be filled by the illegal action under the Act of 1867. It follows that Barbour Lewis could not be a de facto officer, as there was no legal board of which he could be president, and as there was no vacancy in the legal organization. The warrants issued by him show the character in which he was acting, and repel the presumption that he was a de facto officer. He could be, under the circumstances, as we can judicially know from the law and the pleadings in the case, nothing but an usurper. There must be a legal office in existence, which is being improperly held, to give to the acts of such incumbent the validity of an officer de facto."

Numerous cases are cited in which expressions are used which, read apart from the facts of the cases, seemingly give support to the position of counsel; but, when read in connection with the facts, they will be seen to apply only to the invalidity, irregularity, or unconstitutionality of the mode by which the party was appointed or elected to a legally existing office. None of them sanction the doctrine that there can be a de facto office under a constitutional government, and that the acts of the incumbent are entitled to consideration as valid acts of a de facto officer. Where an office exists under the law, it matters not how the appointment of the incumbent is made, so far as the validity of his acts are concerned. It is enough that he is clothed with the insignia of the office, and exercises its powers and functions. As said by Mr. Justice Manning, of the Supreme Court of Michigan, in Carleton v. People, 10 Mich. 259, "Where there is no office there can be no officer de facto, for the reason that there can be none de jure. The county office existed by virtue of the Constitution the moment the new county was organized. No Act of legislation was necessary for that purpose. And all that is required when there is an office to make an officer de facto, is that the individual claiming the office is in possession of it, performing its duties and claiming to be such officer under color of an election or appointment, as the case may be. It is not necessary [445] that his election or appointment be valid, for that would make him an officer de jure. The official acts of such persons are recognized as valid on grounds of public policy, and for the protection of those having official business to transact."

The case of State v. Carroll, 38 Conn. 449, decided by the Supreme Court of Connecticut, upon which special reliance is placed by counsel, and which is mentioned with strong commendation as a landmark of the law, in no way militates against the doctrine we have declared, but is in harmony with it. That case was this: The Constitution of Connecticut provided that all judges should be elected by its General Assembly. An Act of the Legislature authorized the clerk of a city court, in case of the sickness or absence of its judge, to appoint a justice of the peace to hold the court during his temporary sickness or absence. A justice of the peace having thus been called in and having acted, a question arose whether the judgments rendered by him were valid. The court held that whether the law was constitutional or not, he was an officer de facto and, as such, his acts were valid. The opinion of Chief Justice Butler is an elaborate and admirable statement of the law, with a review of the English and American cases, on the validity of the acts of de facto officers, however illegal the mode of their appointment. It criticises the language of some cases: that the officer must act under color of authority conferred by a person having power, or prima facie power, to appoint or elect in the particular case; and it thus defines an officer de facto:

"An officer de facto is one whose acts, though [446] not those of a lawful officer, the law, upon principles of policy and justice, will hold valid, so far as they involve the interests of the public and third persons, where the duties of the office are exercised:

"First. Without a known appointment or election, but under such circumstances of reputation or acquiescence as were calculated to induce people, without inquiry, to submit to or invoke his action, supposing him to be the officer he assumed to be.

"Second. Under color of a known and valid appointment or election, but where the officer had failed to conform to some precedent, requirement or condition, as, to take an oath, give a bond, or the like.

"Third. Under color of a known election or appointment, void because the officer was not eligible, or because there was a want of power in the electing or appointing body, or by reason of some defect or irregularity in its exercise, such ineligibility, want of power, or defect being unknown to the public.

"Fourth. Under color of an election or an appointment by or pursuant to a public, unconstitutional law, before the same is adjudged to be such."

Of the great number of cases cited by the Chief Justice none recognizes such a thing as a de facto office, or speaks of a person as a de facto officer, except when he is the incumbent of a de jure office. The fourth head refers not to the unconstitutionality of the Act creating the office, but to the unconstitutionality of the Act by which the officer is appointed to an office legally existing. That such was the meaning of the Chief Justice is apparent from the cases cited by him in support of the last position, to some of which reference will be made.

One of them, Taylor v. Skrine, 3 Brevard, 516, arose in South Carolina in 1815. By an Act of that State of 1799, the governor was authorized to appoint and commission some fit and proper person to sit as judge in case any of the judges on the circuit should happen to be sick, or become unable to hold the court in his circuit. A presiding judge of the court was thus appointed by the governor. Subsequently the Act was declared to be unconstitutional, and the question arose whether the acts of the judge were necessarily void. It was held that he was a judge de facto and acting under color of legal authority, and that as such his acts were valid. Here the judge was appointed to fill an existing office, the duties of which the legal incumbent was temporarily incapable of discharging. Another case is Cocke v. Halsey, in 16 Pet. 71 [41 U. S. bk. 10, L. ed. 891]. It there appeared that, by the Constitution of Mississippi, the judges and clerks of probate were elected by the people. The Legislature provided by law that, in case of the disability of the clerk, the court might appoint one. An elected clerk having left the State for an indefinite period, the judge appointed another to serve during his absence. The law authorizing the appointment was declared unconstitutional, but the acts of the clerk were deemed valid as those of an officer de facto. Here the office was an existing one created by law.

To Carleton v. People, 10 Mich., 250 we have already referred. By the Constitution of Michigan the laws of the Legislature took effect ninety days after their passage. The Legislature on the 4th of February passed an Act creating a new county, and authorized the election of county officers in April following. The officers were elected within the ninety days, that is, before the Act took effect, and they subsequently acted as such officers. The validity of their acts was questioned on the ground that there was at the time no law that authorized the election, but the offices were existing by the Constitution, and as they subsequently entered upon the duties of those offices, it was held that they were officers de facto.

In Clark v. Commonwealth, from the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, 29 Pa. 129, the question related only to the title of the officer. The Constitution of that State provided for a division of the State into judicial districts, and for the election of the presiding judge of the county court for each district by the people thereof. The Legislature passed a law transferring a county from one judicial district to another during the term for which the judge of the district had been elected, and while presiding judge of the district to which the county was thus transferred he held court, at which a prisoner was convicted of murder. It was contended that the Act of the Legislature was equivalent to an appointment of a judge for that county, and, therefore, unconstitutional. The supreme court held that, admitting the law to be unconstitutional, the judge was an officer de facto, and that the prisoner could not be heard to deny it. Here, also, the office was one created by law, and the only question was as to the constitutionality of the law authorizing the judge to exercise it.

It is evident, from a consideration of these cases, that the learned Chief Justice, in State v. Carroll, had reference, in his fourth subdivision, as we have said, to the unconstitutionality of Acts appointing the officer, and not of Acts creating the office. Other cases cited by counsel will show a similar view.

In Brown v. O'Connell, 36 Conn. 432, the Constitution of the State provided that the judges of the courts should be appointed by the General Assembly. An Act of the Legislature established a police court in the City of Hartford, and provided for the appointment of judges of the court by the common council. It was held that the judge could be appointed only by the General Assembly, and to that extent the Act was unconstitutional. There was no question as to the validity of the Act, so far as it established a police court, and the appointee of the common council was held to be a judge de facto.

The case of Blackburn v. State, 3 Head, 690, only goes to show that the illegality of an appointment to a judicial office does not affect the validity of the acts of the judge. The Constitution of Tennessee requires a judge to be thirty years of age. A judge under that age having been appointed, it was held that he could be removed by a proper proceeding, but until that was done his acts were binding.

In Fowler v. Beebe, 9 Mass. 231, the Legislature passed an Act erecting the County of Hampden, and provided that the law should take effect from the first of August next ensuing. Before that date the governor, with the advice and consent of the then council, commissioned a person as sheriff of the county. There was no such office at the time his commission was issued, but when the law went into effect he acted under his commission. It was only the case of a premature appointment; and it was held that he was an officer de facto, and that the legality of his commission could not be collaterally questioned.

None of the cases cited militates against the doctrine that, for the existence of a de facto officer, there must be an office de jure, although there may be loose expressions in some of the opinions, not called for by the facts, seemingly against this view. Where no office legally exists, the pretended officer is merely a usurper, to whose acts no validity can be attached; and such, in our judgment, was the position of the commissioners of Shelby County who undertook to act as the county court, which could be constitutionally held only by justices of the peace. Their right to discharge the duties of justices of the peace was never recognized by the justices, but from the outset was resisted by legal proceedings, which terminated in an adjudication that they were usurpers, clothed with no authority or official function.

It remains to consider whether the action of the commissioners in subscribing for stock of the Mississippi River Railroad Company and issuing the bonds, of which those in suit are a part, being originally invalid, was afterwards ratified by the County. The county court, consisting of the justices of the peace, elected in their respective districts, alone had power to make a subscription and issue bonds. The sixth section of the Act of February 25, 1867, to which the bonds on their face refer, provides: "That the county court of any county through which the line of the Mississippi River Railroad is proposed to run, a majority of the justices in commission at the time concurring, may make a corporate or county subscription to the capital stock of said railroad company, of an amount not exceeding two thirds the estimated cost of grading the roadbed through the county and preparing the same for the iron rails; the said cost to be verified by the sworn statement of the president or chief engineer of said company. And after such subscription shall have been entered upon the books of the railroad company, either by the chairman of the county court, or by any other member of the court appointed therefor, the court shall proceed, without further reference or delay, to levy an assessment on all the taxable property within the county sufficient to pay said subscription; and the same shall be payable in three equal annual installments, commencing with [450] the fiscal year in which said subscription shall be made. And it shall be lawful for county courts making subscriptions as herein provided, to issue short bonds to the railroad company, in anticipation of the collection of the annual levies, if thereby construction of the work may be facilitated." Stat. 1867, chap. 48, § 6.

On the fifth of the following November the Legislature passed an Act declaring "That the subscription authorized in said sixth section to be made to the capital stock of the Mississippi River Railroad Company, by the counties along the line of said railroad, may be made at any monthly term of the county courts of said counties, or at any special term of said courts; Provided, That a majority of all the justices in commission in the counties respectively shall be present when any such subscription is made; and Provided further, That a majority of those present shall concur therein." Stat. 1867, chap. 6, § 1.

Neither of these Acts, as counsel observe, recognizes or in any way refers to the county commissioners, though the last Act was passed eight months after the Act creating the board of commissioners for Shelby County. Both provide that the subscription may be made by the county court, but upon the condition that a majority of all the justices in commission shall be present and a majority of those present shall concur therein.

The county court met on the 15th of November, 1869, for the first time after the passage of the Act of March 9, 1867, and assumed its legitimate functions as the governing agency of the county. On the 11th of April, 1870, it again met and established the rate of taxation for the Mississippi River Railroad bonds at 20 cents on each $100 worth of taxable property. At its meeting on the 16th of that month it ordered that the tax for those bonds should be 10 cents on each $100 worth of property. At the meeting on the 11th there were twenty-two justices of the peace present, of whom eighteen voted for the tax levy, and on the 16th only [451] twelve justices were present. There were in the County at that time forty-five justices in commission. There were no other meetings of the county court until after May 5, 1870, on which day the new Constitution of Tennessee went into effect, which declares that "The credit of no county, city or town shall be given or loaned to or in aid of any person, company, association or corporation, except upon an election to be first held by the qualified voters of such county, city or town, and the assent of three fourths of the votes cast at said election. Nor shall any county, city or town become a stockholder with others in any company, association or corporation, except upon a like election and the assent of a like majority."

By this provision of the Constitution the county court, as thus seen, was shorn of any power to order a subscription to stock of any railroad company without the previous assent of three fourths of the voters of the county, cast at an election held by its qualified voters, and of course it could not afterwards, without such assent, give validity to a subscription previously made by the commissioners. It could not ratify the acts of an unauthorized body. To ratify is to give validity to the act of another, and implies that the person or body ratifying has at the time power to do the act ratified. As we said in Marsh v. Fulton County, where it was contended, as in this case, that certain bonds of that county, issued without authority, were ratified by various acts of its supervisors, "A ratification is, in its effect upon the act of an agent, equivalent to the possession by him of a previous authority. It operates upon the act ratified in the same manner as though the authority of the agent to do the act existed originally. It follows that a ratification can only be made when the party ratifying possesses the power to perform the act ratified. The supervisors possessed no authority to make the subscription or issue the bonds in the first instance without the previous sanction of the qualified voters of the county. The supervisors in that particular were the mere agents of the county. They could not, therefore, ratify a subscription without a vote of the county, because they could not make a subscription in the first instance without such authorization. It would be absurd to say that they could without such [452] vote, by simple expressions of approval or in some other indirect way, give validity to acts, when they were directly in terms prohibited by statute from doing those acts until after such vote was had. That would be equivalent to saying that an agent, not having the power to do a particular act for his principal, could give validity to such act by its indirect recognition." 10 Wall. 676, 684 [77 U. S. bk. 19, L. ed. 1040, 1043]. See also County of Daviess v. Dickinson, 117 U. S. 657 [Bk. 29, L. ed. 1026]; McCracken v. San Francisco, 16 Cal. 591, 623.

No election was held by the voters of Shelby County with reference to the subscription for stock of the Mississippi River Railroad Company after the new Constitution went into effect. No subsequent proceedings, resolutions or expressions of approval of the county court with reference to the subscription made by the county commissioners, or to the bonds issued by them, could supersede the necessity of such an election. Without this sanction the county court could, in no manner, ratify the unauthorized act, nor could it accomplish that result by acts which would estop it from asserting that no such election was had. The requirement of the law could not, in this indirect way, be evaded.

The case of Aspinwall v. Comrs. of Daviess Co. 22 How. 365 [63 U. S. bk. 16, L. ed. 296], is directly in point on this subject. There the charter of the Ohio and Mississippi Railroad Company, created by the Legislature of Indiana in 1848, as amended in 1849, authorized the commissioners of a county, through which the road passed, to subscribe for stock and issue bonds, provided a majority of the qualified voters of the county voted on the first of March, 1849, that this should be done. The election was held on that day, and a majority of the voters voted that a subscription should be made. In September, 1852, the board of commissioners pursuant to the Acts and election, subscribed for 600 shares of the stock of the railroad company, amounting to $30,000, and in payment of it issued thirty bonds of $1,000 each, signed and sealed by the president of the board and attested by the auditor of the county, and delivered the same to the company. These bonds drew interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum, for which coupons were attached. The [453] plaintiffs became the holders of sixty of these coupons, and upon them the suit was brought against the commissioners of the county. After the subscription was voted, but before it was made or the bonds issued, the new Constitution of Indiana went into effect, which contained the following provision: "No county shall subscribe for stock in any incorporated company unless the same be paid for at the time of such subscription, nor shall any county loan its credit to any incorporated company, nor borrow money for the purpose of taking stock in any such company." Art. 10, § 6. This provision was set up against the validity of the bonds and coupons; and the question arose whether, under the charter of the company and its amendment, the right to the county subscription became so vested in the company as to exclude the operation of the new Constitution. The court held that the provisions of the charter authorizing the commissioners to subscribe conferred a power upon a public corporation, which could be modified, changed, enlarged or restrained by the Legislature; that by voting for the subscription no contract was created which prevented the application of the new Constitution; that the mere vote to subscribe did not of itself form a contract with the company within the protection of the Federal Constitution; that until the subscription was actually made no contract was executed; and that the bonds, being issued in violation of the new Constitution of the State, were void. That Constitution withdrew from the county commissioners all authority to make a subscription for the stock of an incorporated company, except in the manner and under the circumstances prescribed by that instrument, even though a vote for such subscription had been previously had, and a majority of the voters had voted for it. The doctrine of this case was reaffirmed in Wadsworth v. Supervisors, 102 U. S. 534 (Bk. 26, L. ed. 231].

It follows that no ratification of the subscription to the Mississippi River Railroad Company, of the bonds issued for its payment, could be made by the county court subsequently to the new Constitution of Tennessee, without the previous assent of three fourths of the voters of the County, which has never been given.

[454] The question recurs whether any ratification can be inferred from the action of the county court on the 11th and 16th of April, 1870, which was had before that Constitution took effect. At the meeting of the court on those days a rate of tax was established to be levied for the payment of the bonds, but it appears from its records that on both days less than a majority of the justices of the County were present; and the county court under those circumstances could not even directly have authorized the subscription. The levy of a tax for the payment of the bonds, when a less number of justices was present than would have been necessary to order a subscription, could not operate as a ratification of a void subscription. It is unnecessary to pursue this subject further. We are satisfied that none of the positions taken by the plaintiff can be sustained. The original invalidity of the acts of the commissioners has never been subsequently cured. It may be, as alleged, that the stock of the railroad company, for which they subscribed, is still held by the County. If so, the County may, by proper proceedings, be required to surrender it to the company, or to pay its value; for, independently of all restrictions upon municipal corporations, there is a rule of justice that must control them as it controls individuals. If they obtain the property of others without right, they must return it to the true owners, or pay for its value. But questions of that nature do not arise in this case. Here it is simply a question as to the validity of the bonds in suit; and as that cannot be sustained, the judgment below must be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

TOWN OF COVINGTON, INDIANA.

Municipal bonds—power of Indiana municipality to issue—pleading—estoppel.

1. Where a township has no general power to issue negotiable bonds, and bonds issued by it contain no statement of the purpose for which they were issued, and no recital which can bind the town by way of estoppel, special authority to issue them must be alleged and proved.

2. An averment in general terms that the town was authorized to issue the bonds is insufficient. The plaintiff must state the facts which bring the case within the special authority.

3. Gelpcke v. Dubuque, Bk. 17, explained.

[No. 249.]

Argued Apr. 21, 22, 1886. Decided May 10, 1886.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Indiana. Affirmed.

Statement of the case by Mr. Justice Gray:

This was an action by a citizen of New York against a Town in Indiana upon certain bonds and coupons.

The complaint alleged "That said defendant is a municipal corporation, organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the State of Indiana, with full power and authority, pursuant to the laws of said State to execute negotiable commercial paper; that, pursuant to the laws of said State regulating the execution of such negotiable commercial obligations, said defendant, on the first day of October, 1878, by its proper officers and agents, executed its negotiable commercial bond payable to bearer ten years after date, at the Farmers' Bank in Covington, Indiana, which bank then was a bank of deposit and discount at said Town of Covington, Indiana; that thereafter and before the maturity of said bond plaintiff purchased the same for a valuable consideration, and is still the owner thereof; a copy of said bond is filed herewith and hereby made part of this complaint, marked Exhibit A," to wit:

"No. 21. United States of America. $500.

"The Town of Covington, State of Indiana, will pay, ten years after date, to the bearer, five hundred dollars, with interest at eight per cent per annum, the interest payable as designated by coupons hereto attached, and the principal upon presentation of the bond when the same [149] shall have become due. This bond shall be payable after five years from the date hereof, at the option of the Town of Covington. Payable at the Farmers' Bank in Covington, Indiana. Each coupon attached shall be prima facie evidence of payment of the accrued interest.

"In witness whereof, the corporation seal of said Town is hereto affixed, and this bond is signed by the president of this board of trustees and attested by the clerk thereof, this first day of October, A. D. 1870.

[SEAL.] A. Gish, President.

"Attest: Frank M. Hicks, Clerk."

The complaint then alleged that the plaintiff was the owner of thirty-nine other bonds of precisely like tenor and effect, except that they were differently numbered, and that twenty of them were for $100 each (stating the numbers and amounts of each), and that he purchased each before maturity and for a valuable consideration. "Plaintiff says that said bond, Exhibit A, and each of said other bonds, is past due and wholly unpaid; wherefore plaintiff prays judgment for $20,000 against said defendant, and for all proper relief."

The complaint also contained a count, with similar allegations, upon coupons for interest, attached to such bonds at the time of their execution, and in this form:

"$40 Covington, Ind., October 1, 1879.

"One year after date the Town of Covington, Ind., will pay to the bearer, in the City of New York, forty dollars, being one year's interest on bond No. 21. A. Gish, Pres't.

"Attest: Frank M. Hicks, Clerk."

The defendant demurred to the complaint, because it stated no cause of action against the defendant; because it did not allege under what law or for what purpose the bonds and coupons sued on were issued; because it contained no allegation showing authority in the defendant to make the bonds and coupons sued on; and because the allegation in the complaint, of [150] power and authority in the defendant to make the bonds and coupons in suit, was an averment of a legal conclusion.

The court sustained the demurrer, and rendered judgment for the defendant; and the plaintiff sued out this writ of error.

Messrs. Joseph E. McDonald and John M. Butler, for plaintiff in error:

Incorporated towns, as municipal corporations of the State of Indiana, are empowered by law to issue commercial obligations for some purposes.

Bank of New Albany v. Danville, 60 Ind. 504; Smith v. Madison, 7 Ind. 86; New England, etc. Co. v. Robinson, 25 Ind. 536; Ang. and Ames Corp. § 257; The Board, etc. v. Day, 19 Ind. 450; Mills v. Gleason, 11 Wis. 470; Miller v. Board of Comrs., 66 Ind. 162; Evansville, etc. R. R. Co. v. Evansville, 15 Ind. 412; 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 88.

Obligations of this character have been uniformly recognized by this court and by all the courts of the country as having in fact, as well as in name, all the qualities of commercial paper.

Gelpcke v. Dubuque, 1 Wall. 206 (68 U. S. bk. 17, L. ed. 519); Mercer Co. v. Hackett, 1 Wall. 95 (68 U. S. 17, L. ed. 548); Ackley School Dist. v. Hall, 113 U. S. 140 (Bk. 28, L. ed. 954); Mfg. Co. v. Bradley, 105 U. S. 180 (Bk. 26, L. ed. 1034); Rogers v. Burlington, 3 Wall. 666 (70 U. S. bk. 18, L. ed. 79); Commissioners, etc. v. Clark, 94 U. S. 287 (Bk. 24, L. ed. 63).

It is a presumption of law that public officers act in accordance with, and not contrary to, law.

They are not mere agents, with reference to such bonds as these in suit; but they are as well the tribunal vested with power to determine as to whether they may rightfully issue the bonds.

Martin v. Mott, 12 Wheat. 19 (25 U. S. bk. 6, L. ed. 537); Coloma v. Eaves, 92 U. S. 490 (Bk. 23, L. ed. 579); U. S. v. Crusell, 14 Wall. 4 (81 U. S. bk. 20, L. ed. 821); Strother v. Lucas, 12 Pet. 438 (37 U. S. bk. 9, L. ed. 1137); U. S. v. Clarke, 8 Pet. 452, 453 (33 U. S. bk. 8, L. ed. 1001); Delassus v. U. S., 9 Pet. 134 (34 U. S. bk. 9, L. ed. 71); U. S. v. Peralta, 19 How. 347 (60 U. S. bk. 15, L. ed. 678); Bank of U. S. v. Dandridge, 12 Wheat. 70 (25 U. S. bk. 6, L. ed. 552); Cornett (Nash) v. Williams, 20 Wall. 250 (87 U. S. bk. 22, L. ed. 254); Carpenter v. Rannels, 19 Wall. 146 (86 U. S. bk. 22, L. ed. 77); McNitt v. Turner, 16 Wall. 363 (83 U. S. bk. 21, L. ed. 341); Supervisors v. Schenck, 5 Wall. 782 (72 U. S. bk. 18, L. ed. 556); Pendleton v. Amy, 13 Wall. 305 (80 U. S. bk. 20, L. ed. 579); Commissioners v. January, 94 U. S. 205, 206 (Bk. 24, L. ed. 110).

The authorities above cited in support of our second proposition illustrate its applicability to a great variety of cases. In no case is its applicability more apparent than in the case at bar. The town officers are authorized to act upon the existence of certain conditions, but of the existence of those conditions they are made the exclusive judges as to third parties. The fact that they act presupposes the existence of necessary conditions and their own judicial determination as to the performance of such precedent conditions. The existence of these bonds, the execution of which is averred, implies everything precedent; and "what is implied in a record, pleading, will, deed or contract is as effectual as what is expressed."

Cornett (Nash) v. Williams, supra.

When a corporation has power under any circumstances to issue negotiable securities, the bona fide holder has a right to presume that they were issued under the circumstances which give the requisite authority, and that they are no more liable to be impeached for any infirmity in the hands of such a holder than any other commercial paper.

Lexington v. Butler, 14 Wall. 296 (81 U. S. bk. 20, L. ed. 809); Gelpcke v. Dubuque, 1 Wall. 203 (68 U. S. bk. 17, L. ed. 519; Supervisors v. Schenck, supra; San Antonio v. Mehaffy, 96 U. S. 314 (Bk. 24, L. ed. 816); Co. of Macon v. Shores, 97 U. S. 278, 279 (Bk. 24, L. ed. 889); Merchants Nat. Bank v. State Bank, 10 Wall. 604 (77 U. S. bk. 19, L. ed. 1008); Farm. and Mech. Bank v. Butchers and Drovers Bank, 16 N. Y. 125; Mayor v. Lord, 9 Wall. 414 (76 U. S. bk. 19, L. ed. 704).

The plaintiff in error cannot be required to aver or prove the performance of any of the requisites necessary to give the bonds validity. The want of such performance (if any exists), is a matter of defense.

Lincoln v. Cambria Iron Co. 103 U. S. 416 (Bk. 26, L. ed. 518); Co. of Clay v. Society for Savings, 104 U. S. 586 (Bk. 26, L. ed. 856); Gelpcke v. Dubuque, 1 Wall. 223 (68 U. S. bk. 17, L. ed. 519).

Recitals in municipal bonds neither give to nor take away from such bonds their character as commercial securities governed by the law-merchant; they may, and often do, create an estoppel in favor of a bona fide holder, which would not exist but for the recitals, but they never create authority to issue such bonds, nor do they make the bonds when issued any more or less commercial securities governed by the law-merchant than they are without recitals.

Ackley School Dist. v. Hall, 113 U. S. 130 (Bk. 28, L. ed. 954); Dixon Co. v. Field, 111 U. S. 83 (Bk. 28, L. ed. 360); Hayes v. Holly Springs, 114 U. S. 126 (Bk. 29, L. ed. 81).

Absolute lack of authority of law, upon the part of a municipal corporation, to issue commercial obligations for any purpose whatever, would be equally fatal to the bonds, whether they did or did not contain recitals, no matter how innocent a bona fide holder might be.

But in the case at bar it has been shown that the Town of Covington had full, lawful authority to issue commercial obligations for some purposes under some circumstances. The Town of Covington did issue these bonds. They are in form and character commercial obligations governed by the law-merchant.

The plaintiff is a bona fide purchaser for value before maturity.

The fact that the Town of Covington paid the interest on these bonds for six years—while we do not claim that it works an estoppel in favor of plaintiff, or that it is, of itself, conclusive against the defendant—certainly is a circumstance entitled to much weight in the consideration of the case.

Messrs. Thomas F. Davidson, and John C. Black, for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Gray, after stating the case as above, delivered the opinion of the court:

The Town of Covington had no general power to issue negotiable bonds. If the general Statute of Indiana of June 11, 1852, under which it was incorporated, conferred any power upon towns to issue bonds, it was only for certain municipal purposes therein specified; and the general Statute of May 15, 1869, authorized towns to issue bonds for the purchase and erection of lands and buildings for school purposes only. 1 Gavin & Hord, Stat. 623–626, Davis, Supp. 116.

The bonds in suit containing no statement of the purpose for which they were issued, and no recital which can bind the Town by way of estoppel, anyone suing upon the bonds is bound to allege and prove the authority of the Town to issue them.

The plaintiff relies on the statement of Mr. Justice Swayne in Gelpcke v. Dubuque, 1 Wall. 175, 203 [68 U. S. bk. 11, L. ed. 520, 524], repeated by him and by Mr. Justice Clifford in later cases, that "When a corporation has power under any circumstances to issue negotiable securities, the bona fide holder has a right to presume they were issued under the circumstances which give the requisite authority, and they are no more liable to be impeached for any infirmity in the hands of such a holder than any other commercial paper." Supervisors v. Schenck, 5 Wall. 772, 784 [72 U. S. bk. 18, L. ed. 556, 560]; Lexington v. Butler, 14 Wall. 282, 296 [81 U. S. bk. 20, L. ed. 809, 812]; San Antonio v. Mehaffy, 96 U. S. 312, 314 [Bk. 24, L. ed. 816, 817;] Macon Co. v. Shores, 97 U. S. 272, 279 [Bk. 24, L. ed. 889].

But the circumstances thus spoken of were the preliminary facts requisite to the exercise of the power, not the limits, fixed by law, of the objects and purposes for which the power could be exercised at all. In each of the cases [151] cited, the defects suggested were in the requisite preliminary proceedings, and the bonds sued on appeared by recitals on their face to have been issued according to law. When the law confers no authority to issue the bonds in question, the mere fact of their issue cannot bind the town to pay them, even to a purchaser before maturity and for value. Marsh v. Fulton Co. 10 Wall. 676 [77 U. S. bk. 19, L. ed. 1040]; East Oakland v. Skinner, 94 U. S. 255 [Bk. 24, L. ed. 125]; Buchanan v. Litchfield, 102 U. S. 278 [Bk 26, L. ed. 138]; Dixon County v. Field, 111 U. S. 83 [Bk. 28, L. ed. 360]; Hayes v. Holly Springs, 114 U. S. 120 [Bk. 29, L. ed. 81]; Daviess Co. v. Dickinson, 117 U. S. 657 [Bk. 29, L. ed. 1026].

A demurrer admits only facts, and facts well pleaded. The Town having but a limited authority to issue bonds for certain purposes, it is not enough for the plaintiff to aver in general terms that the Town was authorized to issue the bonds in suit; but he must state the facts which bring the case within the special authority. There is nothing in this declaration, or in the copies of instruments annexed to and made part of it, which shows, or has any tendency to show, for what purpose the bonds were made. The averment, that the defendant is a municipal corporation under the laws of Indiana, "with full power and authority, pursuant to the laws of said State, to execute negotiable commercial paper," if understood as alleging a general power to execute negotiable commercial paper, is inconsistent with the public laws of the State, of which the courts of the United States take judicial notice. The averment that the bonds held by the plaintiff were executed pursuant to the laws of the State, is but a statement of a conclusion of law which is not admitted by demurrer. The declaration is fatally defective for not stating the facts necessary to enable the court to judge for itself whether that conclusion of law has any foundation in fact. Pumpelly v. Green Bay Co., 13 Wall. 166, 175 [80 U. S. bk. 20, L. ed. 557]; Cragin v. Lovell, 109 U. S. 194 [Bk. 27, L. ed. 903]; Kennard v. Cass Co. 3 Dill. 147; Broome v. Taylor, 76 N. v.

CENTRAL VERMONT RAILROAD COMPANY.

Action on demand note, with interest, made and delivered by corporation to subscriber for advances—Massachusetts and Vermont Statutes—payment by stock assessments—when overdue—practice.

1. The only question presented by a writ of error in a case which was submitted to the judge of the circuit court as referee, in accordance with state statutes and practice, is whether there is any error of law in the judgment rendered by the court upon the facts found by the referee.

2. A promissory note payable on demand, with interest, was made by the defendant corporation and delivered to a subscriber to its stock in consideration of money advanced by him, it being understood that subsequent stock assessments should, when payable, be not only set off against, but considered as payments upon, the note. Upon such assessments being made on the payee's stock to an amount larger than that of the note, he paid the difference but did not surrender the note. In a suit upon the note by a subsequent indorsee, it is held that, as between the defendant and the payee, or any one taking the note when overdue, it was paid.

3. The Statutes of Massachusetts and Vermont fix the reasonable time beyond which a demand note shall be deemed overdue, at sixty days.

Argued April 8, 1886. Decided May 10, 1886.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Vermont. Affirmed.

Statement of the case by Mr. Justice Gray:

This was an action of assumpsit, brought October 1, 1878, in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Vermont, by a citizen of New York as indorsee, against a Vermont corporation as maker, of the following promissory note:

"$5000. Boston, July 10, 1878.

"On demand after date, with interest, we promise to pay to the order of H. B. Wilbur, Treasurer, five thousand dollars.

"Central Vermont R. R. Co.

"As Receivers and Managers Vermont Central, and Vermont and Canada R. R.

"By H. B. Wilbur, Treasurer.

"No. 8. Value received. Approved.

"J. Gregory Smith, President.

"H. B. Wilbur, Treasurer."

On August 28, 1879, the defendant pleaded the general issue, with a specification of defense, in accordance with the Statutes of Vermont (Gen. Stat. 1862, chap. 30, §§ 15, 32; Rev. Laws 1880, §§ 908, 909), that the defendant was organized as a corporation on May 27, 1878; that on July 10, 1878, it delivered the note in suit to John Q. Hoyt, an original subscriber to the defendant's capital stock, and then holding shares of that stock of the par value of $50,000, only partially paid for; that on that day the defendant being in urgent need of money, and not having time to regularly lay and collect an assessment on its capital stock, Hoyt advanced to the defendant $5,000, and the defendant gave him this note, under an agreement that he should hold it until an assessment covering that amount should be made on his stock; and it was understood and agreed by and between him and the defendant that, when such assessment should be made, the $5,000 so advanced should be applied in payment thereof, and the note should be thereby paid and extinguished, and should be surrendered; that on August 10, 1878, such an assessment was made by the defendant upon its capital stock, including Hoyt's shares; that on October 28, 1878, the $5,000 advanced as aforesaid was duly applied in payment of that assessment, whereby the note was paid and extinguished, and the note was suffered to remain in his hands through inadvertence; and that the plaintiff received the note from Hoyt long after its payment and extinguishment as above stated, as security for a pre-existing debt from Hoyt to the plaintiff, and with full knowledge of such satisfaction and payment, and after the note had ceased to be current. [153]

On May 16, 1882, the counsel of the parties signed and filed an agreement in writing, by which it was "stipulated and agreed to refer this case to Hon. Hoyt H. Wheeler to try and decide this case as referee."

On September 6, 1882, the referee filed his report, the material parts of which were as follows:

"On the hearing, it appeared from the evidence that in 1872 several persons were in possession of and operating the Vermont Central and Vermont and Canada Railroads as receivers and managers of the Court of Chancery of the State, in Franklin County, and had prepared to issue a series of long-time bonds, called income and extension bonds, a part of which had not been negotiated. The defendant was chartered with power to temporarily operate those roads, subject to the order of that court, and to assume the contracts of the receivers [154]

NOTE.—Negotiable paper; payable on demand; reasonable time.

A note in this country payable on demand, like a check (see Mohawk Bank v. Broderick, 13 Wend. 133, note, L. ed.; Conroy v. Warren, 3 Johns. Cas. 259, note, L. ed.), will be deemed overdue after a "reasonable time." What is a reasonable time depends upon the circumstances of each individual case, and is a question of law for the court. See, in addition to the principal case and authorities there cited, Carlton v. Bailey, 7 Fost. (N. H.) 230; Pourman v. Mills, 39 Cal. 345; Parker v. Tuttle, 44 Me. 459.

There are cases however which hold that what is reasonable time is a question for the jury, under proper instructions from the court. See Tomlinson v. Kinsella, 31 Conn. 268.

See generally Crim v. Starkweather, 88 N. Y. 339; Salmon v. Grosvenor, 66 Barb. 160; Furman v. Haskin, 2 Cal. 369, note, L. ed.; La Due v. Kasson Bank, 31 Minn. 33; 1 Ames Cases on N. & B. 782, note.

and managers. Subscriptions to the capital stock of the defendant were opened, and $2,000,000 in amount subscribed for April 30, 1873, of which John Q. Hoyt, of the City of New York, subscribed for $50,000, and it was expected by the subscribers that when the Company should be organized it would be appointed receiver of those roads, and assume the obligations of the other receivers. Five per cent of the subscriptions was required by the commissioners of subscription to be paid down. The receivers were in need of funds, and by arrangement with them one of the subscribers advanced $200,000—10 per cent of the subscriptions—in behalf of all the subscribers, as a temporary loan to the receivers, pending the organization of the Company and proceedings to carry out the expectations of the subscribers, and a note of that amount was made, and, with $400,000 in amount of the income and extension bonds as collateral security for its payment, delivered to the subscriber making the advance, upon the understanding that the note should be paid if the defendant Company did not come into possession of the roads and assume the obligations of the receivers, and stand against the subscriptions for stock if it did.

"The defendant Company was organized May 27, 1873; was appointed receiver and manager of the roads June 21, 1873; and went into possession of the roads, assuming the obligations of the former receivers and managers, July 1, 1873. An assessment of 30 per cent on the subscriptions for stock was laid June 24, another of 10 per cent August 13, and another of 10 per cent October 28, 1873, the last payable on or before December 1, 1873. The assessment of June 24 was paid by the subscribers respectively, including Hoyt. After the arrangement for making the defendant receiver of the roads was consummated, the note of $200,000 was given up, and new notes of the defendant were given, running to the subscribers separately, each in proportion to the amount of his subscription. The other subscribers paid to the one who made the advance each his pro-[155] portion of it, and received the notes and a proportionate amount of the collateral bonds. Hoyt paid $5,000, and received the note in suit and $10,000 of the bonds. Hoyt paid the assessment of August 13, and one half the assessment of October 28; the other half of the latter was rescinded, and stock issued for one half the amount subscribed. The assessments paid amounted to 50 per cent of the subscription. Hoyt paid, as stated, 50 per cent, and no more, of his subscription. There was no other consideration for this note; and by the understanding of the parties it was to be delivered up, with the collateral bonds, on delivery to him of stock certificates for his stock.

"About November 1, 1873, Hoyt became indebted to the plaintiff, at New York, for $7,000 lent, with the understanding that the loan should be increased to $10,000, and delivered this note and these bonds to him as security for the payment of the loan. The plaintiff at that time knew, from previous conversations with Hoyt, generally about the subscription for stock and the situation and circumstances of the roads, but he did not know before, and was not then informed, that the note was to stand against the subscription for the stock, nor that the bonds, which then had a long time to run, were collateral to the note, but took all of them, supposing that they were valid securities for what they purported to be."

"Certificates of stock were issued for all the subscribers in 1874, and delivered to them, and all but Hoyt delivered up the notes and bonds. He endeavored to procure the note and bonds of the plaintiff to deliver up to the defendant, but was unable to do so."

"In April, 1876, the plaintiff called on the president of the defendant for payment of the note in suit, who told him the circumstances under which the note was given, but did not state that they would be relied on as a defense to the note, or that any question would be made about its validity, and requested him to wait and endeavor to get payment from Hoyt, and encouraged him that he would succeed in doing so. He had a similar interview with a like result afterwards, the president adding that if Hoyt did not pay the plaintiff's note the defendant would not ask him to wait again, but [15 would provide for the payment of this one. Just before this suit was brought, a similar interview was had, during which the president told him that he thought and had been advised that the circumstances under which the note was given would constitute a good defense to the note, and did not pay it.

"The income and extension bonds were sold in the market, March 24, 1881, for $5,000, less $12.50 commission, without notice to Hoyt or the defendant. They had been worth more while the plaintiff held them, but this was their then market value.

"The note is made a part of this report. It was executed, as to time and place, according to its purport."

"All the evidence showing the circumstances under which the note was given, and the proceedings in relation to it, were seasonably objected to, and admitted against the objections.

"The respective rights of the parties to recover in this action are, upon these facts, submitted to the court.

"Hoyt H. Wheeler, Referee."

The record stated that afterwards "Said cause came on for trial, upon the report of the referee, before the Honorable Hoyt H. Wheeler, District Judge of the United States within and for the District of Vermont, and, after hearing the arguments of counsel for the plaintiff and defendant, the court, on November 7, 1882, filed its decision in said cause, rendering judgment for the defendant," being the opinion reported in 14 Fed. Rep. 269.

On the same day, judgment for the defendant was entered upon the docket, and four days afterwards the following order was filed:

"Upon the report of the referee the court rendered judgment for the defendant, to which decision and judgment the plaintiff excepted. Exceptions allowed and ordered to be placed on record.

"Hoyt H. Wheeler."

Mr. John F. Dillon, for plaintiff in error.

The court below erred in holding that the note in suit was overdue when transferred to the plaintiff. [15

Instances may be readily cited where the courts, applying the doctrine of reasonable time to demand notes, have held that the presumption of dishonor was not justified upon a lapse of periods ranging from three months to a year and a half or more.

Vreeland v. Hyde, 2 Hall, N. Y. 249,—19 months; Hendricks v. Judah, 1 Johns. 319,—1 year; Sanford v. Mickles, 4 Johns. 224,—5 months; Chartered Merc. Bank, etc. v. Dickson, L. R. 3 P. Co.* v. Walker, 14 S. D. & B. 332.

Speaking of demand notes payable with interest, the Supreme Court of Connecticut says:

"The note in question, although on demand and negotiable, is also expressed to be 'with interest.' From this and the other facts found it sufficiently appears that an immediate demand was not contemplated, and that the note was intended to lie as continuing security."

Rhodes v. Seymour, 36 Conn. 6. See, also, Shutts v. Fingar, 1 Cent. Rep. (N. Y.) 731; Parker v. Stroud, 98 N. Y. 379; Merritt v. Todd, supra; Pardee v. Fish, 60 N. The court erred in receiving evidence concerning, and also, in giving legal effect to the alleged collateral, verbal understanding between the defendant Company and Hoyt.

The court erred in holding that the plea of payment was established and that equities existed in favor of defendant, which constituted a defense to the note.

St. Louis Per. Ins. Co. v. Homer, 9 Met. 89.

As an independent right of set-off, the defense is incapable of assertion against Paine. A right of set-off is not an equity.

If such a right be regarded as an equity, it had not accrued at the time the note was transferred.

Waterman, Set-Off, § 109 et seq., and cases cited; McAlpin v. Wingard, 2 Rich. 547; Martin v. Kunzmuller, 37 N. Y. 396; Byles, Bills, p. 265; Watson v. Mid-Wales R. Co. L. R. 2 C. P. 593.

In Vermont no debt can be set off in an action unless it be the personal debt of the plaintiff.

Phelps v. Bulkeley, 20 Vt. 17.

The equities subject to which a transferee takes overdue paper are defined and certain. They are failure or want of consideration, fraud and payment. No one of these defenses is found by the court to have existed at the time the note was transferred. The transaction between the Company and Hoyt is found to have been a loan by Hoyt of $5,000, and a delivery by the Company of its absolute promissory note for that sum, together with $10,000 in amount of income and extension bonds as collateral security. The consideration was "actual cash advanced" (see the parallel case of Spring v. Lovett, 11 Pick. 417), and could not have been more adequate. Fraud was not pretended. Payment is equally disposed of by the finding that the note was only to cease to be obligatory on the delivery of certificates of stock to Hoyt.

The court erred in refusing to give effect to the promise of the defendant Company, through its president, to the plaintiff to pay the note in suit.

This promise and request for time having been acted upon by Paine, the Company is estopped from setting up a defense inconsistent with its promise.

Messrs. Guy C. Noble, Geo. F. Edmunds, E. C. Smith and Daniel Roberts, for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Gray delivered the opinion of the court: [158]

This case was not submitted to the decision of the court without a jury, pursuant to the Revised Statutes of the United States, sections 649, 700; but to the decision of the judge as a referee, in accordance with the Statutes and practice of Vermont. Gen. Stat. 1862, chap. 30, § 52; Rev. Laws 1880, § 985; White v. White, 21 Vt. 250; Melendy v. Spaulding, 54 Vt. 517. The only question presented by the writ of error, therefore, is whether there is any error of law in the judgment rendered by the court upon the facts found by the referee. See Bond v. Dustin, 112 U. S. 604, 606, 607 [Bk. 28. L. ed. 835, 837] and cases there cited.

The report of the refcree, although a little obscure in parts, sufficiently shows that the material facts were as follows: Subscriptions were made to the capital stock of the defendant Corporation to the amount of $2,000,000 (of which Hoyt subscribed $50,000), with the expectation that the defendant, when organized as a corporation, should be appointed, pursuant to its charter, receiver of two other railroad corporations, and should assume the obligations of the former receivers. Those receivers were short of money, and by arrangement with them one of the subscribers, in behalf of all, advanced as a temporary loan to the receivers $200,000 (10 per cent of the whole subscription), and a note for that amount was made to him, with the understanding that the note should be paid if the defendant did not come into possession of the roads and assume the obligations of the receivers, and should "stand against the subscriptions for stock if it did." After the defendant had been organized and been appointed receiver, and had assumed the obligations of the former receivers, the note of $200,000 was given up, and instead thereof the defendant gave new notes to each sub- [159] scriber separately for 10 per cent of the amount of his subscription, and each of the other subscribers paid his proportion of the sum of $200,000 to the one who had advanced that sum. Hoyt paid him $5,000, and received the note in suit, which was made and dated at Boston, July 10, 1873, and was payable on demand, with interest. The assessments laid on the subscriptions for stock amounted to 50 per cent, of which 5 per cent was paid at the time of subscribing; 30 per cent was laid June 24, which is stated to have been "paid by the subscribers respectively, including Hoyt;" 10 per cent was laid August 13, and 5 per cent laid October 24, and payable December 1, 1873, both of which Hoyt paid. This part of the report of the referee, after stating the above facts, concludes thus: "The assessments paid amounted to 50 per cent of the subscriptions. Hoyt paid, as stated, 50 per cent, and no more, of his subscription. There was no other consideration for this note; and by the understanding of the parties it was to be delivered up, with the collateral bonds, on delivery to him of stock certificates for his stock."

It is evident that the 10 per cent on Hoyt's stock, which had been included in the sum of [160] $200,000 stated to have been originally advanced by the lender "in behalf of all the subscribers," and which was repaid to him by Hoyt when the notes to the several subscribers were substituted for the single note for the whole original advance, is to be considered as part of the 50 per cent paid by Hoyt towards his subscription, and that he paid directly to the defendant only 40 per cent. The difference in form of the statements, that "the assessment of June 24 was paid by the subscribers respectively, including Hoyt," but that "Hoyt paid" the two later assessments is, to say the least, quite consistent with this view. And any other is wholly inconsistent with the ultimate facts expressly found, that "Hoyt paid, as stated, 50 per cent, and no more, of his subscription," and that "there was no other consideration for this note."

The effect of the agreement between the defendant Corporation and Hoyt was that the assessments to be laid upon his stock in the Corporation should, when payable, be not only set off against, but considered as payments upon, the note for $5,000 from the Corporation to him, now in suit. When Hoyt delivered this note to the plaintiff, on November 1, 1873, the assessments already due and payable upon his stock amounted to much more. As between the defendant and Hoyt, therefore, as well as against anyone who took this note from Hoyt, when overdue, the note had been paid. American Bank v. Jenness, 2 Met. 288; Gilson v. Gilson, 16 Vt. 464.

In this country, a promissory note payable on demand has always been held to be overdue, so as to subject anyone taking it to all defenses to which it would be open in the hands of the payee, unless transferred within a reasonable time after its date; and what is reasonable time is a question of law, depending upon all the circumstances of the particular case. Morgan v. U. S. 113 U. S. 476, 501 [Bk. 28, L. ed. 1044,1053]; Losee v. Dunkin, 7 Johns. 70; Sylvester v. Crapo, 15 Pick. 92; Dennett v. Wyman, 13 Vt. 485; Camp v. Clark, 14 Vt. 387. See also Chartered Merc. Bank v. Dickson, L. R. 3 P. C. 574, 579.

The difficulties of applying this test, and the convenience of a more definite rule, have led the Legislatures of many States to regulate the matter by statute; and before the making of the note in suit the Statutes both of Massa- [161] chusetts and of Vermont had defined reasonable time, for this purpose, to be sixty days from the date of the note. Mass. Gen. Stat. 1860, chap. 53, §§ 8, 10; Pub. Stat. 1882, chap. 77, §§ 12, 14; Vermont Stat. 1870, chap. 70; Rev. Laws 1880, § 2013. The power of the state legislatures to establish such a rule prospectively, with regard to promissory notes made and payable within their respective jurisdictions, has not been and cannot be doubted.

The note in suit was indorsed to the plaintiff more than sixty days after its date. It was made in Massachusetts, and, if not payable there, was payable in Vermont, where the defendant was incorporated. The construction and effect of the contract must be governed by the law of the one or the other of those States; and it is superfluous to consider by which, because by the law of either the note was overdue when the plaintiff took it, and therefore he cannot recover upon it.

As to the evidence, stated in the report of the referee, upon which the plaintiff relies as tending to prove a promise to himself by the defendant to pay the note, it is sufficient to say that, it not being shown that the plaintiff, in consideration of or reliance upon such a promise, either agreed to forbear or actually forbore to sue, there was no consideration for the promise, and no ground for giving it effect as an estoppel.

Judgment affirmed.

WILLIAM F. GRAHAM AND AMELIA TERESA RAYMOND, Appts. [161]

v.

BOSTON, HARTFORD AND ERIE RAILROAD COMPANY ET AL.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 161-180.)

Railroad corporation chartered by different States—meeting of stockholders may be held in any State—mortgage—legislative ratification of irregularities—foreclosure in a state court not reviewable in collateral proceeding—shareholders, parties to bankruptcy proceedings—laches.

1. A State may make a corporation of another State, as there organised and conducted, a corporation of its own, quoad any property within its territorial jurisdiction.

2. The Boston, Hartford and Erie Railroad Company, by acting upon the authority to purchase property conferred by the Act of the Legislature of New York of April 25, 1864, became a New York corporation by its then existing name.

3. Where a corporation is chartered by several States a meeting of its stockholders in one of them is valid in respect to its property in all.

4. The Boston, Hartford and Erie Railroad Company, although made up of distinct corporations, chartered by different States, was, in organization and action, and the practical management of its property, one corporation, having a capital stock which was a unit, one set of shareholders interested alike in all of its property, and one board of directors. In its relation to any State it was a separate corporation, governed by the laws of that State as to its property therein. It had a domicil in each State, and the corporators or shareholders could, in the absence of any statutory provision to the contrary, hold meetings and transact corporate business in any State so as to bind the Corporation in respect to its property everywhere.

5. If there were any irregularities in the proceedings of said Company in making the mortgage executed by it on March 19, 1886, they were ratified by the subsequent ratifications of such proceedings by the Legislatures of Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut and New York, which ratifications included, as a part of said proceedings the holding of the meeting of shareholders in New York.

6. The fact that some of the bonds may have been invalid did not affect the mortgage or the proceedings for its foreclosure.

7. The mortgage having been duly foreclosed in a state court, which had jurisdiction of the parties and subject matter, and the injured party having had opportunity to apply to the state court to reverse the decree of foreclosure, said decree cannot be reviewed in a collateral proceeding in a Circuit Court of the United States, upon the ground that it was obtained by fraud.

8. The complainant, and the shareholders whom he represents, form an integral part of the Corporation, and as such were parties to bankruptcy proceedings involving said Corporation. He is therefore bound by the decree entered in said proceedings, and cannot impeach it collaterally on the ground of fraud.

9. The bill was properly dismissed on demurrer on the ground of laches, as it was filed fourteen years after the making of the mortgage, ten years after the commencement of the bankruptcy proceedings, nine years after the entry of the decree of foreclosure, and seven years after the foreclosure became absolute and the road was conveyed to the new corporation.

Argued April 15, 16, 17, 1886. Decided May 10, 1886.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Eugene M. Johnson, Benj. F. Butler and Roger A. Pryor, for appellants:

The court erred in holding the Boston, Hartford and Erie Railroad Company to be a New York corporation.

The power to confer corporate franchises is vested exclusively in the Legislatures of the several States, and, as to the Territories and for the purposes of the Federal Goverement, in Congress.

Morawetz, Corp. § 4, and cases cited; Franklin Bridge Co. v. Wood, 14 Ga. 80; Pa. R. R. Co. v. Canal Comrs. 21 Pa. 9.

A railroad corporation cannot be created by implication.

Tenn. & A. R. R. Co. v. Adams, 3 Head, 596; Pa. R. R. Co. v. Canal Comrs. supra; Wright v. Briggs, 2 Hill, 77; Camden & A. R. R. & Trans. Co. v. Briggs, 22 N. J. L. 623.

Unless the Boston, Hartford and Erie Railroad Company be a corporation, chartered and incorporated by an Act of the Legislature of the State of New York, constituting it a body corporate in plain and unequivocal words, it has no corporate existence in that State.

Wood, Railways, § 6; Morawetz, Corp. § 10.

The New York Legislature, having created the New York corporations, had clearly the power, in a proper case, to authorize them to sell their property and franchises to a foreign corporation, and it likewise had the right to license such foreign corporation to acquire and take title to the property, and to use and enjoy it in a lawful manner. This we submit was the intent and effect of the Act of April 25, 1884.

There is nothing in the Act from which it is fair to infer that the Legislature knew it was creating a new corporation by the Act, or meant to create a new corporation, or ever even thought of the possibility of creating thereby a new body corporate. The idea that any such thing was accomplished by this Act should be dismissed.

R. Co. v Whitton, 13 Wall. 270, 284 (80 U. S. bk. 20, L. ed. 571); Hart v. Boston, H. & E. R. R. Co. 40 Conn. 524; Covington v. C. & C. Bridge Co. 10 Bush, 69; Baltimore & O. R. R. Co. v. Cary, 28 Ohio St. 208; Erie R. Co. v. Stringer, 32 Ohio St. 468; State v. Delaware L. & W. R. Co. 30 N. J. L. 473; Pierce, Railways, 17.

If this Corporation has been recognized in any manner by the Legislature of New York, it has been recognized only as a Connecticut corporation, for such it is. Corporations are created, not by recognition, but by plain words, manifesting positive intent to create.

The court erred in holding that the pretended meeting of the shareholders of the Boston, Hartford and Erie Railroad Company, on March 14, 1866, in the City of New York, was lawful and regular, and the proceedings at that meeting valid and binding upon the Company.

Miller v. Ewer, 27 Me. 509; Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 13 Pet. 519; (38 U. S. bk. 10, L. ed. 274); Freeman v. Machias Water Power & Mill Co. 38 Me. 343; Aspinwall v. Ohio & M. R. R. Co. 20 Ind. 492; Camp v. Byrne, 41 Mo. 525; Heath v. Silverthorn Lead M. & S. Co. 39 Wis. 146; Bellows v. Todd, 39 Iowa, 209; Ohio & M. R. R. Co. v. McPherson, 35 Mo. 13; Mitchell v. Vermont Copper Min. Co. 40 N. Y. Super. Ct. 406; Farnum v. Blackstone Canal Corp. 1 Sumn. 46; Day v. Newark India R. Mfg. Co. 1 Blatchf. 628; Taylor, Corp. § 382; Morawetz, Corp. § 363; Ang. & Ames, Corp. § 448; Potter, Corp. § 356–359; Wood, Railways, § 189.

The mortgage of March 19, 1866, is void, and in no way effectual to bind the Company. 1. Because the pretended meeting of the shareholders in the City of New York, at which th mortgage is pretended to have been authorized, was an unlawful meeting and its proceedings wholly void. 2. Because, even upon the theory that the meeting in New York was lawful and regular, no mortgage was authorized at that meeting, nor have the shareholders at any subsequent meeting ever pretended to authorize it. 3. Because the whole transaction from beginning to end was ultra vires.

No amount of legislative ratification is sufficient to make a contract, or to make an act which is absolutely void, valid and effectual.

Thompson v. Lee County, 3 Wall. 327 (70 U. S. bk. 18, L. ed. 177).

If these legislative ratifications be operative and effectual, their effect will be to bind parties by a contract they never made, and then to forfeit their property for nonfulfillment of that contract.

Barnes v. Town of Lacon, 84 Ill. 461; People v. Batchellor, 53 N. Y. 128.

The court erred in holding that the proceedings and decree in the Ellis suit in the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts was valid and regular, and binding upon these appellants, and the decree of foreclosure a bar to this suit.

A suit against the corporation is not a suit against an individual incorporator, and such incorporator is, in no proper view, a party to such a suit. The property of the corporation is not the property of the shareholder.

Morgan v. N. O. M. & C. R. R. Co. 1 Woods, 15.

Nor is the stock which is the property of the shareholder in any way the property of the corporation.

People v. Comrs. etc. 23 N. Y. 220.

It is even sometimes said that no trust relation subsists between stockholder and corporation.

Hodges v. New England Screw Co. 1 R. I. 350; Ang. & Ames, Corp. § 313.

A stockholder is not a creditor of the corporation.

Verplanck v. Merc. Ins. Co. 1 Edw. Ch. 84.

The suit was a mere collusion. There was no such genuine controversy as to give a court jurisdiction. The judgment was therefore null and void upon challenge, and of no effect to bind any stockholder not a party to the fraud. In such a case and by such a pretended litigation we are not bound.

Fletcher v. Peck, 6 Cranch, 87 (10 U. S. bk. 3, L. ed. 162); Lord v. Veazie, 8 How. 251 (49 U. S. bk. 12, L. ed. 1067); Cleveland v. Chamberlain, 1 Black, 419 (66 U. S. bk. 17, L. ed. 93); Wood-Paper Co. v. Heft, 8 Wall. 333 (75 U. S. bk. 19, L. ed. 378); Cf. Hoskins v. Lord Berkeley, 4 T. R. 402; Re R. J. Elsam, 3 Barn. & C. 597.

The judgment of any court may be impeached by strangers to it for fraud or collusion.

Laches, in such a case as this, will be understood to mean unreasonable delay in seeking to enforce a right in equity. What shall constitute, in any given case, such unreasonable delay as to raise the presumption of laches is to be resolved by the sound discretion of the court.

Lapse of time will not bar a continuing and subsisting trust, such as that subsisting between directors and officers and the corporation. In such case the statutes of limitation are inapplicable.

If the mortgage of March 19, 1866, was in fraud of our rights; if the bonds secured by that mortgage were converted, and the proceeds not honestly expended—every dollar thereof—in paying the debts of the Corporation, and in increasing the value of the corporate property; if the proceedings taken to foreclose the mortgage in the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts were collusive and fraudulent; if the bankruptcy proceedings in the District Court of Massachusetts were fraudulent and without jurisdiction; if by this mortgage and those proceedings, we have been injured substantially in our property rights, and if we have commenced our suit within a reasonable time, under the circumstances, seeking redress in a court of chancery, in a regular and proper manner, we respectfully urge that we are entitled to such relief as a court of equity can give, and that the court below erred fatally in refusing even to hear us.

Messrs. William Caleb Loring and William G. Russell, for the New York and New England Railroad Company, and others, appellees:

Apart from the allegations of fraud, it is clear that the decree in the Ellis suit is a bar.

The invalidity of the mortgage, or the fact that there was no breach of the condition, might have been set up in defense of the suit, and therefore are concluded by the decrees of foreclosure made therein.

The stockholders are barred by that decree equally with the Corporation.

If the plaintiffs wish to attack the decree of foreclosure for fraud, they should intervene in the Ellis suit, which is still open in the state court, show the fraud, and have the decree vacated; as was done in Thomas v. Brownville Ft. K. & Pac. R. R. Co. 109 U. S. 522 (Bk. 27, L. ed. 1018).

As the plaintiffs can have the decree vacated, they cannot attack the decree collaterally.

The Boston, Hartford and Erie Railroad Company was a New York corporation.

Clark v. Barnard, 108 U. S. 436 (Bk. 27, L. ed. 780).

The mortgage was valid, because the meeting of the stockholders in New York was legalized, and the mortgage was ratified by the Legislatures of Massachusetts, Connecticut, Rhode Island and New York, before the mortgage deed was recorded, or any bonds were issued under it.

Subsequent ratification is equivalent to an original authority.

Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court: [163]

This is a bill in equity, filed in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts, on the 8th of July, 1880, by William F. Graham, an alien, the owner of 500 shares of the capital stock of the Boston, Hartford and Erie Railroad Company, on behalf not only of himself, but of every stockholder and creditor of the Company who may join in the suit and contribute to its expense, to set aside as invalid a mortgage given by the Company dated March 19, 1866, covering its railroad, franchises and property, existing and future, to Robert H. Berdell, Dudley S. Gregory and John C. Bancroft Davis, as trustees, to secure the payment of an issue of bonds of the Company to the amount of $20,000,000. The defendants are that Company and its assignees in bankruptcy, the New York and New England Railroad Company, which is in possession of and operating the railroad, certain persons now living, and the personal representatives of others now deceased, who have at different times acted as trustees under the mortgage, the treasurer and receiver general of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, George Ellis, Frederick A. Lane, and William C. Eayrs.

Afterwards Amelia T. Raymond, a holder of 100 shares, and two other shareholders, were admitted as coplaintiffs. Four separate demurrers to the bill were filed, one of them being by the assignees in bankruptcy, and another by the New York and New England Railroad Company. They set forth, as grounds of demurrer, among other things, want of equity and laches. The case was heard on the demurrers, and in January, 1883, a decision was rendered (14 Fed. Rep. 753) dismissing the bill, on which a decree to that effect was entered, from which Graham and Raymond have appealed.

The mortgage covered all the property of the Company in Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut and New York. In December, 1865, there remained to be built, of the projected line of the road, 74 miles between Waterbury, Connecticut, and Fishkill, New York, and 26 miles in Connecticut, between Willimantic and Mechanicsville. The aggregate amount of liens, at that time, on the property and franchises owned or leased by the Company, and which were prior liens to the $20,000,000 mortgage (which will be called the Berdell mortgage), was $9,904,650. The object of making the Berdell mortgage was to retire this prior lien debt, and complete and equip the road from Boston to Fishkill. [164]

In January, 1870, default was made in paying the six months' interest which then fell due on the mortgage. Soon thereafter the Company's property was taken on legal process in several suits.

In July, 1870, George Ellis and two other persons filed a bill in equity, in the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, to foreclose the mortgage. Receivers were appointed, who took possession of the road August 2, 1870.

In October, 1870, an involuntary petition in bankruptcy was filed against the Company in the District Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts, on which an adjudication was made March 2, 1871. Assignees were appointed, who, after the foreclosure was perfected, released to the trustees under the mortgage all the rights of the Company in the mortgaged property.

On the 9th of May, 1871, a decree was made in the Ellis suit, providing for the delivery of the mortgaged property by the receivers to the trustees; for the filing by the latter, in the office of the Secretaries of State of Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut and New York, of a notice that they had taken possession of the property for default in the payment of interest on the bonds, "and with their purpose" to foreclose the mortgage for such default; and for the vesting of the property absolutely and in fee in the trustees, if default in the performance of the condition of the mortgage should continue for eighteen months after the notice should be filed, in which case all equity of redemption of the mortgagor should be barred.

In September, 1871, the trustees entered and took possession for foreclosure and filed the notices so provided for. [165] The notices were of the character mentioned in the mortgage, which provided that, if a default in paying principal or interest should continue for eighteen months after the filing of the notices, the property should vest in fee in the trustees without further process of law, and all equity of redemption of the mortgagor should be barred.

The foreclosure having been perfected, the trustees, pursuant to a decree made in June, 1875, in the Ellis suit, conveyed the mortgaged premises and franchises to the New York and New England Railroad Company, a corporation organized by the former bondholders, and delivered to it the property.

The first ground alleged in the bill for declaring the mortgage invalid is that it was authorized and made at a meeting of the shareholders of the Company held in the City of New York; that it was not a corporation of New York, but was a corporation of Connecticut, Massachusetts and Rhode Island; and that, therefore, the meeting was illegal and the mortgage void. The circuit court held that the corporation was a New York corporation; that the meeting was lawfully held; and that its proceedings were valid and binding on the Company.

In the mortgage the Company is described as "a corporation existing under the laws of the States of New York, Connecticut, Rhode Island and Massachusetts." The mortgage recites that "the shareholders of the Boston, Hartford and Erie Railroad Company, at a meeting duly and lawfully called and held at the City of New York, on the fourteenth day of March, A. D. 1866, voted to authorize the directors to make application to the several Legislatures of the States in which the chartered rights of the road exist, for authority to make a mortgage upon the whole or any portion of the line of the road, and to create, issue and dispose of, at the best rates that can be obtained, their convertible bonds, payable in the City of New York, on the first day of July, A. D. 1900, for one thousand dollars each, not to exceed the amount of twenty millions of dollars in all," with authority to the directors to make a portion of the bonds payable in London, "interest payable semi-annually on the first days of January and July in each year, at the rate of 7 per cent per annum, interest and principal to be payable at such places in the City of New York or in London as the directors may [16 authorize; and the particular form of bonds, interest warrants thereon, and mortgage, to be left entirely at the discretion of the board of directors; the said bonds to be issued for the purpose of providing for and retiring all the existing mortgage debt and prior liens upon the line of the road of the party of the first part, and for the purpose of completing and equipping their road;" that "the said board of directors, at a meeting duly convened and held in the City of New York on the nineteenth day of March, 1866, voted to authorize the creation and issue of the first mortage bonds of said Company, in the following form" (a form of a bond is here inserted); and that "the said directors, at their said meeting, further voted to empower bonds of said form * * * hereafter to be issued, and to be secured under the mortgage, * * * but not in a greater principal sum than twenty millions of dollars in all; * * * and further, at the same time, voted to secure the entire issue of said bonds by the execution of a mortgage in the form of these presents." It then conveys to the trustees named the railroad of the Company, commencing at the foot of Summer Street in Boston, and thence extending through the States of Massachusetts, Connecticut, Rhode Island and New York, to the western terminus of its location on the east bank of the Hudson River, at Fishkill, together with all the privileges, franchises and property then owned or thereafter to be acquired by the Company.

On the 25th of April, 1864, an Act had been passed by the Legislature of New York, Laws of N.Y. 1864, chap. 385, p. 884, entitled "An Act to Consolidate the Boston, Hartford and Erie, the Boston, Hartford and Erie Extension, and the Boston, Hartford and Erie Ferry Extension Railroad Companies." It provided as follows: "The Boston, Hartford and Erie Extension Railroad Company, and the Boston, Hartford and Erie Ferry Extension Railroad Company may both, or either, sell and convey to the Boston, Hartford and Erie Railroad Company the franchise and property of said several corporations, upon such terms as may be mutually agreed upon; and whenever certificates, under oath, of said Boston, Hartford and Erie Railroad Company, and a like [1 certificate, under oath, of the other contracting corporation, shall be lodged in the office of the Secretary of State, showing such sale and conveyance, and containing a full description of the rights and property conveyed, then, and in such case, such sale and conveyance shall be effectual in law to pass title to the franchise and property sold, conveyed and described in such certificate, without other or further registry of the instrument of conveyance. And on the leaving of such certificate as above provided, the Secretary of State shall file and record the same, and said Boston, Hartford and Erie Railroad Company shall become possessed of the rights of charter and property sold, conveyed and described in said certificates, and may have, hold and use the same in their own name and right as a portion of their railway line and property, and have all the rights the corporation making sale and conveyance had, at the time of such conveyance, to construct and operate a railway within the terminal points designated in the charter of the company making the conveyance, and subject to the laws of this State, passed or that may be passed, concerning railroad corporations."

This Act professes, in its title, to be an Act to consolidate the three companies. It authorizes the sale to the Boston, Hartford and Erie Company of the franchises and property of the other two corporations (which were New York corporations), and provides that such sale shall pass the title to such franchises and property, and that the purchasing Company shall thereby "become possessed of the rights of charter and property sold," and thereafter have, hold and use the same in its "own name and right."

As a purchaser of what this Act authorized to be sold to it, the Company purchasing became a New York corporation, by its then existing name. The case is directly within the ruling of this court in Clark v. Barnard, 108 U. S. 436, 448 [Bk. 27, L. ed. 780]. There this same Company had, as a Connecticut corporation, purchased the franchises and railroad of the Hartford, Providence and Fishkill Railroad Company, a consolidated corporation under the laws of Connecticut and Rhode Island. Afterwards the Legislature of Rhode Island ratified [168] the sale, so far as the railroad was situated in Rhode Island, by an Act which proceeded to declare that the "said Boston, Hartford and Erie Railroad Company, by that name, shall and may have, use, exercise and enjoy all the rights, privileges, and powers heretofore granted and belonging to said Hartford, Providence and Fishkill Railroad Company, and be subject to all the duties and liabilities imposed upon the same by its charter and the general laws of this State." On this state of facts, this court said: "The Hartford, Providence and Fishkill Railroad Company was, without question, so far as it owned and operated a railroad within the State of Rhode Island, a corporation in and of that State; and the Boston, Hartford and Erie Railroad Company became its legal successor in that State, as owner of its property, and exercising its franchises therein, and became, therefore, in respect to its railroad in Rhode Island, a corporation in and of that State," and the case of Railroad Co. v. Harris, 12 Wall. 65, 82 [78 U. S. bk. 20, L. ed. 354, 358], and other cases in this court were cited, to the effect that one State may make a corporation of another State, as there organized and conducted, a corporation of its own, quoad any property within its territorial jurisdiction.

That this Statute of New York was acted upon and availed of by the Boston, Hartford and Erie Company sufficiently appears from the bill. It is not pretended there was any other charter to the Company from the State of New York when the mortgage was made. The ratification of the mortgage by the Legislature of New York, hereafter mentioned, the recording of the mortgage and of the resignations and appointments of trustees, in counties in New York, and the recognition, by a Statute of New York, passed May 21, 1873, Laws of N. Y. 1873, chap. 550, p. 861, of the New York and New England Company as the successor, as a corporation, through the mortgage, of the mortgagor Company sufficiently show that the New York interest came through the New York Act of April 25, 1864. See also, Re Boston, Hartford and Erie R. R. Co. 9 Blatchf. 409, 415.

That a meeting in one of several States of the stockholders of a corporation chartered by all those States is valid in respect to the property [169] of the corporation in all of them, without the necessity of a repetition of the meeting in any other of those States, is, we think, a sound proposition. Whether it be or be not true that proceedings of persons professing to act as corporators, when assembled without the bounds of the sovereignty granting the charter, are void (Miller v. Ewer, 27 Me. 509), there is no principle which requires that the corporators of this consolidated Corporation should meet in more than one of the States in which it has a domicil, in order to the validity of a corporate act.

It appears by the bill that the mortgagor Corporation was chartered by its name, by the Legislature of Connecticut, at its May session, 1863; that thereafter Acts were passed by the Legislatures of Massachusetts and Rhode Island, making it a corporation of those States; that, in August, 1863, the Southern Midland Railroad Company, having previously acquired all the franchises and property of the Boston and New York Central Railroad Company, a corporation chartered under the laws of Massachusetts, Connecticut and New York, conveyed all its franchises and property to the Boston, Hartford and Erie Company; and that, in November, 1863, the latter Company, under authority contained in Acts of the Legislatures of all four of the States, acquired the franchises and property of the Hartford, Providence and Fishkill Railroad Company, a corporation created under the laws of New York, Rhode Island and Connecticut.

The Boston, Hartford and Erie Company, therefore, though made up of distinct corporations, chartered by the Legislatures of different States, had a capital stock which was a unit, and only one set of shareholders, who had an interest, by virtue of their ownership of shares of such stock, in all of its property everywhere. In its organization and action, and the practical management of its property, it was one corporation, having one board of directors, though, in its relations to any State, it was a separate corporation, governed by the laws of that State as to its property therein. It, therefore, had a domicil in each State, and the corporators or shareholders could, in the absence of any statutory provision to the contrary, hold meetings and transact corporate business in any one [170] State, so as to bind the Corporation in respect to its property everywhere. Covington & Cin. Bridge Co. v. Mayer, 31 Ohio St. 817; Pierce, Railroads, 20.

In addition to this, the Legislatures of Rhode Island, New York, Massachusetts and Connecticut, by Acts passed after the mortgage was made, expressly ratified and confirmed the proceedings of the Company in making it, each Act being substantially in these words: "The proceedings of the Boston, Hartford and Erie Railroad Company, whereby, by indenture dated March 19, 1866, they conveyed their railroad and property in mortgage to Robert H.

Berdell, Dudley S. Gregory, and John C. Bancroft Davis, trustees of the bondholders in said mortgage mentioned, to secure the holders of said bonds the payment of the same, are hereby ratified and confirmed." Private Acts of R. I. Jan. Sess. 1866, p. 294; Laws of N. Y. 1866, chap. 789; Laws of Mass. 1866, chap. 142; Private Acts of Conn. May Sess. 1866, p. 169. These Acts ratified "the proceedings" of the Company, whereby the mortgage was made. As the mortgage states on its face that the meeting of the shareholders at which they voted to authorize the directors to apply for legislative authority to make the mortgage was "duly and lawfully called and held at the City of New York," the holding of the meeting there was ratified as a part of the proceedings.

The irregularity, if any, was one which the Legislatures of the four States could rectify, as they did, because all of them, acting together for the one purpose, could have authorized in advance the holding of the meeting at New York. Grenada Co. v. Brogden, 112 U. S. 261 [Bk. 28, L. ed. 704]; Anderson v. Santa Anna, 116 U. S. 356 [Bk. 29, L. ed. 633]; Shaw v. Norfolk Co. R. R. Co. 5 Gray, 162; Howe v. Freeman, 14 Gray, 566.

It is urged by the appellants, that it appears, from the mortgage, that the vote at the meeting was merely one to authorize the directors to apply to the several Legislatures for authority to make a mortgage; that five days after the vote the mortgage was executed; that the shareholders never voted to authorize the making of a mortgage; and that, therefore, the [171] mortgage was invalid. The sufficient answer to this contention is that the terms of the vote, as recited in the mortgage, are adequate to confer authority on the directors, acting for the Company, to make the mortgage, after the Legislatures should have granted authority to make it; and that the subsequent ratification by the Legislatures is equivalent to previous authority. The terms of the mortgage are specified in detail in the vote, the mortgage conforms to them, and the vote is to be construed as covering authority from the shareholders to make the mortgage, if legislative authority should be given. It sufficiently appears that the four confirmatory Acts were passed before the mortgage was recorded anywhere, and before any bonds secured by it were issued.

Moreover, the mortgage has been ratified by Acts of the Legislatures of the four States confirming the organization of the New York and New England Railroad Company, as successor, through the mortgage, of the Boston, Hartford and Erie Company. The Acts of Massachusetts and Connecticut are substantially in these terms: "The proceedings of the holders of the bonds secured by mortgage, dated March 19, 1866, from the Boston, Hartford and Erie Railroad Company to Robert H. Berdell and others, whereby they have formed a corporation under the name of the New York and New England Railroad Company, are ratified and confirmed." Laws of Mass. 1873, chap. 289; Special Acts of Conn. May Sess. 1873, p. 8. The Act of Rhode Island is in these terms: "The New York and New England Railroad Company, being a corporation formed under the provisions of a mortgage made by the Boston, Hartford and Erie Railroad Company to Robert H. Berdell and others, trustees, and ratified and confirmed by the General Assembly at the January session, 1866, is hereby recognized and declared to be a corporation invested with all the powers, privileges and franchises, and subject to all the duties, liabilities and restrictions of said Boston, Hartford and Erie Railroad Company, as is provided in said mortgage, and the proceedings of the holders of the bonds secured by said mortgage, whereby they have formed said corporation, are hereby ratified and confirmed." Private Acts of R. I. May Sess. 1873, p. 13. [172] The Act of New York extends for two years the time for the completion of the Boston, Hartford and Erie Railroad, and then says: "The benefit of this extension of time shall vest in the New York and New England Railroad Company, a corporation formed under the provisions of the mortgage ratified and confirmed by chapter 789 of the laws of 1866. Laws of N. Y. 1873, chap. 550.

It is also contended by the appellants, that the mortgage was void for fraud. The bill contains these allegations: "And your orator is informed and believes, and therefore avers, that said meeting was held in the State of New York, beyond the States in which said Corporation was created, so that as few stockholders as possible, because of the distance from their homes, might attend said meeting, in order that the stockholders present, representing or acting in the interest of the Erie Railway, might, by authorizing a mortgage of its franchises, raise a large sum of money, a portion of which should afterwards be diverted to the use of said Erie Railway; which was done, as is hereinafter fully set forth, to the extent of five millions of dollars. And your orator claims that by reason of the meeting being so held for the purposes aforesaid, and in the place aforesaid, said meeting was illegal, and all its acts and doings were null and void." "And your orator, upon information and belief, further avers, that on or about October in the year 1867, said Eldridge, then being the president of the Boston, Hartford and Erie Railroad, and also president of the Erie Railway, and while said Davis and Gregory were trustees as aforesaid, and said Davis being the legal counsel and adviser of said Erie Railway, said parties colluded and agreed together as such trustees, and the president of said Boston, Hartford and Erie Railroad, and as well of the Erie Railway, of which the majority of said trustees were counsel and president, and sold five millions of said bonds at a discount of 20 per cent, receiving therefor the promises to pay at future dates, the exact dates of which your orator is ignorant, but which will appear upon the books of said railroad, which were afterwards discounted at [173] great loss and cost to said Boston, Hartford and Erie Railroad, in order to convert the same into cash, and the money obtained thereon was not used in equipping and finishing said road, nor in taking up the underlying liens on said road, but was used in paying the losses that said officers of said Boston, Hartford and Erie Railroad had made in speculations in stocks in the name of said road. And your orator, upon information and belief, further avers, that said Erie Railway guarantied the payment of the interest on the $5,000,000 of Berdell bonds, and sold and disposed of the same in buying certain property for said Erie Railway at ninety cents on the dollar for said bonds; and that this whole transaction was made for the benefit of said Erie Railway, in accordance with a contract made between the officers of the two roads, the said officers that made and concluded said transactions and contract being substantially one and the same persons."

The substance of these allegations is that the persons who acted in the interest of the Erie Railway Company intended, by means of the mortgage, to raise money which should be diverted to the use of that company. But it is not alleged that the price of 80 per cent was not the full value of the $5,000,000 of bonds; and the guaranty by the Erie Railway Company of the payment of the interest on those bonds, may very well have enhanced their value by 10 per cent. The diversion of the proceeds of the 80 per cent by the officers of the Boston, Hartford and Erie Company to pay for losses by them in speculations in stocks is something which—as regards that Company and its rights, which alone the appellants are seeking to enforce—cannot affect the rights of the ultimate purchasers of the $5,000,000 of bonds, represented now by the New York and New England Company.

Of the $20,000,000 of bonds, the $7,404,650 used in retiring underlying mortgage bonds, and the $275,350 used in completing or equipping the road, being, in all, $7,680,000, were clearly valid. As to the $2,500,000 of bonds, which were, by the terms of the mortgage, to be applied to the retirement of underlying liens, and were apparently issued to the State of Massachusetts in exchange for a loan of its scrip, that State, taking the bonds with notice [174] of the diversion, might have been liable, as a constructive trustee, to the holders of such underlying liens, for the proper application of the bonds, but certainly owned them as against all the world but such cestuis que trust; and it would seem that the proceeds of the bonds were used in completing and equipping the road. As to the $4,819,000 alleged to have been stolen by Eldridge there is nothing to show that they had not come to be held by bona fide holders.

Some of the bonds being valid, the mortgage was valid as to them, though there may have been some invalid bonds. In the Ellis foreclosure suit, the fact that some of the bonds may have been invalid was of no importance unless and until the mortgagor offered to redeem the valid bonds. The holders of the invalid bonds could not share in the benefits of the foreclosure, and the holders of the valid bonds would see that that rule was observed in the foreclosure suit. The agreement of facts on which the Ellis suit was heard states that all of the 20,000 bonds but one were issued, and that the same were, at that time, "wholly or in great part owned by bona fide holders thereof."

It is contended by the appellants that they were not parties to the Ellis foreclosure suit; that it was a collusive suit, without any real controversy; that it is still pending; and that the proceedings and decree in it are not binding on the appellants.

There are provisions in the Bardell mortgage that, in case of default by the Company in the payment of either principal or interest of the bonds, the Company shall deliver possession of the mortgaged premises to the trustees; that, on taking possession, the trustees shall file in the office of the Secretaries of State of the States of Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut and New York, a written notice that they have taken possession of the mortgaged property, franchises, and estate, for default in the payment of principal or interest, or both, as the same may be, and of their purpose to foreclose the mortgage for the default; that, if the default shall continue for eighteen months after such notice shall be filed, the whole of the mortgaged premises and franchises shall vest absolutely and in fee in the trustees, and all the right or equity of redemption of the Company therein shall be forever barred and [175] foreclosed; that, in case of an absolute foreclosure, it shall be the duty of the trustees to call a meeting of the bondholders, by an advertisement of the time and place and object thereof, in newspapers published in Boston, Providence, Hartford, New York City and London, at which meeting the bondholders may organize themselves into a corporation, with a corporate name to be selected by them, and a capital stock equal to such outstanding mortgage debt, which new corporation shall have all the powers, privileges and franchises, and be subject to all the duties, liabilities and restrictions of the old Company, and shall consist of the holders of the mortgage bonds, at a prescribed rate; and that the trustees shall convey to the new corporation all the mortgaged property and franchises. The mortgage also contains provisions for the filling of vacancies in case of the death, resignation or removal of any of the trustees, and for the vesting of all the mortgaged property in the persons so appointed.

The following facts appear from the bill in this suit, and from a copy of proceedings in the Ellis suit, made a part of it: On the 15th of July, 1870, George Ellis and others filed their bill of complaint in the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, sitting in equity, in behalf of themselves and all other holders of the mortgage bonds, representing that they were the owners of 47 of the bonds, and of the interest warrants thereon which had matured on the first days of January and July of that year and were unpaid, and praying for the appointment of a receiver and for the foreclosure of the mortgage. On the 2d of August, 1870, an order was entered in the cause appointing receivers and directing them to take possession of the road and property. On the 9th of May, 1871, a decree was entered in the cause, in which, after reciting that the court, on the 24th of April, 1871, had decided and decreed that Moses Kimball, Thomas Talbot and Avery Plumer were, in law, the present trustees under the mortgage, it was adjudged and decreed by the court, that the receivers deliver into the possession and control of these trustees, or their successors in office, all the roads, railways, property and franchises which they had [176] in their hands and possession, or under their management and control, as such receivers; that the trustees, or their successors in office, upon taking possession of the property, should file in the office of the Secretaries of State of the four States the notice authorized by the mortgage; and that, if default in the performance of the condition of the mortgage should continue for the space of eighteen months after the filing of such notice, the mortgaged premises and franchises should vest absolutely and in fee in the trustees and their successors, and all right or equity of redemption of the Company therein should be forever barred and foreclosed. By a decree entered July 28, 1871, William T. Hart, George T. Oliphant, and Charles P. Clark were declared by the court to be, by valid succession and appointment, trustees in place of Kimball, Talbot and Plumer, who had resigned, and their successors in the trusts. Under these decrees the trustees entered into possession of the mortgaged property, and on the 16th of September, 1871, filed in the office of the Secretaries of State of the four States the notices of foreclosure, and, the default still continuing, maintained their possession for a period of more than eighteen months thereafter. On the 18th of March, 1873, they called a meeting of the bondholders, as authorized in the mortgage, for the purpose of organizing themselves into a corporation. At this meeting, held in Boston on the 17th of April, 1873, a corporation was formed, under the name of the New York and New England Railroad Company. By the before mentioned Acts of the Legislature of the several States, the proceedings of the meeting were ratified and confirmed; and the new corporation has since been in possession of the road and franchises, under a conveyance from the trustees, so authorized. The bill contains an averment that the Ellis suit has never proceeded to a final determination and decree, and is still pending in court.

There is, in the bill, an alternative prayer, that, if the court shall not decree the mortgage to be invalid, it will establish and confirm the trusts under it, and remove the persons now administering the trusts, and appoint new trustees to take possession of the mortgaged property, and hold it, under the direction of the [177] court, for the benefit of the creditors and stockholders; and that an account be taken of the earnings of the road.

On the foregoing statement of the case the circuit court said, in its decision: "The case thus presented shows that prior to the filing of this bill, under a decree of a court of equity having jurisdiction of the parties and of the subject matter, the mortgage had been completely foreclosed. To avoid the effect of the foreclosure, the bill charges that the Ellis suit was the result of a fraudulent conspiracy on the part of Ellis, the plaintiff, Lane, the president of the Company, who represented it in its defense, and the receivers and trustees appointed by the court, entered into for the purpose of embarrassing the Company and depriving it of its road and property; and that this fraud was perpetrated by submitting to the court false statements of facts for its decision, and thus obtaining a decree against the Company. The bill does not allege in what particulars the statements of fact were false; nor does it allege that there was not a breach of the condition of the mortgage, nor that the plaintiffs were not the actual holders of the bonds and unpaid interest warrants, nor that any part of the interest which has accrued since 1869 has ever been paid; nor is there any offer or suggestion of redeeming the mortgage. There is no allegation that the new corporation, or any considerable number of the bondholders, had any knowledge of the alleged fraud. The obvious inquiry arises, at this stage of the case, why the plaintiff has not brought to the attention of the state court the fraud alleged to have been practiced upon it, and there sought to have the foreclosure decree revoked." "In Nougué v. Clapp, 101 U. S. 551 [Bk. 25, L. ed. 1026], it was held that a Circuit Court of the United States cannot reverse or set aside a final decree rendered by a state court which had complete jurisdiction of the parties and subject matter, upon the ground that the decree was obtained by fraud, where the injured party has had an opportunity to apply to the state court to reverse the decree. The plaintiff is a party to the foreclosure suit, as a shareholder in the old corporation. The state court is still open to listen to the complaint of the corporation and its shareholders. The decree of [178 foreclosure, though final in one sense, as determining the respective rights of the parties to the property in question, is still in its nature interlocutory, and is open to review by the court, upon petition or motion in the cause, or by bill of review for good cause shown. Story Eq. Pl. § 421, and note; Evans v. Bacon, 99 Mass. 213; Mass. P. S. chap. 151, § 12. The plaintiff has, therefore, an ample and complete remedy, for all his alleged grievances, in the state court, and there is no occasion for his application to this court for relief by bill in equity. The decree of foreclosure, therefore, now in full force and unrevoked, is a bar to this suit." These views, so well expressed, are conclusive of this branch of the case, and require nothing more to be said.

The mortgage being a valid mortgage, even if some of the bonds issued under it were invalid, and the right of redemption having passed to the assignees in bankruptcy, and been released by them to the New York and New England Company, and a demurrer having pointed that out, the bill was amended so as to allege that the bankruptcy proceedings were void for fraud. It is claimed that those proceedings were a part of the conspiracy of Ellis and Lane and others, to which Adams, the petitioning creditor in bankruptcy, became a party, to wreck the road; and that the petitioning creditors' debt was insufficient to give the bankruptcy court jurisdiction.

The circuit court, as to these matters, correctly held these propositions: An adjudication of bankruptcy, made by a district court having jurisdiction of the bankrupt, cannot be impeached collaterally by any person who was a party to the bankruptcy proceedings. Until vacated in the manner prescribed by the Bankruptcy Act, it is binding upon all the parties to it. The district court is always open for a reexamination of its decrees in an appropriate form. Any order made in the case may be set aside and vacated on proper showing made, due regard being had to rights which have become vested under it and will be disturbed by its revocation. The only remedy provided for the correction of errors made by the district court is to be found in the supervisory jurisdiction of the circuit court, under the statute, which is ex [179] clusive, and not reviewable in this court. In Lamp Chimney Co. v. Brass & Copper Co. 91 U. S. 656 [Bk. 23, L. ed. 336], it was held that a decree adjudging a corporation bankrupt is in the nature of a decree in rem, as respects the status of the corporation; and that, if the court rendering it has jurisdiction, it can only be assailed by a direct proceeding in a competent court, unless it appears that the decree is void in form, or that due notice of the petition was never given. No such defect appears in these proceedings. The district court had jurisdiction to make the decree, and it has never been vacated. The plaintiff and all the shareholders whom he represents form an integral part of the Corporation, and as such were parties to the bankruptcy proceedings. He is, therefore, bound by the decree, and cannot impeach it collaterally in this suit.

On the subject of laches, the circuit court said: "This bill was filed fourteen years after the making of the mortgage, ten years after the commencement of the bankruptcy proceedings, nine years after the entry of the foreclosure decree in the Ellis suit, and seven years after the foreclosure became absolute and the road was conveyed to the new corporation by the trustees. During all this time the records of the courts upon which appear all the proceedings by which the alleged fraud is claimed to have been consummated have been open to inspection and examination, and what has been done under them might have been known to the plaintiff if he had seen fit to make inquiry. In the meantime, it is apparent that many persons must have acquired rights in the stock of the new corporation, who were ignorant of the alleged frauds. Under such circumstances, to set aside this mortgage, to disregard the decree of foreclosure and the adjudication in bankruptcy, and to take the road out of the hands of the bondholders, who have received no interest on their bonds since 1869, and to place it in the hands of receivers for the benefit of the shareholders in the old Corporation, is a proposition so wild and preposterous as hardly to merit serious consideration." We concur fully in these views.

The grounds for dismissing the bill being adequate, we do not deem it necessary to say anything as to the frame of the bill, within the settled rules of equity jurisprudence, in a case [180] where a stockholder in a corporation seeks to enforce, in equity, a right of the corporation. Much might be said as to the defects of this bill, and we only allude to the point lest it might be inferred we regard the bill as properly framed under those rules.

Decree affirmed.

LAMONT DU PONT.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 223-228.)

Inspection of steam vessels—Revised Statutes—what boats are subject to inspection.

A small boat, propelled by steam, habitually carrying four persons and sometimes more, and capable of carrying twenty-five, is subject to inspection under title 52, §§ 4399 etc., R. S.

Submitted Apr. 19, 1886. Decided May 10, 1886.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania. Reversed.

The case is stated by the court.

Mr. Wm. A. Maury, Asst. Atty-Gen., for plaintiff in error.

No counsel appeared for defendant in error.

[224] Mr. Justice Woods delivered the opinion of the court.

This was an action at law brought by Du Pont, the defendant in error, against Hartranft, Collector of Customs, to recover $500, that sum being the amount of a penalty unlawfully exacted by Hartranft, as Collector, from Du Pont, as the latter alleged. The facts were as follows: The plaintiff resided in Wilmington, Delaware. He was the proprietor of certain powder works at Thompson's Point, upon the Delaware River, across from Chester, Pennsylvana, and distant about two miles. He owned a wooden boat called The Repauno, open except her forward part, which was boarded over. Her dimensions were as follows: length of water line, 37 feet; length of keel, 34 feet; width of beam, 8 feet; depth of hold, 3 feet 9 inches; draught of water, 2 feet 1 inch. She had a small engine and boiler, and was used by the plaintiff to transport himself and his superintendent across the Delaware River, between Thompson's Point and Chester. Occasionally the plaintiff used the boat to carry over his workmen, sometimes as many as nine or ten. When the water was smooth the boat could carry twenty-five persons. She never carried freight or passengers for hire. She had been inspected, but her papers had expired. When she was seized she was sailing without inspection papers. The plaintiff, to get possession of her again, paid to the defendant, under protest, a penalty of $500, and brought this suit to recover it back.

The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff for $500, based upon a finding of the foregoing facts, with point of law reserved, which was stated as follows:

"If the court should be of the opinion that a vessel of the size and description, and used as found by the jury, is liable to inspection under the Statutes of the United States, the verdict and judgment to be entered for the defendant non obstante veredicto; and if the court should be of the opinion that such a vessel is not liable to such inspection, then the judgment to be entered for the plaintiff on the verdict." Upon [225] this verdict the court rendered judgment for the plaintiff: whereupon, the defendant sued out this writ of error.

The defendant relies on the following provisions of title 52 of the Revised Statutes, "Regulation of Steam Vessels," to justify the exaction of the penalty:

Sec. 4399. "Every vessel propelled in whole or in part by steam shall be deemed a steam vessel within the meaning of this title."

Sec. 4400. "All steam vessels navigating any waters of the United States which are common highways of commerce, or open to general or competitive navigation, excepting public vessels of the United States, vessels of other countries, and boats propelled in whole or in part by steam for navigating canals, shall be subject to the provisions of this title."

Sec. 4418, which provides, among other things, that "The local inspectors shall also inspect the boilers of all steam vessels before the same shall be used, and once at least in every year thereafter."

Sec. 4421, which provides, in substance, that when the inspection of a steam vessel is completed, and she and her equipment are approved, a certificate of inspection, verified by the oaths of the inspectors, shall be issued.

Sec. 4426. "The hull and boilers of every ferry boat, canal boat, yacht, or other small craft of like character, propelled by steam, shall be inspected under the provisions of this title. Such other provisions of law for the better security of life, as may be applicable to such vessels, shall, by the regulations of the board of supervising inspectors, also be required to be complied with, before a certificate of inspection shall be granted; and no such vessel [226] shall be navigated without a licensed engineer and a licensed pilot."

The seizure in the present case was made under section 4499, which provides: "If any vessel propelled in whole or in part by steam be navigated without complying with the terms of this title, the owner shall be liable to the United States in a penalty of five hundred dollars for each offense, one half for the use of the informer, for which sum the vessel so navigated shall be liable, and may be seized and proceeded against by way of libel in any District Court of the United States having jurisdiction of the offense."

The Repauno was a vessel propelled by steam and navigating the Delaware River, which is a water of the United States, and a common highway of commerce. She was, therefore, by the terms of section 4400 of the Revised Statutes, made subject to the provisions of title 52. But, if there were any doubt about the application of the inspection laws to The Repauno, it would be removed by section 4426. It seems to us clear that The Repauno comes within the class of boats described in this section. Of course she bears no resemblance to a canal boat, but she only differs from a ferry boat, as it is generally understood, in not conveying passengers for hire; and she differs from a yacht in not being sea going, if, in fact, she is not sea going, and in not being designed and used for pleasure merely. But, if neither a ferry boat nor a yacht, she clearly falls within the meaning of the phrase "other small craft of like character." If such a boat, so constructed and used, is not included in that phrase, it would be difficult to name any that would be. If it is argued that The Repauno is not such a craft as Congress would require to carry a licensed engineer and a licensed pilot, the reply is that, as section 4426 makes this requirement of a canal boat propelled by steam, and subjects it to the other provisions of law for the better security of life, there is no reason why the same exactions should not be made of the boat in question.

The reason of the law applies to The Repauno. The purpose of title 52 is primarily the protection of the passengers and crew and property on vessels propelled by steam. The law was passed also to protect the lives and property of persons on other boats and at the wharves. The Repauno was of sufficient size to cause peril to life and property by an explosion of her boiler. She was not a skiff. She was not a mere toy incapable of doing harm. The plaintiff's superintendent, who daily, and his workmen, who occasionally, were carried back and forth upon her, and the pilot and engineer, who were required for her navigation, and the people in other boats who passed her on the water, or those who stood on the docks where she landed, were entitled to the same protection which the law provided against the [227] explosion of the boilers of larger craft. A boat propelled by steam, which habitually carries four persons and sometimes more, and is capable of carrying twenty-five, ought to be subject to inspection. The fact that, if her boiler should explode or her hull spring a leak, probably only four lives would be imperiled, does not occur to us as ground why she should be exempted from the provisions of the law requiring inspection of vessels propelled by steam.

In reaching this conclusion we have not overlooked the case of U. S. v. The Mollie, 2 Woods, 318. In that case the craft in question was of smaller dimensions than The Repauno, and was occasionally run by her owners for amusement on the Buffalo Bayou below Houston, Texas. She was held not to be within the inspection laws.

It may be difficult to draw the line between vessels propelled by steam which are so small and insignificant that they do not come within the inspection laws, and larger boats which do. But we are clearly of opinion that The Repauno belongs to the latter class, and that the penalty sued for in this case was lawfully enforced.

The judgment of the Circuit Court must, therefore, be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to grant a new trial; and it is so ordered.

Mr. Justice Bradley dissenting:

I cannot agree to the judgment in this case. It seems to me that it carries the application of the statute to an unreasonable length. The boat in question was a mere skiff, not larger than a ship's yawl, with a capacity not exceeding that of a good sized canoe, without deck, with a boiler not much larger than a tea-kettle, and a cylinder of seven inches stroke, and not much larger than a pop-gun. I think we are in danger of sticking in the bark by construing the statute as requiring such a vessel to be inspected. Indeed, it seems to me that the terms of the law do not apply to such a boat. Its language is, "every ferry boat, canal boat, yacht, or other small craft of like character," Section 4426. The same section declares that "No such vessel shall be navi-[228] gated without a licensed engineer and a licensed pilot." The boat in question is not of "like character," within the meaning of the statute. It seems absurd to require a man to have an inspection made of a mere skiff which he has rigged up to take him across the river to his shops, and to have a licensed engineer and licensed pilot to navigate it. With all due respect, I think it is running the application of the statute into the ground.

Jurisdiction—writ of error to Supreme Court of Utah—conviction under Act of 1882.

1. A review of the statutes shows that there was no statute in force at the time to which the Revised Statutes related which gives this court jurisdiction to review a decision of the Supreme Court of the Territory of Utah in a case arising under section 3 of the Act of March 22, 1882.

2. A statutory provision authorizing a writ of error from this court to the Supreme Court of Utah in cases of conviction of polygamy or bigamy does not authorize one in case of a conviction, under section 3 of the Act of 1882, for cohabiting with more than one woman.

3. Where the question is, whether or not there is an error in the administration of a statute, the case does not fall within the provision authorizing a writ of error "where is drawn in question the validity of a treaty or statute of, or an authority exercised under, the United States."

4. No test of money value can be applied to the deprivation of liberty, whether as punishment for crime or otherwise, to confer jurisdiction on this court.

Argued Apr. 23, 29, 1886. Decided May 10, 1886.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the Territory of Utah. Dismissed.

The case is stated by the court.

Messrs. George Ticknor Curtis and Franklin S. Richards, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. Wm. A. Maury, Asst. Atty-Gen., for defendant in error.

[347] Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court:

These are three writs of error to the Supreme Court of the Territory of Utah to review judgments of that court affirming judgments of the District Court of the First Judicial District of that Territory, rendered on convictions of the plaintiff in error on indictments founded on section 3 of the Act of March 22, 1882, 22 Stat. at L. 31, for cohabiting with more than one woman. Each of the judgments imposed imprisonment for six months and a fine of $300.

The question of the jurisdiction of this court over these writs of error presents itself at the threshold. It was not suggested by the counsel for the United States at the argument, nor referred to by the counsel for the plaintiff in error, for the reason, as the court has been advised by both parties since the argument, that a decision on the merits was desired; and for the further reason that this court, at the present term, in Cannon v. U. S. 116 U. S. 55 [Bk. 29, L. ed. 561], took cognizance of a writ of error in a like case. But the question has presented itself to the court, and, since the argument, we have been furnished with a brief, on the part of the plaintiff in error, in support of the jurisdiction.

Section 702 of the Revised Statutes provides as follows: "The final judgments and decrees of the supreme court of any Territory, except the Territory of Washington, in cases where the value of the matter in dispute, exclusive of costs, to be ascertained by the oath of either party, or of other competent witnesses, exceeds one thousand dollars, may be reviewed and reversed or affirmed in the supreme court, upon writ of error or appeal, in the same manner and under the same regulations as the final judgments and decrees of a circuit court. In the Territory of Washington, the value of the matter in dispute must exceed two thousand dollars, exclusive of costs. And any final judgment or decree of the Supreme Court of said Territory in any cause [when] the Constitution or a statute or treaty of the United States is brought in question may be reviewed in like manner."

So much of this section 702 as relates to the Territory of Utah was carried into the section from section 9 of the Act of September 9, 1850, establishing a territorial government for Utah (9 Stat. at L. 455), which provided that writs of error and appeals from the final decisions of the Supreme Court of the Territory should be allowed and might be taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, "where the value of the property or the amount in controversy, to be ascertained by the oath or affirmation of either party, or other competent witness," should exceed $1,000, except only that in all cases involving title to slaves, and on any writ of error or appeal on a habeas corpus involving the question of personal freedom, no regard should be had to value.

So much of section 702 as provides for the review of "any final judgment or decree" of the Supreme Court of the Territory of Washington "in any cause when the Constitution or a statute or treaty of the United States is brought in question," is taken from the Act of March 2, 1853, establishing a territorial government [348] for Washington (10 Stat. at L. 175), which—after providing that writs of error and appeals from the final decisions of the Supreme Court of the Territory should be allowed and might be taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, "where the value of the property, or the amount in controversy, to be ascertained by the oath or affirmation of either party, or other competent witness," should exceed $2,000—went on in these words which were not found in the prior Act of 1850 in regard to Utah: "and in all cases where the Constitution of the United States, or Acts of Congress, or a treaty of the United States, is brought in question."

It is plain that section 702, so far as Utah is concerned, does not cover the present cases, and that the provision in it in regard to cases where the Constitution, or an Act of Congress, or a treaty, is brought in question has reference only to Washington and not to Utah.

Section 1909 of the Revised Statutes provides that writs of error and appeals from the final decisions of the supreme court of any one of eight named Territories, of which Utah is one, "shall be allowed to the Supreme Court of the United States in the same manner and under the same regulations as from the Circuit Courts of the United States, where the value of the property, or the amount in controversy, to be ascertained by the oath of either party, or of other competent witnesses, exceeds one thousand dollars," except that a writ of error or appeal shall be allowed "upon writs of habeas corpus involving the question of personal freedom." This section does not cover the present cases.

Section 1911 relates exclusively to writs of error and appeals from Washington Territory, and contains a provision that they shall be allowed "in all cases where the Constitution of the United States, or a treaty thereof, or Acts of Congress, are brought in question." That provision exists only in regard to Washington, and is not found in section 1909 in regard to the eight other Territories.

Section 709 of the Revised Statutes applies only to a writ of error to review a final judgment or decree in a suit in the highest court of a State.

There being thus no statute in force on December 1, 1873, to which time the enactments in the Revised Statutes related, giving to this court jurisdiction of a writ of error to the Supreme Court of Utah in a case like those before us, an Act was passed on June 23, 1874, 18 Stat. at L. 253, entitled "An Act in Relation to Courts and Judicial Officers in the Territory of Utah," section 3 of which contained this provision: "A writ of error from the Supreme Court of the United States to the Supreme Court of the Territory shall lie in criminal cases, where the accused shall have been sentenced to capital punishment or convicted of bigamy or polygamy." The writ of error in Reynolds v. U. S. 98 U. S. 145 [Bk. 25, L. ed. 244], was brought under that statute, the conviction being for bigamy under section 5352 of the Revised Statutes. This section 5352 was taken from section 1 of the Act of July 1, 1862, 12 Stat. at L. 501, entitled "An Act to Punish and Prevent the Practice of Polygamy in the Territories of the United States and Other Places, and Disapproving and Annulling Certain Acts of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Utah;" which section 1 declares that every person having a husband or wife living, who shall marry any other person, whether married or single, in a Territory of the United States, shall, with certain exceptions, be adjudged guilty of bigamy. The Act then proceeds to disapprove and annul all Acts and parts of Acts theretofore passed by the Legislative Assembly of Utah, "which establish, support, maintain, shield or countenance polygamy," with the proviso that the Act should "not affect or interfere with the right 'to worship God according to the dictates of conscience,' but only to annul all Acts and laws which establish, maintain, protect, or countenance the practice of polygamy, evasively called spiritual marriage, however disguised by legal or ecclesiastical solemnities, sacraments, ceremonies, consecrations, or other contrivances." Hence, section 3 of the Act of 1874, in speaking of "bigamy or polygamy," referred to the crime denounced by section 1 of the Act of 1862, as carried into the Revised Statutes.

Then came the Act of March 22, 1882, 22 Stat. at L. 30, section 1 of which amended section 5352 of the Revised Statutes, the original and new sections 5352 (leaving out the exceptions) being as follows, the parts in each which differ from the other being in italic:

Original.	New.
"Every person having a husband or wife living, who marries another, whether married or single, in a Territory or other place over which the United States have exclusive jurisdiction, is guilty of bigamy, and shall be punished by a fine of not more than five hundred dollars, and by imprisonment for a term not more than five years."	"Every person who has a husband or wife living, who, in a Territory or other place over which the United States have exclusive jurisdiction, hereafter marries another, whether married or single, and any man who hereafter simultaneously, or on the same day, marries more than one woman, in a Territory or other place over which the United States have exclusive jurisdiction, is guilty of polygamy, and shall be punished by a fine of not more than five hundred dollars, and by imprisonment for a term of not more than five years."

Section 3 of the Act of 1882 is the one on which the indictments in these cases were founded. It is in these words: "If any male person, in a Territory or other place over which the United States have exclusive jurisdiction, hereafter cohabits with more than one woman, he shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not more than three hundred dollars, or by imprisonment for not more than six months, or by both said punishments in the discretion of the court." This section creates a new and distinct offense from bigamy or polygamy, one which is declared to be a misdemeanor (there having been and being no such declaration as to bigamy or polygamy), and the punishment for which is much less than the punishment for bigamy or polygamy. The Act of 1882 made no provision for any writ of error from this court in a case under section 3, while, by the then existing Act of July, 23, 1874, a writ of error could lie on a conviction of bigamy or polygamy. By no proper construction can the offense of cohabiting with more than one woman be regarded as identical with the offense of bigamy or polygamy. The Act of 1882, in sections 1, 2 and 5, classes bigamy or polygamy as a different offense from the offense of cohabiting with more than one woman; and we cannot regard a statutory provision for a writ of error on a conviction of bigamy or polygamy as authorizing one on a conviction, under section 3 of the Act of 1882, of cohabiting with more than one woman.

On the 3d of March, 1885, the following Act was passed, 23 Stat. at L. 443: "No appeal or writ of error shall hereafter be allowed from any judgment or decree in any suit at law or in equity in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, or in the supreme court of any of the Territories of the United States, unless the matter in dispute, exclusive of costs, shall exceed the sum of five thousand dollars." Sec. 2. "The preceding section shall not apply to any case wherein is involved the validity of any patent or copyright, or in which is drawn in question the validity of a treaty or statute of, or an authority exercised under, the United States; but in all such cases an appeal or writ of error may be brought without regard to the sum or value in dispute."

This Act is relied on by the plaintiff in error as covering the present cases. The first section of it applies solely to judgments or de-[352] crees in suits at law or in equity, measured by a pecuniary value. If the second section applies to a criminal case wherein "is drawn in question the validity of a" "statute of, or an authority exercised under, the United States," without regard to whether there is or is not any sum or value in dispute, the question still remains for consideration, whether, in the present cases, the validity of a statute of the United States, or the validity of an authority exercised under the United States, is drawn in question.

The peculiar language of section 2 is to be noted. In section 709 of the Revised Statutes, allowing a writ of error to review a final judgment or decree in any suit in the highest court of a State, in which a decision in the suit could be had, the language is, "where is drawn in question the validity of a treaty or statute of, or an authority exercised under, the United States, and the decision is against their validity." This language is taken from section 2 of the Act of February 5, 1867, 14 Stat. at L. 386, where it is reproduced verbatim from section 25 of the Judiciary Act of September 24, 1789, 1 Stat. at L. 85. In section 2 of the Act under consideration the words "and the decision is against their validity" are not found. In section 1911 of the Revised Statutes, in regard to Washington Territory, the language, adopted substantially from the Act of March 2, 1853, 10 Stat. at L. 175, is: "In all cases where the Constitution of the United States, or a treaty thereof, or Acts of Congress, are brought in question;" and is not limited to the case of a decision against the validity of the Act. Section 2 of the Act of 1885 applies not where merely an Act of Congress is brought in question, but only where the validity of a statute of the United States is drawn in question, or where the validity of an authority exercised under the United States is drawn in question: but this is not limited by the requirement that the decision shall have been against such validity.

In the present cases, the validity of a statute of the United States is not drawn in question. No such question is presented by the bills of exceptions, or the requests for instructions, or the exceptions to the charges, or anywhere else in the records. Nor is the validity of an authority exercised under the United States drawn [353] in question. The plaintiff in error contends that the construction of the Act of 1882 is drawn in question, and also the authority exercised under the United States Statute, by which he was tried and convicted; that the authority of the United States is invoked to deprive him of his liberty, in a court established by Congress and acting solely by federal power; and that the question is, whether the authority exercised by the court under the Act of 1882 is a valid authority, and within the scope of that Act, because the contention is that the court misconstrued the statute and acted beyond the authority which it conferred. The authority exercised by the court in the trial and conviction of the plaintiff in error is not such an "authority" as is intended by the Act. The validity of the existence of the court, and its jurisdiction over the crime named in the indictments, and over the person of the defendant, are not drawn in question. All that is drawn in question is whether there is or is not error in the administration of the statute. The contention of the plaintiff in error would allow a writ of error from this court in every criminal case in a Territory where the prosecution is based on a statute of the United States; and, indeed, might go still further, for the authority of every court sitting in a Territory is founded on a statute of the United States. From the fact that a given criminal case involves the construction of a statute of the United States, it does not follow that the validity of "an authority exercised under the United States" is drawn in question.

There is a decision of this court on this point, in Bethell v. Demaret, 10 Wall. 537 [77 U. S. bk. 19, L. ed. 1007]. The 25th section of the Judiciary Act of 1789, allowed a writ of error from this court to the highest court of a State, "where is drawn in question the validity of a statute of, or an authority exercised under, any State, on the ground of their being repugnant to the Constitution, treaties or laws of the United States, and the decision is in favor of such validity." The case referred to was a writ of error to the highest court of a State, and it was contended that that court, in rendering the decision complained of, acted under the authority of the State, and so there was drawn in question an authority exercised under the State, which, in the particular case, impaired the obligation of a contract, and was [354] repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, and the decision was in favor of the validity of such authority. To this view, this court, speaking by Mr. Justice Nelson, gave this answer: "The authority conferred on a court to hear and determine cases in a State is not the kind of authority referred to in the 25th section; otherwise, every judgment of the supreme court of a State would be re-examinable under the section."

In the recent case of Kurtz v. Moffitt, 115 U. S. 487, 498 [Bk. 29, L. ed. 458, 462], it was said by this court, speaking by Mr. Justice Gray, as the result of the examination of numerous cases which are there cited, that "A jurisdiction conferred by Congress upon any court of the United States, of suits at law or in equity, in which the matter in dispute exceeds the sum or value of a certain number of dollars, includes no case in which the right of neither party is capable of being valued in money." In each of the present cases the pecuniary value involved does not exceed $300, even if the fine could be called a "matter in dispute," within the statute. As to the deprivation of liberty, whether as a punishment for crime or otherwise, it is settled by a long course of decisions, cited and commented on in Kurtz v. Moffitt, ubi supra, that no test of money value can be applied to it, to confer jurisdiction.

We conclude, therefore, that we have no jurisdiction of these writs of error, and that they must be dismissed for that reason.

It is urged however, that this court took jurisdiction of the writ of error in Cannon v. U. S. 116 U. S. 55 [Bk. 29, L. ed. 561], and affirmed the judgment on a conviction under the same section 3 of the Act of 1882. The question of jurisdiction was not considered in fact in that case, nor alluded to in the decision, nor presented to the court by the counsel for the United States, nor referred to by either party at the argument or in the briefs. Probably both parties desired a decision on the merits. The question was overlooked by all the members of the court. But, as the case was decided at the present term, and the want of jurisdiction in it is clear, we have decided to vacate our judgment, and recall the mandate, and dismiss the writ of error for want of jurisdiction, in order that the reported decision may not appear to be a precedent for the exercise of jurisdiction by this court in a case of the kind.

These motions are denied. The additional affidavits which have been filed failed to satisfy us that the value of the matter in dispute is sufficient to give us jurisdiction. Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

This case was submitted under Rule 20, on the 7th of January last, but, on looking into the record, we found nothing from which it could fairly be inferred that the value of the matter in dispute exceeded $5,000, and, consequently, on the 19th of January, entered an order of dismissal, on our own motion, as it rested "on the plaintiffs in error to show our jurisdiction, either from the record or by affidavits," and this had not been done. The present motion was not filed until April 26, and we are not willing at this late day to receive and consider affidavits to supply a defect in the record which has existed since the case was docketed on the 11th of August, 1883, and of which the appellants have neglected to take any notice until the expiration of more than three months from the time the court acted upon it and entered an order of dismissal on that account. This is one of the class of cases in which the parties are required to act promptly, after they have actual notice of what is required of them, or they will not be heard.

The motion to reinstate is denied.

[321] ELISHA T. LORING AND CHARLES A. WELCH, Appts.

v.

CHARLES S. PALMER.

Trusts—Statutes of Michigan—sufficiency of evidence to establish trust—equitable jurisdiction—laches.

1. The Statute of Michigan provides that "Express trusts may be created for any or either of the following purposes: * * * For the beneficial interest of any person or persons, when such trust is fully expressed and clearly defined upon the face of the instrument creating it, subject to limitations as to time prescribed in this title." Without deciding whether under this statute it is necessary that an express trust be originally created by an instrument in writing sufficient in form, the court holds that, in any view of the statute, the correspondence, land contract and deed, shown in the record, between the same parties and relating to the same real estate, were sufficient to establish the trust claimed in the bill.

2. In Michigan, as well as in all States where the common law is in force, where a conveyance of land is made to two or more persons, and the instrument is silent as to the interest which each is to take, the presumption is that their interests are equal.

3. The evidence in the present case shows that the purchase in question was for the parties, individually, and not for a corporation in which they were interested.

4. Where the interest of the cestui que trust was not created by the deed to the trustee, but by the original contract of purchase, in connection with certain cotemporaneous correspondence, the legal title did not vest in the cestui que trust by virtue of the Statute of Michigan abolishing passive trusts, but he merely took an equitable title; and his remedy, if any, is in a court of equity, and not by ejectment.

5. The cestui que trust has not in the present case lost his rights by laches, the evidence showing that the delay was due to the fault and misstatements of the trustee.

Argued March 18, 19, 1886. Decided May 10, 1886.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Michigan. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. C. I. Walker, Joseph H. Choate and Sohier & Welch, for appellants:

The evidence was not sufficient to establish, under the Statute of Michigan, an express trust in Loring as to the lands in question, for the benefit of the complainant, to the extent of an undivided third or any other portion of the property.

Under the Statute of Michigan, there is no room to indulge in imagination or inference.

From first to last, it is to be borne in mind that if there was any trust in the present case, it was an express trust, and, as claimed by the complainant and found by the court below, must have arisen eo instanti upon the execution of the contract by Loring, when the title to the land was acquired by him.

Bispham, Eq. § 80; Mercer v. Stark, Sm. & M. Ch. (Miss.) 479, 488; Dunphy v. Ryan, 116 U. S. 491 (Bk. 29, L. ed. 703) Smith v. Burnham, 3 Sumn. 460.

If there is no trust created at the time of the agreement or purchase, it is well settled that no subsequent act, such as breach of contract, will create a trust.

Kellum v. Smith, 33 Pa. 158; Steere v. Steere, 5 Johns. Ch. 1; Olcott v. Bynum, 17 Wall. 44 (84 U. S. bk. 21, L. ed. 570).

An express trust must appear with "absolute certainty as to its nature and terms" before the court can undertake to execute it.

Steere v. Steere, supra; Dillaye v. Greenough, 45 N. Y. 438.

Not only must it be absolutely certain that there is a trust, but it must be just as certain what the trust is, what its nature is.

Slocum v. Marshall, 2 Wash. 397; 1 Perry, Trusts, § 88.

It is not sufficient to call a man a "trustee," or to create a trust in so many words. It must appear with certainty what the trust is, its nature, terms, etc.

Smith v. Matthews, 3 DeG. F. & J. 139; Dale v. Hamilton, 2 Phila. 266; Forster v. Hale, 3 Ves. 707; Dillaye v. Greenough, supra; Cook v. Barr, 44 N. Y. 156; Parkhurst v. Van Cortlandt, 1 Johns. Ch. 273.

The nature and terms of the trust must be clearly and explicitly expressed, and it must in writing clearly and unmistakably appear not only that there is a trust intended, but in whose behalf, for what purpose, and to what extent, as to the proportions of property covered by it. And it must be so clearly expressed that no other intention, no other party, no other terms, can, consistently with the language used, have been intended.

To this general rule is added the special provision of the Michigan Statute: that the trust must be created by the writings which fully express and clearly define it.

Measured by those requirements, the trust which is claimed, and which has been adjudged by the court below, cannot be read in the letters of Palmer of the 18th and 19th of June; assuming them to have been assented to by Loring and acted upon by him, in taking the contract in his own name as trustee, and assuming that he replied to the letters, that he approved of the purchase, and consented to join them therein.

The rule requiring the trust and all its features and details to be "fully expressed and clearly defined upon the face" of the writings, necessarily excludes the reception of or resort to parol testimony to add to the contents of the papers.

This is certainly true under the terms of the Michigan Statute; the trust must there appear "upon the face" of the instruments relied upon. It is equally true on general principles. No resort can be had to the acts of the parties or to parol evidence in general.

Cook v. Barr, supra; Shafter v. Huntington, 58 Mich. 310; Jacobs v. Miller, 50 Mich. 126; Ruth v. Oberbrunner, 40 Wis. 238; Hurst's Lessee v. McNeil, 1 Wash. 75; Sturtevant v. Sturtevant, 20 N. Y. 39; Rasdall v. Rasdall, 9 Wis. 379; 1 Perry, Trusts, § 85.

If the trust alleged and found by the court below could be read as a trust, fully expressed and clearly defined upon the face of the papers creating it, so as otherwise to satisfy the requirements of the fifth subdivision of section 5578 of the Statute of Uses and Trusts of Michigan, still, it would be a naked, passive trust and, as such, unauthorized under the provisions of that statute. Under such a trust no function or title would rest in the trustee; but the statute would have executed the trust immediately in the cestui que trust.

Riehl v. Bingenheimer, 28 Wis. 84; White v. Fitzgerald, 19 Wis. 480; Goodrich v. Milwaukee, 24 Wis. 422; Ruth v. Oberbrunner, 40 Wis. 263; Dodge v. Williams, 46 Wis. 100; Smith v. Ford, 48 Wis. 116.

It is held in Michigan that every passive trust is abolished; and that the statute executes in the beneficiary, immediately upon the conveyance, the legal title to the estate in which such trust is attempted to be created.

Ready v. Kearsley, 14 Mich. 215; Burdeno v. Amperse, 14 Mich. 97; Stevens v. Earles, 25 Mich. 44; Thompson v. Waters, 25 Mich. 214; M. E. Ch. of Newark v. Clark, 41 Mich. 739.

Even where a trust is created, in express terms, simply "to convey" to appointees or beneficiaries, it is held to be a passive trust, and the statute transfers the legal title immediately; no conveyance from the so-called trustee being either necessary or proper.

Matter of Winter, 84 N. Y. 567; Clark v. Davenport, 1 Bosw. 115.

And it is not pretended that Loring's alleged duties extended even as far as that, "to convey." He was only to hold in trust. So that, if the complainant has succeeded in establishing the case made by his bill, he became the legal owner, by a title actually and completely vested in him, of one third of the lands in controversy, and, being such legal owner, he had a plain, adequate and complete remedy at law in an ejectment suit; and the present action, on the complainant's own theory of the case, is obviously but an ejectment bill in disguise, and one which a court of equity ought not to tolerate or sustain.

Neither does the bill claim, nor the evidence establish, any trust in Loring by implication of law.

There being no resulting trust possible under the Statutes of Michigan in favor of a party paying the consideration for a purchase of lands conveyed to another party, the only other trust that could arise by operation of law, or by implication of law, is by establishing a case of fraud or mala fides in the original acquisition of the title.

Lloyd v. Spillet, 2 Atk. 150.

Having expressly consented to and requested the acquisition of the title by Loring, Palmer cannot now complain.

Sturtevant v. Sturtevant, supra; Hunt v. Roberts, 40 Me. 187.

There is nothing in the case presented but a parol trust; a trust created out of materials from which the law forbids it to be constructed; a promise, it may be called, to hold in trust; a promise to hold for the benefit of another. In other words, it is nothing but an agreement, void under the Statute of Frauds, which, in the eye of the law, is nothing.

Shafter v. Huntington, 58 Mich. 310, 315.

The fraud or acts amounting to an abuse of confidence, from which the law will imply a promise, are those committed at the time of the purchase. No subsequent act on the part of the purchaser can be made the foundation of a trust by implication of law.

Kellum v. Smith, supra; 1 Perry, Trusts, § 138; Ficketi v. Durham, 109 Mass. 419; Phillips v. Hull, 101 Pa. 567; Levy v. Brush, 45 N. Y. 589; Wheeler v. Reynolds, 66 N. Y. 232; Wood v. Rabe, 96 N. Y. 426; Smith v. Burnham, 3 Sumn. 435; Steere v. Steere, supra.

It is not sufficient to show by parol that one bought with his own money for the use of another, "because that would be to overturn the Statute of Frauds."

Blair v. Bass, 4 Blackf. 545; Botsford v. Burr, 2 Johns. Ch. 405; Parsons v. Phelan, 134 Mass. 109; Purcell v. Miner, 4 Wall. 513 (71 U. S. bk. 18, L. ed. 435). See also Fischli v. Dumaresly, 3 A. K. Marsh. 24; Randall v. Howard, 2 Black, 589 (67 U. S. bk. 17, L. ed. 269); 2 Reed, Stat. Fr. § 822; Moots v. Scriven, 33 Mich. 504; Taylor v. Boardman, 24 Mich. 287.

In view of the long-continued acquiescence of the complainant in Loring's disavowal of all interest on complainant's part in the lands in controversy, and of his gross and unexcused laches in the presentation of his claim, the court, as a court of equity, should have dismissed the bill.

The character of the property, as mining and speculative property, is a leading consideration in respect to the application of the doctrines of acquiescence and laches.

Messrs. Ashley Pond and Hoyt Post, for appellee:

Railroad Co. v. Durant, 95 U. S. 576 (Bk. 24, L. ed. 391) holds: "When a conveyance of real estate is made to the grantee as trustee, without setting forth for whom or for what purpose he is trustee, parol evidence is admissible to establish the fact." That case came up from Nebraska, but the Nebraska Statute of Frauds at that time was identical with the Statute of Michigan invoked by the defendants here.

Applying that ruling to this case, and the undisputed oral admissions and declarations made by Loring to Frue and Palmer at the interview in July, 1868, taken with the contract from Mason, running to Loring as trustee, make out a perfect case for complainant.

1 Perry, Trusts, § 82, citing Cripps v. Jee, 4 Bro. Ch. 472; Hollingshead v. Allen, 17 Pa. St. 275; Prevost v. Gratz, 1 Pet. C. C. 364; Morton v. Tewart, 2 Younge & C. Ch. 67; Hutchins v. Lee, 1 Atk. 447; Corse v. Leggett, 25 Barb. 389. See also Browne, Stat. Fr. § 111; Kingsbury v. Burnside, 58 Ill. 300; Urann v. Coates, 109 Mass. 581.

The courts have uniformly opposed such a stringent construction of the Statute of Frauds as would encourage its use as a cloak or protection of frauds.

No particular formality is required or necessary in the creation of a trust. It may be by an express declaration, or by any informal memorandum; Bellamy v. Burrow, Cas. t. Talb. 97; Fisher v. Fields, 10 Johns. 495; Corse v. Leggett and Urann v. Coates, supra; or by letters, Forster v. Hale, 3 Ves. Jr. 696; S. C. 5 Ves. 308; Montague v. Hayes, 10 Gray, 609; Kingsbury v. Burnside, 58 Ill. 310; by a pamphlet, Barrell v. Joy, 16 Mass. 221; by a receipt, Faxon v. Folvey, 110 Mass. 392; by a deposition or affidavit, Pinney v. Fellows, 15 Vt. 525; by a recital in a bond, Gomez v. Tradesmen's Bank, 4 Sandf. 102; Bragg v. Paulk, 42 Me. 502; by recital in a deed, Wright v. Douglass, 7 N. Y. 564; though the deed run to third parties, Barrell v. Joy, supra; or by an answer in chancery, Patton v. Chamberlain, 44 Mich. 5 and cases cited; Hutchinson v. Tindall, 2 Green, Ch. 357; Maccubbin v. Cromwell, 7 Gill & J. 157; Barron v. Barron, 24 Vt. 375; in short by any writing in which the fiduciary relation between the parties and its terms can be clearly read. 1 Perry, Trusts, § 82; Browne, Stat. of Frauds, §§ 88, 109.

The question has arisen whether the change in the wording of the statute, requiring the trust to be created or declared by an instrument in writing, works any change in the construction to be given to it, and the rulings seem to have been almost uniform that it does not.

Pinnock v. Clough, 16 Vt. 508; Jenkins v. Eldredge, 3 Story, 294; Urann v. Coates, 109 Mass. 581, 585; Barrell v. Joy and Faxon v. Folvey, supra; Richardson v. Woodbury, 43 Me. 206; McClellan v. McClellan, 65 Me. 500; Corse v. Leggett, Wright v. Douglass, supra; Cook v. Barr, 44 N. Y. 156; Patton v. Chamberlain, supra; White v. Fitzgerald, 19 Wis. 480.

From the foregoing authorities it seems well established that the words "created or declared," mean nothing different from "manifested or proved" and that the words "by deed or conveyance" do not substantially change the construction given to the statute.

Perry, Trusts, sec. 81; Browne, Stat. of Frauds, sec. 104.

But conceding these writings to have been sufficient under the Statute of Frauds to establish an express trust, is the matter affected by the Michigan Statute of Uses and Trusts?

This statute was adopted from New York, and most of its provisions are identical with the New York Statute of 1830.

The object and effect of the statute is fully discussed in Willard's Equity, p. 414 et seq., and Washburn on Real Property, Vol. 2, p. 212.

It was enacted in Michigan in the Revision of 1846, and stands as chapter 63, Rev. Stat. 1846. But a very important modification is made in section 11 of the Act. The New York Statute specifies but four purposes for which an express trust may be created.

The Michigan Statute adds a fifth.

Wisconsin in 1849 enacted the Michigan Statute verbatim.

The effect of subdivision five seems never to have been directly passed upon by the Michigan Supreme Court, but in Wisconsin it has been fully discussed in several cases. In Marvin v. Titsworth, 10 Wis. 320, it was overlooked, and the New York decisions followed. But in White v. Fitzgerald, supra, Goodrich v. Milwaukee, 24 Wis. 422, and Riehl v. Bingenheimer, 28 Wis. 84, the cases turned upon the effect to be given to this section.

In Goodrich v. Milwaukee the case of Marvin v. Titsworth, supra, is expressly overruled, and White v. Fitzgerald approved and followed. The court holds as to said fifth subdivision as follows:

"The addition of that subdivision to the four which precede it and which are found in the Statute of New York establishes, as it was undoubtedly intended to do, a policy in this State upon the subject of active trusts entirely different from that which prevails in the State of New York. It shows very clearly that no active trusts were intended to be affected or abolished by any provision of the statute, though the language of some of its sections, literally construed, may be broad enough to include them."

Has the trust thus established been since abandoned or abrogated?

Upon this question the burden of proof is upon the trustee, as held in Seymour v. Freer, 8 Wall. 202, 216 (75 U. S. bk. 19, L. ed. 306, 311). See also Prevost v. Gratz, 6 Wheat. 481, 497 (19 U. S. bk. 5, L. ed. 311, 315).

To abrogate a trust by denial and tacit acquiescence there must be a definite act of denial, of unmistakable import, and not a mere ambiguous and uncertain declaration of future intent. The act must be of a nature somewhat akin to what is requisite in adverse possession, or to what would amount to an ouster as between tenants in common.

Campau v. Campau, 45 Mich. 367.

In the absence of any change in title or surroundings or of any circumstance calling upon the cestui que trust to assert his rights or stand estopped, mere tacit acquiescence will not bar a direct express trust where the interest is one in real property, unless continued at least so long as to constitute a bar at law under the Statute of Limitations.

Perry, Trusts, sec. 864; Ang. Lim. sec. 468, note 2; Story, Eq. Jur. sec. 1521 a.

In Baker v. Whiting, 3 Sumn. 475, 486, Mr. Justice Story says: "I apprehend that in the case of a trust of lands, nothing short of the statute period which would bar a legal estate or right of entry would be permitted to operate in equity as a bar to an equitable estate."

The writings indicate only that the purchase was intended to be a joint purchase on behalf of Palmer, Frue and Loring; but a joint purchase means a purchase in equal interests, if nothing to the contrary appears. Up to the time of the deed from Mason to Loring in trust, February 18, 1869, there was nothing more definite than the clear inference, from the fact that the purchase was a joint one as to what the respective interests were. The case, then, upon the writings as they appear up to that time, stands just as it would if the deed instead of running to Loring in trust, had been to Loring in trust for himself, Frue and Palmer. Then it is clear the interests would have been equal.

Mr. Geo. F. Edmunds, also for appellee:

The trust may be proved by any species of written evidence, and does not require any formal declaration or instrument.

Compo v. Jackson Iron Co. 49 Mich. 89. See also notes to Howell's Annotated Statutes of Mich. Vol. 2, p. 1447.

The prior operations of the parties and the fact of the trade with Mason for this land being made by Palmer and Frue, and Loring being asked by letter and telegraph to complete the purchase, and his doing so and taking the contract of Mason to himself as trustee, and his admission in his answer that he did so on this state of written communication, demonstrated that a trust was intended and created in him by writings.

The only point really made by Loring was that Palmer did not furnish his share of the purchase money, and that he (Loring) had, therefore, the right to appropriate the land to himself for this cause alone.

This point was insisted upon before the accounts were taken. Now, an account being taken, it appears that Loring had in his own hands funds of Palmer all the time, subject to his control, more than adequate to satisfy all Palmer's one third of the purchase money. This is now demonstrated by final report of the master, not excepted to.

The contract of Loring, as trustee, with Mason to convey to Loring, in trust, the land, is in itself a full and sufficient declaration of the trust; and parol evidence is admissible to ascertain who the beneficiaries were.

R. R. Co. v. Durant, 95 U. S. 576 (Bk. 24, L. ed. 391); Cowell v. Springs Co. 100 U. S. 55 (Bk. 25, L. ed. 547).

Section 5571, Howell's Statutes of Michigan (subsection 9), declares that:

"The preceding seventh section shall not extend to cases where the alienee named in the conveyance shall have taken the same as an absolute conveyance in his own name without the knowledge or consent of the person paying the consideration, or when such alienee, in violation of some trust, shall have purchased the lands so conveyed with moneys belonging to another person."

Now in this case there is no contradiction in the answer or evidence that the purchase was expected and intended to be on joint account of Palmer, Frue and Loring; and in such case it is clear that Loring should have taken the contract from Mason to convey to all three. But without the knowledge of Palmer or Frue, Loriug took the contract to himself, as trustee, without naming in the contract the other beneficiaries.

Afterwards, when having money enough of Palmer's to pay more than all of Palmer's share, he took a deed directly to himself without the knowledge or consent of Palmer. In so doing he brought himself directly within section 5571 of Michigan Statutes and became a trustee for Palmer ex maleficio.

Whatever may have been the difficulties when the decree was made below, before it appeared, as it now does, that Loring had sufficient funds of Palmer's to pay his share, there can be now none whatever, for there was in the hands of Loring sufficient funds of Palmer's to supply his whole share of the consideration to be paid to Mason for the land, and so there could have been no fault or laches whatever on the part of Palmer. And as is admitted in the answer and proved by the papers, there was at first a lawful trust, duty and obligation on the part of Loring, that trust would continue until Loring could get rid of it by showing a failure of duty or laches by Palmer. This is confessedly negatived by the master's report, showing that all Palmer's funds were in Loring's hands and at his disposal, and that he has in fact, keeping all the accounts himself, more than enough of Palmer's money to pay for Palmer's one third interest in the land so to be acquired.

If Loring, in this state of circumstances, took the actual and legal conveyance from Mason directly to himself personally, and not in trust, (which does not distinctly appear in the papers), then, within the express provision of the Michigan Statute, Loring's conduct was a fraud upon the rights of Palmer, and is capable of being redressed by the method contained in the decree below.

This is a suit in equity brought by Charles H. Palmer, the appellee, against Elisha T. Loring and Charles A. Welch, the appellants, to obtain a conveyance of one undivided third part of the N. ½ of the N W. ¼, and of the N. W. ¼ of the S. W. ¼, sec. 23, T. 56, N. R. 33 W., Houghton County, Michigan, containing in all 120 acres, on the ground that the lands were bought from Thomas F. Mason for Loring, Palmer, and William B. Frue, and the title taken by Loring in trust for himself and his associates. The material facts are these: [322]

From the year 1856, and perhaps before, Palmer, Loring and Frue had been engaged in the purchase of lands in the upper peninsula of Michigan, in the formation of mining corporations, and in the purchase and sale of mining stocks. Frue resided at the time in Houghton County, which was in the upper peninsula, Palmer at Pontiac, Michigan, and Loring at Boston, Massachusetts, but Palmer spent much of his time at the peninsula and in its vicinity. During all the time the purchases were generally made and the titles, both of lands and stocks, taken in the name of Loring, as trustee for all the parties in interest. Among other lands purchased in this way were some which were afterwards put into the Ossipee Mining Company, a mining corporation promoted by these parties, with a capital stock consisting of 20,000 shares, of which Loring and Frue each owned 2,250, and Palmer 2,220.

Under these circumstances Palmer and Frue met Thomas F. Mason of New York, at Houghton, and negotiated with him for the purchase of the lands in question. The price was to be $20,000; payable $5,000 down, $7,500 in six months, and $7,500 in eight months, with interest at the rate of 7 per cent per annum on the last two sums. No contract was executed at the time, as Mason preferred a form which he had at home, and the matter was postponed until he got there, with the understanding that Loring should execute the formal contract in New York, and pay the $5,000. A memorandum of the transaction was, however, made at the time and assented to by both parties. This memorandum has been lost, but the testimony shows that it was substantially the same as the contract made with Loring, hereinafter referred to, except that either "Charles H. Palmer and William B. Frue" were named as vendees, or [323] "Charles H. Palmer and his associates."

The same day this occurred Palmer wrote from Michigan to Loring, in Boston, as follows:

"Kearsarge Mining Company,
Calumet, Mich. June 18th, 1868.

"E. T. Loring, Esq.,

"Dear Sir: I have this day bought of T. F. Mason the following lands in the Hecla section 23, namely: the north half of the northwest quarter, and the northwest quarter of the southwest quarter, in all 120 acres, for $20,000; $5,000 down, $7,500 in six months, and $7,500 in eight months, with 7 per cent interest on the last two sums. I had the contract drawn up and was ready to pay him the $5,000 down; but as he had just come from Ontonagon and the boat was to leave in two hours, he preferred to return to New York and write such a contract as he had given Hurlburt on his purchase, and have you execute the contract and pay him the $5,000. He will then send you the contract, and I want you to see it carried out in all respects. Mason agrees that if you are away or do not do this, he will send it to me to do, and to carry out as I have agreed to do. Mr. Mason has given me his word, in the presence of Frue, that all this shall be done as he agreed, and that I shall have the land—making his word as good as his deed. There was not time to do this before Mason left, and I want you to treat him in this matter without doubting him at all. I will write you again this evening and send the contract I had drawn up. He has a copy of it, with the terms as I have [324] stated. This matter is very important. The purchase will add to the Ossipee five dollars per share at once in actual value. I do not want anything said of this at all. You will see by this that we shall get a division with the Hecla so as to get what will make a mine out of it by itself. We can make the Calumet vein by this over 3,200 feet in length. The purchase is very important. I send this by the hands of Randall, and will write again to-night by mail. Do not mention this. If you can, I would go to New York and see Mason and close this at once. In no case will this be neglected. It is a fortune to us if well handled. Mason has the contract which I drew up, and will show it to you. But this will tell you what is to be done. I give a sketch of the land. When I present the whole matter you will see how important it is to us. We can take from Hecla from 1,550 to 2,305 feet in length, and still give them out of this purchase double the amount of mining value that we get from them. The fact is, this ground bought is worth more to them than the ground next to Ossipee. It is for this reason that I do not want anything said till we have fully considered this matter together and see how we shall open it to Shaw. This is a rough sketch of the land bought. The vein is nearer to it than I have given the dotted lines, as if made to divide between them. Hecla would be free then to give us 100 acres, 50 of which would carry the vein, and we should give them 100, all of which would carry the vein. You will see the importance of this matter, and that we should not say anything till we consult. The Hecla is rich and we can make the Ossipee as rich.

"Truly Yours, Charles H. Palmer."

The next day he wrote again as follows:

"Kearsarge Mining Company,
Calumet, Mich., June 19th, 1868.

"E. T. Loring, Esq.,

"Dear Sir: I have drawn a map of the land bought of Mason. The Hecla owns all in the section, but the 40 and 80. You may say that Shaw will not do anything about it. We can wait as long as he can, as we have enough to mine till the Hecla needs some of this land. The least I would take now would be the 80 next the Ossipee, through which the lode runs, and most likely with the right of mine perpendicular to the vein in the direction of the line A B. I do not think best now to say anything to Shaw about this. I have given on the other side the land in the Calumet section 14, bought by Hurlburt. I could have bought this a year ago last winter for $40,000, including the 120 now bought. If I had done so, we could now have this land in 23 for nothing, as Shaw will have to buy Hurlburt out even at $100,000. Stanton, who now has the Huron, is intending to buy Hurlburt out in 14, and I wish you would see him when he returns, and urge him to do it. Hurlburt bought of Mason some 1,200 acres of land in 14, 15, 11, 23, and 28. If Stanton can [325] get the land in 14, 480 acres, and the land in 23, on the east half, I should like it, as the land in 23 is desirable for us. Hurlburt offered the land in 14 to Stanton for Huron stock. This would be a good thing for Stanton. I shall write Stanton on this subject. This matter is not to be talked about. I had a long talk with Stanton, and he is inclined to buy it. He has let Hurlburt have money.

"I send the duplicate of the contract I gave Mason. Mason is to write a contract like his contract with Hurlburt, and send to you. Mason talked this matter over with Frue and myself, and says we shall have this land as agreed, and that his word is as good as his deed. I trust nothing will be left undone to carry this out, and you had better go to New York and see it done. We shall get out of Hecla all I have indicated. The land we would exchange is more convenient on surface and underground for them than what they would give us. It will be under their machinery and improvements. This is a great thing for Ossipee. You had better telegraph me as soon as this is done, as I shall be most anxious about it. I wrote to you to-day and sent by Randall, and I write this by mail. I shall put a note on this for Burr to open, in case you should be absent. On the $5,000 to be paid down, pay interest if Mason wants it. If Burr reads this, I wish him to see all is done which he can do. Send the $5,000 in case you are not there to execute the papers, saying that you will execute them and return them as soon as you get home, as they can be sent to you. I do not want anything by which Mason can get out of this. He agreed that if there was any hindrance on your part, to send them to me to execute.

"The S. P. is doing finely, 30 tons a week. To-day 50 tons have been shipped, and by Monday morning there will be at the smelting works 60 tons unsmelted. I think we have a sure thing in the S. P. We must make a family concern of Ossipee, and I would not sell any stock in it. We can make it put on its own importance. This we will do. I see this matter clearly. I write in haste and do not read over.

326] "Truly Yours, Charles H. Palmer.

"Be particular to say nothing about Stanton's wishes. We need not buy any Hecla unless upon good time and satisfactory prices. We shall have a Hecla of our own. I think the S. P. will improve upon what she is now doing. The 40 acres is less than 350 feet from line of vein. In case you want us to raise $5,000 here, write us or telegraph, and we will use it for the mine."

Enclosed in this was a copy of the memorandum made while Mason was in Michigan. After the receipt of these letters Loring wrote and perhaps telegraphed to Palmer approving the purchase.

On the 25th of June Loring also wrote W Hart Smith, of New York, as follows:

"Office of the South Pewabic Copper Company.
31 Kilby Street,
Boston, June 25, 1868.

"W. Hart Smith, Esq., Treas., New York.

"Dear Sir: I received letter this morning from Mr. Palmer, who is very desirous I should see Mr. Mason before leaving for the Lake, which I intended doing on Saturday, therefore telegraphed you this morning, requesting to be advised as soon as Mr. Mason returned, which I will thank you to do by telegraph at the earliest date, as this may enable me to leave here on Saturday evening's boat and see Mr. Mason on Monday morning, if not before.

"Truly Yours, E. T. Loring."

Smith was the treasurer of the Quincy Mining Company, of which Mason was president. On the next day, June 26, Mason, in New York, wrote T. Henry Perkins, in Boston, as follows.

"T. Henry Perkins, Esq.

"Dear Sir: I send herewith contract for sale of 120 acres of land, which I wish you to [——] Mr. Loring, and have him execute, either for himself or Mr. Palmer; (I made the trade with Palmer) fill in the name of whichever Mr. L. [327] desires, and deliver over to Mr. Loring upon his paying you $5,000.

"If Mr. Loring is not prepared to comply, you will not press the matter, but return the papers. I was tempted to sell by the offer, but perhaps I made a mistake; probably I might obtain more from the Hecla Company by holding long enough.

"Mr. Palmer requested the transaction kept private for the present, so you will please say nothing about it.

* * * * *

"Truly Yours, Thos. F. Mason."

Between the date of this letter and June 29, Perkins filled the blanks in the contract with the name of Elisha T. Loring, trustee, and Loring signed it as trustee. He also made the down payment of $5,000, which was remitted by Perkins to Mason, so that he got it in New York on the 29th, and on the same day Palmer, in Michigan, received from Loring, in Boston, a telegram dated the 27th, stating that the contract had been closed and that he would start for Lake Superior the same day.

The following is a copy of the contract which was thus executed:

"This agreement made the eighteenth (18) day of June, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-eight, between Thomas F. Mason, of the City, County and State of New York, of the first part, and Elisha T. Loring, trustee, of the City of Boston, County of Suffolk, State of Massachusetts:

"Witnesseth, that said party of the first part, in consideration of the sum of twenty thousand dollars to be paid as hereinafter mentioned, hereby agrees to sell unto the said party of the second part all the following described premises, to wit: situated in the County of Houghton and State of Michigan, the north half of the northwest quarter, and the northwest quarter of the southwest quarter of section twenty-three, in township fifty-six, north of range thirty-three west; which said premises the said party of the second part hereby agree to purchase and pay for in manner following, to wit: the sum of five thousand dollars on the execution and delivery of this instrument; the sum [328] of seventy-five hundred dollars at the expiration of six months from the date thereof; and the sum of seventy-five hundred dollars to be paid eight months after the date thereof; with interest on the sum of fifteen thousand dollars, at and after the rate of seven per cent per annum, from the date of this instrument till the same shall be paid.

"It is further agreed, between the parties to this instrument, that said Mason, the party of the first part, will receive the said sum of fifteen thousand dollars, or any part thereof, at any time prior to the dates of payment hereinbefore mentioned, and that, upon the payment of the entire sum of fifteen thousand dollars and interest, the party of the first part shall make, execute, and deliver to the party of the second part, or his assigns, a proper deed for the conveying and assuring to him the fee simple of said premises free from all incumbrances, which deed shall contain a general warranty and the usual full covenants.

"It is further agreed that said party of the second part shall be entitled to immediate possession of said lands and premises herein described, and shall pay all taxes or assessments of every name and nature assessed and imposed on said lands and premises after this date.

"It is further hereby expressly understood and agreed that the said terms of payment mentioned in this contract are hereby made material, and that the failure to pay any of said installments or interest on the days named for the payment thereof, shall render this contract absolutely null and void, and that any installment paid before such failure shall, by such failure, be forfeited, and that, whatever amount may be paid, any failure of payment of any of said installments and interest, as the same shall fall due and become payable, shall make this contract absolutely void, and all rights, interests, or titles under this contract shall be forfeited, and all and every equity and right in the said party of the second part, his heirs or assigns, shall thereby determine and become void. The clause in this contract mentioned, relative to the execution of a deed of the said party of the second part, being, by the agreement of the parties hereto, expressly made subject to the agreement of forfeiture in case of any failure of payment of said installments and interest, as the same shall fall due and become payable. [329]

"It is further understood and agreed that each and every of the stipulations hereinbefore in this contract mentioned shall apply to and bind the heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns of the respective parties.

"In witness whereof, the parties to these presents have hereunto set their hands and seals the day and year first above written.

"Thos. F. Mason,
"E. T Loring, Trustee.

"Sealed and delivered in presence of—"Wm. Hart Smith, as to signature of T. F. Mason.
"H. F. Atwood, as to signature of E. T. Loring, Trustee."

On the 22d of June Palmer telegraphed from Michigan to Loring that he had paid $5,000 for him, Loring, there, and asking that he pay the same amount to Mason and execute the contract. This was Frue's money, and it was afterwards so treated by all the parties. The remainder of the purchase money was paid by Loring when it became due, and as soon as the payments were made in full Mason conveyed the property as called for by the contract.

No moneys were paid by Palmer to Loring with particular instructions to use them in paying for the land, but Loring had for some years been acting as the financial agent of Palmer in Boston, and the accounts as stated by the master show quite a considerable balance of interest in favor of Palmer at the end of the years 1867 and 1868, respectively. At first the credits to Palmer were principally from the sales of stocks, but during the years 1867 and 1868 they were mostly the proceeds of the discounts of Palmer's notes, indorsed by Loring. In the latter part of the year 1868 the credit of both the parties seems to have been somewhat impaired, and there was considerable difficulty in raising money to meet maturing obligations. The first installment on the contract with Mason fell due December 18, 1868, and there were notes of Palmer which had been discounted maturing about the same time to a considerable amount. To raise the means to meet these maturing obligations Palmer, at the request of Loring, sold stocks of his own, from which $15,000 in money was realized. The sale was negotiated before the installment on the contract fell due, but the price was not paid until December 21, $5,000, and December 28, $10,000. All this money was paid over promptly to Loring for Palmer's credit, and the accounts stated by the master show that on the 31st of December there was a balance due from Loring to Palmer of $17,059.25, and that there was a balance of interest account in Palmer's favor for the year of $775.55. In this statement of the account no charge is made against Palmer for any share of the purchase money under the Mason contract. On the 18th of February, 1869, when the last installment to Mason fell due, the accounts show a balance in favor of Palmer of something more than $10,000. Between that time and March 20 this amount was substantially all used in payment of Palmer's maturing notes, but on the last date Palmer sold other stocks, from which $8,000 in money was realized, and put to his credit. After that, in August, other notes were paid, and at the end of the year there was a balance against Palmer of $1,065.18, though the interest account for the year showed a balance in his favor of $302.85. Here the transactions between the parties seem to have stopped, but on the 15th of March, 1872, Loring sold stocks of Palmer which he still held in his hands, from which $12,975 was realized, and afterwards during the year other sales were made, so that on the 31st of December, 1872, the accounts show a balance in favor of Palmer amounting to $15,964.45, which included a balance of interest account in his favor, since the last statement, of $637.96. [330]

In the statement of the accounts to this time, for some reason, no charge was made against Palmer for certain stocks purchased in 1867, the price of which was $6,275, nor for any part of the Mason purchase, but the amount otherwise to his credit with Loring was sufficient to pay these items in full, principal and interest, and still leave a balance due Palmer at the date of the decree amounting to $527.52.

On the 16th of March, 1869, Loring, at the request of Palmer, indorsed on a copy of the contract with Mason a declaration as follows: [331]

"Boston, March 16, 1869.

"Whereas, Thomas F. Mason has deeded to E. T. Loring, in trust, the lands described in the within document, and received therefor in payment the sum mentioned therein, with the interest: Therefore, be it known, for value rec'd, I hereby acknowledge that C. H. Palmer, or Wm. B. Frue, one or either of them, jointly or separately, are the owners of the undivided one fourth part of said lands, and I hereby obligate myself, heirs, and executors to account to said Palmer, or his assigns, for one fourth part rec'd for the lands in question whenever a sale shall be made of the same.

"Elisha T. Loring.

"Witness: James Moore."

This represented the interest paid for with Frue's $5,000, and Palmer obtained it at Frue's request, so that he, Frue, might have something to show for his interest in the land. Afterwards, on the 22d of May, 1869, Loring conveyed to Frue an undivided one fourth of the property, and he claims no further interest.

On the 22d day of February, 1869, Loring wrote Palmer as follows:

"I therefore deem it my duty, and as an act of courtesy towards you, to notify you that whatever additional proportion you wish to secure for yourself in section 23, it will be necessary for you to remit the amount of the cost of such additional portion as you desire prior to the 20th of March; otherwise I shall consider as mine and retain the three fourths interest in section 23 which I have paid for."

In October, 1871, Loring sued Palmer for a balance claimed to be his due on general account, and the bill of particulars showed the amount demanded to be large. Nothing was claimed for payments on account of the Mason purchase. This suit was pending until June, 1874, when it was discontinued, and on the first of July, 1875, Loring conveyed the land to 332] Welch in trust for him, Loring, and his children. This suit was begun December 20, 1875. The circuit court rendered a decree in favor of Palmer, and from that decree this appeal was taken.

The question which meets us at the outset is whether the trust in favor of Palmer, on which the case depends, has been sufficiently established. A Statute of Michigan provides that "Express trusts may be created for any or either of the following purposes:

* * * * *

"5. For the beneficial interest of any person or persons, when such trust is fully expressed and clearly defined upon the face of the instrument creating it, subject to the limitations as to time prescribed in this title." 2 Howell, Ann. Stat. § 5573, p. 1448.

The trust relied on is an express trust, and it relates to lands in Michigan. Consequently it must be established according to this statute, which it is contended requires proof of the creation of the trust by a written instrument that shall clearly express and fully define on its face the rights of the respective parties thereto. It is not enough, as is claimed, to show the existence of the trust by writing. The proof must be that it was originally created by a written instrument sufficient in form. In the view we take of the case it is unnecessary to inquire whether this is the true rule or not, for in our opinion, the evidence is sufficient to meet all these requirements.

We do not understand it to be denied that the letters of Palmer to Loring under date of June 18 and June 19; the memorandum of the agreement made in Michigan at the time of the negotiations by Palmer and Frue with Mason for the purchase, and which was sent by Palmer to Loring in the letter of June 19; the tele-340] gram and letter from Loring to Palmer before the contract between Mason and Loring, trustee, was executed; the letter from Loring to Smith, under date of June 25; the letter from Mason to Perkins under date of June 26; and the contract between Mason and Loring, may all be read together as one instrument for the purpose of establishing the trust. If, upon the face of these writings thus read and construed together in the light of the circumstances which surrounded the parties at the time, a trust is fully expressed and clearly defined for the beneficial interest of Palmer, then his case has been made out so far as the creation of the trust is concerned.

We begin, then, with the fact that Loring, Palmer, and Frue had been operating together for some years in buying mining lands, forming mining corporations, and selling mining stocks. Very generally the titles, both of lands and stocks, had been, during all the time, taken and held in the name of Loring, as trustee for all concerned. Each party paid for his own share of the purchases, but Loring was the principal capitalist, and both Palmer and Frue relied on him to raise money for them to meet their obligations when necessary. This particular purchase was set on foot by Palmer and Frue, and it was of a kind of property in which the parties had been in the habit of dealing. It adjoined or was near to other property in which they were all largely interested at the time, and which they were jointly engaged in advancing in value. The writings are to be read and construed in the light of these facts.

The contract of purchase, as reduced to writing and finally executed, is in the name of Loring, trustee. This on its face implies that it was made by him for the beneficial interest of others besides himself, in whole or in part. Standing alone, it does not "clearly define" the trust which it apparently created, but taken in connection with the correspondence which preceded it, and out of which it confessedly arose, no room is left for doubt that it was made for the benefit of the three persons who had been so long operating together in that kind of property. Palmer, in his letters acquainting Loring with what he and Frue had done in Michigan towards the purchase, says "It is a fortune to us if well handled;" "When I present the whole matter you will see how important it is to us. [341]
We can take from Hecla from 1,550 to 2,305 feet in length, and still give them out of this purchase double the amount of mining value that we get from them. The fact is, this ground bought is worth more to them than the ground next to Ossipee. It is for this reason that I do not want anything said till we have fully considered this matter together, and see how we shall open it to Shaw. * * * Hecla would be free then to give us 100 acres, 50 of which would carry the vein, and we should give them 100, all of which would carry the vein. You will see the importance of this matter, and that we should not say anything until we consult. The Hecla is rich, and we can make the Ossipee as rich." And again, "We shall get out of Hecla all I have indicated. The land we would exchange is more convenient on surface and underground for them than what they would give us. It will be under their machinery and improvements. This is a great thing for Ossipee."

It is said, however, that Frue does not appear to have been included as one of the beneficiaries.

He was one of those who had been operating together, and Palmer, in his letter, speaks of him as having been present when the negotiations were had with Mason in Michigan. The language on this subject, in the letter of June 19, is: "Mason talked this matter over with Frue and myself, and says we shall have this land as agreed, and that his word is as good as his deed;" and besides, in the memorandum of the agreement, made at the time of the negotiation, either Palmer and Frue were named as vendees, or Charles H. Palmer and his associates, which, under the circumstances, would imply the same thing.

Again, it is said that the individual interests of the respective beneficiaries are not stated, and, therefore, that the trust is not sufficiently defined to meet the requirements of the statute; but the rule in Michigan, as well as in all other States where the principles of the common law prevail, is that where a conveyance of lands is made to two or more persons, and the instrument is silent as to the interest which each is to take, the presumption will be that their interests are equal. Campau v. Campau, 44 Mich. 31; Eberts v. Fisher, 44 Mich. 558. Under this [342] rule the purchase by Loring, as trustee, was for the equal benefit of the three parties in interest, and the trust, therefore, inured in that way. Without doubt it was expected that each of the parties would pay for his own interest, and that as between themselves neither should be bound for the other; but that is a matter the effect of which need not now be considered, as Palmer has paid for his share in full. There is nothing whatever on the face of the papers to indicate that at the time the contract was made and the trust created it was expected that one should have a greater interest in the purchase than another.

Finally, it is claimed the letters show that the purchase was made for the Ossipee Company, and not for Loring, Palmer and Frue individually. We cannot so read what was written. The Ossipee Company had been promoted by these parties. They had bought the land which was made the basis, in whole or in part, of its organization. They were at the time of the purchase from Mason the three largest stockholders. The Ossipee was a corporation, and it nowhere appears that these parties, or either of them, had ever been authorized to make the purchase on its account. There is no doubt that all the parties expected to handle the property with a view to an enhancement of the value of Ossipee stock, but there is nothing whatever to indicate that the corporation was to be in any way directly interested in the purchase. The land might have been, and undoubtedly was, necessary to the complete success of the company, but it was nevertheless, when bought, the property of the purchasers, who occupied no such trust relations to the company as to make their purchase inure directly to its benefit; and besides, the company is not now seeking to charge them as trustees. Palmer does, indeed, say in his letter to Loring, "The purchase will add to the Ossipee $5 per share at once in actual value," and "We must make a family concern of Ossipee, and I would not sell any stock in it; we can make it put on its own importance; this we will do; I see this matter clearly;" and "we shall have a Hecla of our own;" but this does not make Ossipee the purchaser, or the direct beneficiary under the trust as thus created and defined. The expectation of an indirect benefit [343] to their investments in Ossipee was undoubtedly great, but nothing occurred to bind the company to the purchasers or the purchasers to the company.

We conclude, therefore, that the original trust in favor of Palmer for a one third interest in the property has been sufficiently established.

It is contended, however, that if the conveyance was made to Loring as trustee for himself and Palmer and Frue, then, under the Statutes of Michigan, the legal title vested at once in the beneficiaries, and the remedy of Palmer is at law and not in equity, because he holds the legal title to his share and not an equitable title merely. The statute referred to is as follows:

"§ 5567. Sec. 5. Every disposition of lands, whether by deed or devise, hereafter made, except as otherwise provided in this chapter, shall be directly to the person in whom the right to the possession and the profits shall be intended to be vested, and not to any other, to the use of, or in trust for, such person; and if made to one or more persons, in trust for or to the use of another, no estate or interest, legal or equitable, shall vest in the trustee." 2 Howell, Ann. Stat. 1446.

This, it has been held, abolishes all express passive trusts in Michigan, but allows express active trusts when created in accordance with section 5573, cited above. Burdeno v. Amperse, 14 Mich. 96; Ready v. Kearsley, 14 Mich. 227; Stevens v. Earles, 25 Mich. 44; Thompson v. Waters, 25 Mich. 234; Goodrich v. Milwaukee, 24 Wis. 420. But here the conveyance under which Loring took the title that he has since conveyed to Welch did not create the trust in favor of Palmer. That was done by the original contract of purchase from Mason, read in connection with the cotemporaneous correspondence between the parties; and the object of this suit is to charge Loring as trustee under that contract, and to compel him and his grantee to perform the trust which was then created. There is nothing on the face of the deed to Loring to show that Palmer is the person for whom Loring took title in trust. The legal title did not, therefore, vest in him by that conveyance. All he has is the equitable title which he acquired under the contract of purchase, and his purpose now is to compel [344] Loring to convey to him the legal title to his share which passed from Mason when the contract was performed and the deed executed to him in accordance with its provisions. This is relief which a court of chancery alone can afford. So far as this record shows, Mason knew nothing of the particulars of the arrangement between Loring, Palmer and Frue as to their respective interests. It is true the contract was made with Loring as trustee, but that is all. The terms of his holding are nowhere explained, and Mason performed his duty towards all who were interested, when he conveyed to Loring in accordance with the terms of the contract. The deed was intended to and did vest in Loring the legal title in trust for whomsoever it might concern. This suit is prosecuted to establish the fact that Palmer was one of the persons concerned and to charge Loring accordingly.

The trust having thus been established and the jurisdiction of a court of equity over the subject matter of the suit sustained, it remains only to consider whether the trust, which was originally created, has been abrogated by abandonment or laches. The last payment to Mason was made February 18, 1869, and this suit was not brought until December 20, 1875.

This branch of the case is presented to us very differently from what it was to the court below when the interlocutory decree was rendered, and the cause referred to a master to ascertain how much was due from Palmer to Loring upon the purchase money paid to Mason. It was then supposed that Palmer had no money in the hands of Loring which could be used to pay on the land when the deferred installments fell due. The court then found that no part of the proceeds of the smelting stock or the Hecla stock was applied to such payment, and that all went into Palmer's general account with his consent. It now appears that when each of the installments was paid, or very soon thereafter, Palmer had or ought to have had a balance to his credit much more than sufficient to meet his share of what was due. The testimony shows very clearly that neither of the parties had a correct understanding of the state of their accounts with each other at the time. Palmer kept no books of his own,
[345] and those of Loring were not at all reliable. Loring always claimed that Palmer was largely in his debt, and Palmer does not seem to have had then any means of showing the contrary. His own credit was exhausted, and Loring had possession of all his securities. Consequently, when Loring called on him to pay by the 20th of March, he did not abandon his claim, but he sold his Hecla stock and paid the proceeds to his general credit and waited for time to show whether this was enough to preserve his interest or not. He gave no special direction for its application, but, under the circumstances, the law will apply it to the only debt he then owed to Loring, and that was his share of this purchase money. Loring, by keeping the charge for the purchase money out of his accounts, cannot deprive Palmer of his right to the application of his credits. In a couple of years or so Loring began his suit, and this was kept pending until 1874, when it was discontinued. Loring says, in his answer, this was because he had "ascertained that Palmer was utterly irresponsible and worthless." Now it turns out that when the suit was abandoned, he was himself in debt to Palmer, and that all the time he had securities in his hands which were largely in excess of any amount he had paid for Palmer on the land or otherwise. Under these circumstances it is impossible to say that the evidence makes out a case of actual abandonment, or that Palmer has been guilty of such laches as to bar him of the equities which are now so clearly shown to have existed in his favor all the time. His delay in bringing the suit is to be construed in connection with the uncertainty that existed as to the true situation of his accounts. Loring must have known that Palmer relied on him to keep the accounts, and having himself been guilty of such glaring errors in his statements and in his claims, Palmer is not to be charged alone with the fault of delay. The same explanation applies to his failure to respond more definitely to the letter of Loring under date of February 22, if there was in fact any such failure. He did, however, by the sale of his Hecla stock, put Loring in funds to an amount sufficient to meet his entire share of the purchase money, and that too on the very day he was required to do so by this letter of Loring. This renders it unnecessary to consider the conflicting testimony on the subject of the letter. The explanation also applies to the [346]
correspondence in reference to the declaration of trust in favor of Frue, under date of March 16, 1869. It is clear that, if Palmer had known the actual condition of the accounts at the time, he would promptly have claimed his rights; and that, to say the least, Loring was as much responsible for this uncertainty as Palmer. If the land had not in fact been paid for by Palmer, the delay in bringing the suit, or otherwise asserting the claim with distinctness, would have been looked upon very differently. As it is, it does not make out a defense by Loring to the enforcement of the trust which has been so clearly established.

The decree of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

v.
PETER HOPKINS, Sheriff of the CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 356-374.)

Constitutional law—police power—relation between state and federal courts—regulation of laundry business—municipal orders of the City of San Francisco—Treaty with China—discrimination by board of supervisors.

1. The jurisdiction of this court to review the decision of the supreme court of the State in a habeas corpus case is limited to the question, whether the petitioner was denied a right in violation of the Constitution, laws or treaties of the United States.

2. In a similar case brought here from the Circuit Court of the United States, the question of the legality of the imprisonment under the laws and Constitution of the State is open here, as it was in the court below; but judicial propriety is best consulted by accepting the judgment of the state court on that question.

3. These principles, however, do not preclude this court from putting upon the ordinances in question an independent construction for the purpose of deciding whether the proceedings under them are in conflict with the Constitution and laws of the United States.

4. The order of the City and County of San Francisco, providing that it should be unlawful for any person to engage in the laundry business within the corporate limits "without having first obtained the consent of the board of supervisors, except the same be located in a building constructed either of brick or stone," does not prescribe a rule and conditions for the regulation of the use of laundry property, to which all similarly situated may conform; but it confers a naked arbitrary power upon the board to give or withhold consent, and makes all engaged in the business the tenants at will as to their means of living, under the board of supervisors.

5. The rights of the petitioners in the present case are not less because they are aliens, and subjects of the Emperor of China.

6. Though a law be fair on its face and impartial in appearance, yet, if it is administered by public authority with an evil eye and an unequal hand, so as practically to make illegal discriminations between persons in similar circumstances, material to their rights, the denial of equal justice is still within the prohibition of the Constitution.

7. The imprisonment of the petitioners under the order in question is shown by the record to come within these principles, and they are entitled to be discharged.

[Nos. 1280, 1281.]

Submitted Apr. 14, 1886. Decided May 10, 1886.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of California.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of California. Reversed.

Statement of the case by Mr. Justice Matthews:

These two cases were argued as one and depend upon precisely the same state of facts, the first coming here upon a writ of error to the Supreme Court of the State of California, the second on appeal from the Circuit Court of the United States for that district.

The plaintiff in error, Yick Wo, on August 24, 1885, petitioned the Supreme Court of California for the writ of habeas corpus, alleging that he was illegally deprived of his personal [357] liberty by the defendant as Sheriff of the City and County of San Francisco.

The Sheriff made return to the writ that he held the petitioner in custody by virtue of a sentence of the Police Judges' Court, No. 2, of the City and County of San Francisco, whereby he was found guilty of a violation of certain ordinances of the board of supervisors of that county, and adjudged to pay a fine of $10, and, in default of payment, be imprisoned in the county jail at the rate of one day for each dollar of fine until said fine should be satisfied, and a commitment in consequence of nonpayment of said fine.

The ordinances for the violation of which he had been found guilty are set out as follows:

Order No. 1569, passed May 26, 1880, prescribing the kind of buildings in which laundries may be located.

"The people of the City and County of San Francisco do ordain as follows:

"Sec. 1. It shall be unlawful, from and after the passage of this order, for any person or persons to establish, maintain, or carry on a laundry within the corporate limits of the City and County of San Francisco, without having first obtained the consent of the board of supervisors, except the same be located in a building constructed either of brick or stone.

"Sec. 2. It shall be unlawful for any person to erect, build or maintain, or cause to be erected, built or maintained, over or upon the roof of any building now erected or which may hereafter be erected within the limits of said city and county, any scaffolding, without first obtaining the written permission of the board of supervisors, which permit shall state fully for what purpose said scaffolding is to be erected and used, and such scaffolding shall not be used for any other purpose than that designated in such permit.

"Sec. 3. Any person who shall violate any of the provisions of this order shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not more than one thousand dollars, or by imprisonment in the county jail not more than six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment."

Order No. 1587, passed July 28, 1880; the following section:

"Sec. 68. It shall be unlawful, from and after the passage of this order, for any person or persons to establish, maintain or carry on a laundry within the corporate limits of the City and County of San Francisco without having first obtained the consent of the board of supervisors, except the same be located in a building constructed either of brick or stone."

The following facts are also admitted on the record: That petitioner is a native of China and came to California in 1861, and is still a subject of the Emperor of China; that he has been engaged in the laundry business in the same premises and building for twenty-two years last past; that he had a license from the board of fire wardens, dated March 8, 1884, from which it appeared "that the above described premises have been inspected by the board of fire wardens, and upon such inspection said board found all proper arrangements for carrying on the business; that the stoves, washing and drying apparatus, and the appliances for heating smoothing irons are in good condition, and that their use is not dangerous to the surrounding property from fire, and that all proper precautions have been taken to comply with the provisions of order No. 1617, defining 'the fire limits of the City and County of San Francisco and making regulations concerning the erection and use of buildings in said city and county,' and of order No. 1670, 'prohibiting the kindling, maintenance and use of open fires in houses;' that he had a certificate from the health officer that the same premises had been inspected by him, and that he found that they were properly and sufficiently drained, and that all proper arrangements for carrying on the business of a laundry, without injury to the sanitary condition of the neighborhood, had been complied with; that the city license of the petitioner was in force and expired October 1, 1885; and that the petitioner applied to the board of supervisors, June 1, 1885, for consent of said board to maintain and carry on his laundry, but that said board, on July 1, 1885, refused said consent." It is also admitted to be true, as alleged in the petition, that, on February 24, 1880, "there were about three hundred and twenty laundries in the City and County of San Francisco, of which about two hundred and forty were owned and conducted by sub-[359] jects of China, and of the whole number, viz: three hundred and twenty, about three hundred and ten were constructed of wood, the same material that constitutes nine tenths of the houses in the City of San Francisco. The capital thus invested by the subjects of China was not less than two hundred thousand dollars and they paid annually for rent, license, taxes, gas, and water about one hundred and eighty thousand dollars."

It is alleged in the petition, that "Your petitioner and more than one hundred and fifty of his countrymen have been arrested upon the charge of carrying on business without having such special consent, while those who are not subjects of China, and who are conducting eighty odd laundries under similar conditions, are left unmolested and free to enjoy the enhanced trade and profits arising from this hurtful and unfair discrimination. The business of your petitioner, and of those of his countrymen similarly situated, is greatly impaired, and in many cases practically ruined by this system of oppression to one kind of men and favoritism to all others."

The statement therein contained as to the arrest, etc., is admitted to be true, with the qualification only that the eighty odd laundries referred to are in wooden buildings without scaffolds on the roofs.

It is also admitted "that petitioner and two hundred of his countrymen similarly situated petitioned the board of supervisors for permission to continue their business in the various houses which they had been occupying and using for laundries for more than twenty years, and such petitions were denied, and all the petitions of those who were not Chinese, with one exception of Mrs. Mary Meagles were granted."

By section 2 of article XI of the Constitution of California it is provided that "Any county, city, town or township may make and enforce within its limits all such local, police, sanitary and other regulations as are not in conflict with other general laws."

By section 74 of the Act of April 19, 1856, usually known as the Consolidation Act, the board of supervisors is empowered, among other things, "to provide by regulation for the prevention and summary removal of nuisances to public health, the prevention of contagious [360] diseases; * * * to prohibit the erection of wooden buildings within any fixed limits where the streets shall have been established and graded; * * * to regulate the sale, storage and use of gunpowder or other explosive or combustible materials and substances, and make all needful regulations for protection against fire; to make such regulations concerning the erection and use of buildings as may be necessary for the safety of the inhabitants."

The Supreme Court of California, in the opinion pronouncing the judgment of this case, said: "The board of supervisors, under the several statutes conferring authority upon it, has the power to prohibit or regulate all occupations which are against good morals, contrary to public order and decency, or dangerous to the public safety. Clothes washing is certainly not opposed to good morals or subversive of public order or decency, but when conducted in given localities it may be highly dangerous to the public safety. Of this fact the supervisors are made the judges, and, having taken action in the premises, we do not find that they have prohibited the establishment of laundries, but that they have, as they well might do, regulated the places at which they should be established, the character of the buildings in which they are to be maintained, etc. The process of washing is not prohibited by thus regulating the places at which and the surroundings by which it must be exercised. The order No. 1569 and section 68 of order No. 1587 are not in contravention of common right, or unjust, unequal, partial, or oppressive, in such sense as authorizes us in this proceeding to pronounce them invalid."

After answering the position taken in behalf of the petitioner, that the ordinances in question had been repealed, the court adds: "We have not deemed it necessary to discuss the question in the light of supposed infringement of petitioner's rights under the Constitution of the United States, for the reason that we think the principles upon which contention on that head can be based have in effect been set at rest by the cases of Barbier v. Connolly, 113 U. S. 27 [Bk. 28, L. ed. 923], and Soon Hing v. Crowley, 113 U. S. 703 [Bk. 28, L. ed. 1145]." The writ was accordingly discharged and the prisoner remanded.

In the other case the appellant, Wo Lee, petitioned for his discharge from an alleged illegal imprisonment, upon a state of facts, shown upon the record, precisely similar to that in the case of Yick Wo. [361] In disposing of the application, the learned Circuit Judge Sawyer, in his opinion, 26 Fed. Rep. 471, after quoting the ordinance in question, proceeded at length as follows:

"Thus, in a territory some ten miles wide by fifteen or more miles long, much of it still occupied as mere farming and pasturage lands, and much of it unoccupied sand banks, in many places without a building within a quarter or half a mile of each other, including the isolated and almost wholly unoccupied Goat Island, the right to carry on this, when properly guarded, harmless and necessary occupation, in a wooden building, is not made to depend upon any prescribed conditions giving a right to anybody complying with them, but upon the consent or arbitrary will of the board of supervisors. In three fourths of the territory covered by the ordinance there is no more need of prohibiting or regulating laundries than if they were located in any portion of the farming regions of the State. Hitherto the regulation of laundries has been limited to the thickly settled portions of the city. Why this unnecessary extension of the limits affected, if not designed to prevent the establishment of laundries, after a compulsory removal from their present locations, within practicable reach of the customers or their proprietors? And the uncontradicted petition shows that all Chinese applications are, in fact, denied, and those of Caucasians granted—thus, in fact making the discriminations, in the administration of the ordinance, which its terms permit. The fact that the right to give consent is reserved in the ordinance shows that carrying on the laundry business in wooden buildings is not deemed of itself necessarily dangerous. It must be apparent to every well informed mind that a fire, properly guarded, for laundry purposes, in a wooden building, is just as necessary as, and no more dangerous than, a fire for cooking purposes or for warming a house. If the ordinance under consideration is valid, then the board of supervisors can pass a valid ordinance preventing the maintenance, in a wooden building, of a cooking stove heating apparatus, or a restaurant, within the boundaries of the City and [362] County of San Francisco, without the consent of that body, arbitrarily given or withheld, as their prejudices or other motives may dictate. If it is competent for the board of supervisors to pass a valid ordinance prohibiting the inhabitants of San Francisco from following any ordinary, proper and necessary calling within the limits of the city and county, except at its arbitrary and unregulated discretion and special consent—and it can do so if this ordinance is valid—then it seems to us that there has been a wide departure from the principles that have heretofore been supposed to guard and protect the rights, property and liberties of the American people. And if, by an ordinance, general in its terms and form, like the one in question, by reserving an arbitrary discretion in the enacting body to grant or deny permission to engage in a proper and necessary calling, a discrimination against any class can be made in its execution, thereby evading and, in effect, nullifying the provisions of the National Constitution, then the insertion of provisions to guard the rights of every class and person in that instrument was a vain and futile act. The effect of the execution of this ordinance in the manner indicated in the record would seem to be necessarily to close up the many Chinese laundries now existing, or compel their owners to pull down their present buildings and reconstruct of brick or stone, or to drive them outside the City and County of San Francisco, to the adjoining counties, beyond the convenient reach of customers, either of which results would be little short of absolute confiscation of the large amount of property shown to be now and to have been for a long time invested in these occupations. If this would not be depriving such parties of their property without due process of law, it would be difficult to say what would effect that prohibited result. The necessary tendency, if not the specific purpose, of this ordinance, and of enforcing it in the manner indicated in the record, is to drive out of business all the numerous small laundries, especially those owned by Chinese, and give a monopoly of the business to the large institutions established and carried on by means of large associated Caucasian capital. If the facts [363] appearing on the face of the ordinance, on the petition and return, and admitted in the case, and shown by the notorious public and municipal history of the times, indicate a purpose to drive out the Chinese laundrymen, and not merely to regulate the business for the public safety, does it not disclose a case of violation of the provisions of the Fourteenth Amendment to the National Constitution, and of the Treaty between the United States and China, in more than one particular? * * * If this means prohibition of the occupation and a destruction of the business and property of the Chinese laundrymen in San Francisco—as it seems to us this must be the effect of executing the ordinance—and not merely the proper regulation of the business, then there is discrimination and a violation of other highly important rights secured by the Fourteenth Amendment and the Treaty. That it does mean prohibition, as to the Chinese, it seems to us must be apparent to every citizen of San Francisco who has been here long enough to be familiar with the course of an active and aggressive branch of public opinion and of public notorious events. Can a court be blind to what must be necessarily known to every intelligent person in the State? See Ah Kow v. Nunan, 5 Sawy. 560; Sparrow v. Strong, 3 Wall. 104 [70 U. S. bk. 18, L. ed. 49]; Brown v. Piper, 91 U. S. 42 [Bk. 23, L. ed. 201]."

But, in deference to the decision of the Supreme Court of California in the case of Yick Wo, and contrary to his own opinion as thus expressed, the circuit judge discharged the writ and remanded the prisoner.

Messrs. Hall McAllister, L. H. Van Schaick and D. L. Smoot, for plaintiff in error and appellant:

The occupation in question is necessary and harmless; and it is against natural right to make its exercise dependent upon the arbitrary will of the board of supervisors.

The ordinance is a legislative condemnation to heavy pains and penalties of all persons who wash clothes for hire in frame buildings, whether amounting to a nuisance or not; contrary to subdivision 8, section 9, article 1 of the United States Constitution, prohibiting bills of attainder.

See Dill. Mun. Corp. § 374; Yates v. Milwaukee, 10 Wall. 497 (77 U. S. bk. 19, L. ed. 984).

The immediate effect of the ordinance is to deprive the petitioners, and others similarly situated, of their property and property rights without due process of law.

If it be true that this system amounts to an enlargement of the law of nuisance, and that such a result is ultra vires the board of supervisors, then there has been a deprivation of property and property rights without due process of law, because the indispensable fact of nuisance has been ascertained and declared by the board of supervisors instead of the tribunals of the law.

The said ordinance is capable of being and is so operated and enforced as to discriminate against the petitioners and all other subjects of China, similarly conditioned, contrary to section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment, sections 1977 and 1979 R. S., and articles V and VI of the Treaty of 1868, and articles II and III of the Treaty of 1881 between the United States and China.

The record discloses that of the three hundred and twenty laundries in San Francisco, about three hundred and ten are constructed of wood, and about two hundred and forty of the three hundred and twenty are owned and conducted by subjects of China. The record also shows that the petitioner and about two hundred of his countrymen, similarly situated, applied to the board of supervisors for permission to continue their clothes washing business in the frame buildings which they have been occupying and using for many years.

The record also shows that not a single one of the petitions presented by the eighty who are not subjects of China has been refused. As a frank people, we cannot afford to disguise the fact that this record presents a case of practical discrimination of the rankest character.

No subject of China is permitted to wash clothes for hire in a house not made of brick or stone, while everyone of the eighty odd who are not subjects of China, are, with one lonely exception, permitted to do this identical thing, and pocket the increased profits thereof.

Messrs. Alfred Clarke and H. G. Sieberst, for defendant in error and appellee:

There is no admission that the proprietors of the eighty odd non-Chinese laundries applied for permits; and the truth is that only two of them had so applied.

There are about three hundred laundries in San Francisco, managed by Chinese. Some of them, perhaps ten, are in brick buildings, as required by law. The remainder are in wooden buildings, and some of them are circumstanced so favorably as regards location, etc., that they will doubtless receive the consent of the board of supervisors to carry on their business. Others are highly dangerous and a great detriment to the neighborhood in which they are situated.

The board of supervisors of San Francisco, who understand this question, do not desire to suppress this useful business, neither do they desire to exclude it arbitrarily from certain limits, but they desire to get rid of its dangerous features, and to transfer the business from wood to brick buildings in all cases where the wooden building is dangerous to adjacent property. There is no hardship in this change, and it must be enforced, and has been enforced without partiality.

There is a peculiarity connected with these three hundred laundries which invites attention. They have a central government, which is known as the Tung Hing Tong Association. It employs very able attorneys to resist all such regulations as are inconvenient to its members, and this fact explains the many defeats which the city has suffered in the laundry order litigation. All the white laundrymen who have failed to comply with the law are under arrest.

The Tung Hing Tong resisted every laundry order passed by the board of supervisors from 1880 till 1885, and in consequence of this resistance and delay resulting from legal proceedings, the novel spectacle was witnessed in an American city of a colony of foreigners who governed themselves, made and executed their own laws, and successfully resisted the enforcement of the regulations of the municipal government of San Francisco.

Order 1559 was invalidated by the decision in People v. Ah Ling, May 7, 1881.

Order 1679, passed June 10, 1882, was invalidated by the circuit court, July, 1883, in Re Quong Woo, 7 Sawy. 526.

Order 1691, passed October 21, 1882, was taken to the Supreme Court of the United States; Re Tom Tong, 108 U. S. 556 (Bk. 27, L. ed. 826); Re Hung Hang, 108 U.S. 552 (Bk. 27, L. ed. 811), decided May 7, 1883, and the city, unable to enforce the order, repealed it June 25, 1883, by the passage of Order 1719.

Order 1719 was invalidated by the Supreme Court of Oakland; Re Woo Yek, 12 Pac. C. L. J. December 10, 1883.

During all of this protracted and successful resistance, it was impossible to enforce the municipal regulations in regard to laundries.

We claim that the city has power to adopt the section we are examining under article XI., section 11, of the Constitution, "to make and enforce within its limits all such local, police, sanitary and other regulations as are not in conflict with general laws."

The police power of the State extends to the regulation of this business by excluding it from certain limits.

[365] Mr. Justice Matthews delivered the opinion of the court:

In the case of the petitioner, brought here by writ of error to the Supreme Court of California, our jurisdiction is limited to the question whether the plaintiff in error has been denied a right in violation of the Constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States. The question whether his imprisonment is illegal, under the Constitution and laws of the State, is not open [366] to us. And although that question might have been considered in the circuit court in the application made to it, and by this court on appeal from its order, yet judicial propriety is best consulted by accepting the judgment of the state court upon the points involved in that inquiry.

That, however, does not preclude this court from putting upon the ordinances of the supervisors of the County and City of San Francisco an independent construction; for the determination of the question whether the proceedings under these ordinances and in enforcement of them are in conflict with the Constitution and laws of the United States, necessarily involves the meaning of the ordinances, which, for that purpose, we are required to ascertain and adjudge.

We are consequently constrained, at the outset, to differ from the Supreme Court of California upon the real meaning of the ordinances in question. That court considered these ordinances as vesting in the board of supervisors a not unusual discretion in granting or withholding their assent to the use of wooden buildings as laundries, to be exercised in reference to the circumstances of each case, with a view to the protection of the public against the dangers of fire. We are not able to concur in that interpretation of the power conferred upon the supervisors. There is nothing in the ordinances which points to such a regulation of the business of keeping and conducting laundries. They seem intended to confer, and actually do confer, not a discretion to be exercised upon a consideration of the circumstances of each case, but a naked and arbitrary power to give or withhold consent, not only as to places, but as to persons. So that, if an applicant for such consent, being in every way a competent and qualified person, and having complied with every reasonable condition demanded by any public interest, should, failing to obtain the requisite consent of the supervisors to the prosecution of his business, apply for redress by the judicial process of mandamus to require the supervisors to consider and act upon his case, it would be a sufficient answer for them to say that the law had conferred upon them authority to withhold their assent, without reason and without responsibility. The power given to them is not confided to their discretion in the legal sense of that term, but is granted to their [367] mere will. It is purely arbitrary, and acknowledges neither guidance nor restraint.

This erroneous view of the ordinances in question led the Supreme Court of California into the further error of holding that they were justified by the decisions of this court in the cases of Barbier v. Connolly, 113 U. S. 27 [Bk. 28, L. ed. 923], and Soon Hing v. Crowley, 113 U. S. 703 [Bk. 28, L. ed. 1145]. In both of these cases the ordinance involved was simply a prohibition to carry on the washing and ironing of clothes in public laundries and washhouses, within certain prescribed limits of the City and County of San Francisco, from ten o'clock at night until six o'clock in the morning of the following day. This provision was held to be purely a police regulation, within the competency of any municipality possessed of the ordinary powers belonging to such bodies; a necessary measure of precaution in a city composed largely of wooden buildings like San Francisco, in the application of which there was no invidious discrimination against anyone within the prescribed limits, all persons engaged in the same business being treated alike, and subject to the same restrictions, and entitled to the same privileges, under similar conditions.

For these reasons, that ordinance was adjudged not to be within the prohibitions of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, it was said, in the first case cited, "undoubtedly intended not only that there should be no arbitary deprivation of life or liberty, or arbitrary spoliation of property, but that equal protection and security should be given to all under like circumstances in the enjoyment of their personal and civil rights; that all persons should be equally entitled to pursue their happiness and acquire and enjoy property; that they should have like access to the courts of the country for the protection of their persons and property, the prevention and redress of wrongs, and the enforcement of contracts; that no impediment should be interposed to the pursuits of anyone, except as applied to the same pursuits by others under like circumstances; that no greater burdens should be laid upon one than are laid upon others in the same calling and condition; and that in the administration of criminal justice no different or higher punishment should be imposed upon one than such as is prescribed to all for like offenses. * * * Class legislation, discriminating against some and favoring others, is prohibited, but [368] legislation which, in carrying out a public purpose, is limited in its application, if within the sphere of its operation it affects alike all persons similarly situated, is not within the amendment."

The ordinance drawn in question in the present case is of a very different character. It does not prescribe a rule and conditions, for the regulation of the use of property for laundry purposes, to which all similarly situated may conform. It allows without restriction the use for such purposes of buildings of brick or stone; but, as to wooden buildings, constituting nearly all those in previous use, it divides the owners or occupiers into two classes, not having respect to their personal character and qualifications for the business, nor the situation and nature and adaptation of the buildings themselves, but merely by an arbitrary line, on one side of which are those who are permitted to pursue their industry by the mere will and consent of the supervisors, and on the other those from whom that consent is withheld, at their mere will and pleasure. And both classes are alike only in this: that they are tenants at will, under the supervisors, of their means of living. The ordinance, therefore, also differs from the not unusual case, where discretion is lodged by law in public officers or bodies to grant or withhold licenses to keep taverns, or places for the sale of spirituous liquors, and the like, when one of the conditions is that the applicant shall be a fit person for the exercise of the privilege, because in such cases the fact of fitness is submitted to the judgment of the officer, and calls for the exercise of a discretion of a judicial nature.

The rights of the petitioners, as affected by the proceedings of which they complain, are not less because they are aliens and subjects of the Emperor of China. By the third article of the Treaty between this government and that of China, concluded November 17, 1880, 22 Stat. at L. 827, it is stipulated: "If Chinese laborers, or Chinese of any other class, now either permanently or temporarily residing in the territory of the United States, meet with ill treatment at the hands of any other persons, the Government of the United States will exert all its powers to devise measures for their protection, and to secure to them the same rights, [369] privileges, immunities and exemptions as may be enjoyed by the citizens or subjects of the most favored nation, and to which they are entitled by treaty."

The Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution is not confined to the protection of citizens. It says: "Nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." These provisions are universal in their application, to all persons within the territorial jurisdiction, without regard to any differences of race, of color, or of nationality; and the equal protection of the laws is a pledge of the protection of equal laws. It is accordingly enacted by section 1977 of the Revised Statutes, that "All persons within the jurisdiction of the United States shall have the same right in every State and Territory to make and enforce contracts, to sue, be parties, give evidence, and to the full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of persons and property as is enjoyed by white citizens, and shall be subject to like punishments, pains, penalties, taxes, licenses and exactions of every kind, and to no other." The questions we have to consider and decide in these cases, therefore, are to be treated as involving the rights of every citizen of the United States equally with those of the strangers and aliens who now invoke the jurisdiction of the court.

It is contended on the part of the petitioners, that the ordinances for violations of which they are severally sentenced to imprisonment are void on their face, as being within the prohibitions of the Fourteenth Amendment, and, in the alternative, if not so, that they are void by reason of their administration operating unequally, so as to punish in the present petitioners what is permitted to others as lawful, without any distinction of circumstances; an unjust and illegal discrimination, it is claimed, which, though not made expressly, by the ordinances, is made possible by them.

When we consider the nature and the theory of our institutions of government, the principles upon which they are supposed to rest, and review the history of their development, we are constrained to conclude that they do not mean [370] to leave room for the play and action of purely personal and arbitrary power. Sovereignty itself is, of course, not subject to law, for it is the author and source of law; but in our system, while sovereign powers are delegated to the agencies of government, sovereignty itself remains with the people, by whom and for whom all government exists and acts. And the law is the definition and limitation of power. It is, indeed, quite true, that there must always be lodged somewhere, and in some person or body, the authority of final decision; and, in many cases of mere administration the responsibility is purely political, no appeal lying except to the ultimate tribunal of the public judgment, exercised either in the pressure of opinion or by means of the suffrage. But the fundamental rights to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, considered as individual possessions, are secured by those maxims of constitutional law which are the monuments showing the victorious progress of the race in securing to men the blessings of civilization under the reign of just and equal laws, so that, in the famous language of the Massachusetts Bill of Rights, the government of the Commonwealth "may be a government of laws and not of men." For, the very idea that one man may be compelled to hold his life, or the means of living, or any material right essential to the enjoyment of life, at the mere will of another, seems to be intolerable in any country where freedom prevails, as being the essence of slavery itself.

There are many illustrations that might be given of this truth, which would make manifest that it was self-evident in the light of our system of jurisprudence. The case of the political franchise of voting is one. Though not regarded strictly as a natural right, but as a privilege merely conceded by society, according to its will, under certain conditions, nevertheless it is regarded as a fundamental political right, because preservative of all rights.

In reference to that right, it was declared by the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, in Capen v. Foster, 12 Pick. 485, 488, in the words of Chief Justice Shaw, "that in all cases where the Constitution has conferred a political right or privilege, and where the Constitution has not particularly designated the manner in which that right is to be exercised, it is clearly within the just and constitutional limits of [37 the legislative power, to adopt any reasonable and uniform regulations, in regard to the time and mode of exercising that right, which are designed to secure and facilitate the exercise of such right, in a prompt, orderly and convenient manner;" nevertheless, "such a construction would afford no warrant for such an exercise of legislative power as, under the pretense and color of regulating, should subvert or injuriously restrain the right itself." It has accordingly been held generally in the States that, whether the particular provisions of an Act of legislation, establishing means for ascertaining the qualifications of those entitled to vote, and making previous registration in lists of such, a condition precedent to the exercise of the right, were or were not reasonable regulations, and accordingly valid or void, was always open to inquiry, as a judicial question. See Daggett v. Hudson, 1 West. Rep. 789, decided by the Supreme Court of Ohio, where many of the cases are collected; Monroe v. Collins, 17 Ohio St. 666.

The same principle has been more freely extended to the quasi legislative acts of inferior municipal bodies, in respect to which it is an ancient jurisdiction of judicial tribunals to pronounce upon the reasonableness and consequent validity of their by-laws. In respect to these, it was the doctrine that every by-law must be reasonable, not inconsistent with the charter of the corporation, nor with any statute of Parliament, nor with the general principles of the common law of the land, particularly those having relation to the liberty of the subject or the rights of private property. Dill. Mun. Corp. 3d ed. § 319, and cases cited in notes. Accordingly, in the case of State of Ohio, ex rel. etc. v. Cincinnati Gas Light & Coke Co. 18 Ohio St. 262, 300, an ordinance of the city council purporting to fix the price to be charged for gas, under an authority of law giving discretionary power to do so, was held to be bad, if passed in bad faith, fixing an unreasonable price, for the fraudulent purpose of compelling [372] the gas company to submit to an unfair appraisement of its works. And a similar question, very pertinent to the one in the present cases, was decided by the Court of Appeals of Maryland, in the case of Baltimore v. Radecke, 49 Md. 217. In that case the defendant had erected and used a steam engine, in the prosecution of his business as a carpenter and boxmaker in the City of Baltimore, under a permit from the mayor and city council, which contained a condition that the engine was "to be removed after six months' notice to that effect from the mayor." After such notice and refusal to conform to it, a suit was instituted to recover the penalty provided by the ordinance, to restrain the prosecution of which a bill in equity was filed. The court holding the opinion that "there may be a case in which an ordinance, passed under grants of power like those we have cited, is so clearly unreasonable, so arbitrary, oppressive, or partial, as to raise the presumption that the Legislature never intended to confer the power to pass it, and to justify the courts in interfering and setting it aside as a plain abuse of authority," it proceeds to speak, with regard to the ordinance in question, in relation to the use of steam engines, as follows: "It does not profess to prescribe regulations for their construction, location, or use, nor require such precautions and safeguards to be provided by those who own and use them as are best calculated to render them less dangerous to life and property; nor does it restrain their use in box factories and other similar establishments within certain defined limits, nor in any other way attempt to promote their safety and security without destroying their usefulness. But it commits to the unrestrained will of a single public officer the power to notify every person who now employs a steam engine in the prosecution of any business in the City of Baltimore, to cease to do so, and by providing compulsory fines for every day's disobedience of such notice and order of removal, renders his power over the use of steam in that city practically absolute, so that he may prohibit its use altogether. But if he should not choose to do this, but only to act in particular cases, there is nothing in the ordinance to guide or control his action. It lays down no rules by which its impartial execution can be secured or partiality [373] and oppression prevented. It is clear that giving and enforcing these notices may, and quite likely will, bring ruin to the business of those against whom they are directed, while others, from whom they are withheld, may be actually benefited by what is thus done to their neighbors; and, when we remember that this action or non-action may proceed from enmity or prejudice, from partisan zeal or animosity, from favoritism and other improper influences and motives easy of concealment and difficult to be detected and exposed, it becomes unnecessary to suggest or comment upon the injustice capable of being wrought under cover of such a power, for that becomes apparent to every one who gives to the subject a moment's consideration. In fact, an ordinance which clothes a single individual with such power hardly falls within the domain of law, and we are constrained to pronounce it inoperative and void."

This conclusion, and the reasoning on which it is based, are deductions from the face of the ordinance, as to its necessary tendency and ultimate actual operation. In the present cases, we are not obliged to reason from the probable to the actual and pass upon the validity of the ordinances complained of, as tried merely by the opportunities which their terms afford, of unequal and unjust discrimination in their administration. For the cases present the ordinances in actual operation, and the facts shown establish an administration directed so exclusively against a particular class of persons as to warrant and require the conclusion that whatever may have been the intent of the ordinances as adopted, they are applied by the public authorities charged with their administration, and thus representing the State itself, with a mind so unequal and oppressive as to amount to a practical denial by the State of that equal protection of the laws which is secured to the petitioners, as to all other persons, by the broad and benign provisions of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States. Though the law itself be fair on its face and impartial in appearance, yet, if it is applied and administered by public authority with an evil eye and an unequal hand, so as prac- [374] tically to make unjust and illegal discriminations between persons in similar circumstances, material to their rights, the denial of equal justice is still within the prohibition of the Constitution. This principle of interpretation has been sanctioned by this court in Henderson v.

Mayor, etc. of New York, 92 U. S. 259 [Bk. 23, L. ed. 543]; Chy Lung v. Freeman, 92 U. S. 275 [Bk. 23, L. ed. 550]; Ex parte Va. 100 U. S. 339 [Bk. 25, L. ed. 676]; Neal v. Delaware, 103 U. S. 370 [Bk. 26, L. ed. 267], and Soon Hing v. Crowley [supra].

The present cases, as shown by the facts disclosed in the record, are within this class. It appears that both petitioners have complied with every requisite, deemed by the law or by the public officers charged with its administration necessary for the protection of neighboring property from fire, or as a precaution against injury to the public health. No reason whatever, except the will of the supervisors, is assigned why they should not be permitted to carry on, in the accustomed manner, their harmless and useful occupation, on which they depend for a livelihood. And while this consent of the supervisors is withheld from them and from two hundred others who have also petitioned, all of whom happened to be Chinese subjects, eighty others, not Chinese subjects, are permitted to carry on the same business under similar conditions. The fact of this discrimination is admitted. No reason for it is shown, and the conclusion cannot be resisted, that no reason for it exists except hostility to the race and nationalty to which the petitioners belong, and which in the eye of the law is not justified. The discrimination is therefore illegal, and the public administration which enforces it is a denial of the equal protection of the laws and a violation of the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution. The imprisonment of the petitioners is therefore illegal, and they must be discharged.

To this end, the judgment of the Supreme Court of California in the case of Yick Wo, and that of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of California in the case of Wo Lee, are severally reversed, and the cases remanded, each to the proper court, with directions to discharge the petitioners from custody and imprisonment.

UNITED STATES, Plff.,

v.

KAGAMA, alias "PACTAH BILLY," an Indian, AND MAHAWAHA, alias "BEN," an Indian.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 375–385.)

Constitutional law—criminal jurisdiction of territorial courts over crimes committed by Indians—relations of Indian Tribes to the Federal and State Governments.

*1. The ninth section of the Indian Appropriation Act of March 3, 1885 (Sess. Acts, p. 385), is valid and constitutional in both its branches; namely, that which gives jurisdiction to the courts of the Territories, of the crimes named committed by Indians within the Territories, and that which gives jurisdiction in like cases to the courts of the United States for the same crimes committed on an Indian Reservation within a State of the Union.

2. The crimes mentioned in the Act are murder, manslaughter, rape, assault with intent to kill, arson, burglary and larceny.

3. While the Government of the United States has recognized in the Indian Tribes heretofore a state of semi-independence and pupilage, it has the right and authority, instead of controlling them by treaties, to govern them by Acts of Congress, because they are within the geographical limit of the United States, and are necessarily subject to the laws which Congress may enact for their protection and for the protection of the people with whom they come in contact.

4. The States have no such power over them as long as they maintain their tribal relations. They owe no allegiance to a State within which their reservation may be established, and the State gives them no protection.

*Head notes by Mr. Justice MILLER.

Argued March 2, 1886. Decided May 10, 1886.

ON a certificate of division in opinion between the Judges of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of California. Jurisdiction sustained.

The case is stated by the court.

Messrs. John Goode, Solicitor-Gen., and A. H. Garland, Atty-Gen., for plaintiff.

Mr. Joseph D. Redding, for defendants.

Mr. Justice Miller delivered the opinion of the court:

The case is brought here by certificate of division of opinion between the Circuit Judge and the District Judge holding the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of California.

The questions certified arise on a demurrer to an indictment against two Indians for murder committed on the Indian Reservation of Hoopa Valley in the State of California, the person murdered being also an Indian of said Reservation.

Though there are six questions certified as the subject of difference, the point of them all is well set out in the third and sixth, which are as follows:

"3. Whether the provisions of said section 9 [37
(of the Act of Congress of March 3, 1885), making it a crime for one Indian to commit murder upon another Indian upon an Indian Reservation situated wholly within the limits of a State of the Union, and making such Indian so committing the crime of murder within and upon such Indian Reservation 'subject to the same laws' and subject to be 'tried in the same courts and in the same manner, and subject to the same penalties as are all other persons' committing the crime of murder 'within the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States,' is a constitutional and valid law of the United States."

"6. Whether the courts of the United States have jurisdiction or authority to try and punish an Indian belonging to an Indian Tribe for committing the crime of murder upon another Indian belonging to the same Indian Tribe, both sustaining the usual tribal relations, said crime having been committed upon an Indian Reservation made and set apart for the use of the Indian Tribe to which said Indians both belong."

The indictment sets out in two counts that Kagama, alias Pactah Billy, an Indian, murdered Iyouse, alias Ike, another Indian, at Humboldt County, in the State of California, within the limits of the Hoopa Valley Reservation; and it charges Mahawaha, alias Ben, also an Indian, with aiding and abetting in the murder.

The law referred to in the certificate is the last section of the Indian Appropriation Act of that year, and is as follows:

"Sec. 9. That immediately upon and after the date of the passage of this Act all Indians committing against the person or property of another Indian or other person any of the following crimes; namely, murder, manslaughter, rape, assault with intent to kill, arson, burglary and larceny, within any Territory of the United States, and either within or without the Indian Reservation, shall be subject therefor to the laws of said Territory relating to said crimes, and shall be tried therefor in the same courts and in the same manner, and shall be subject to the same penalties, as are all other persons charged with the commission of the said crimes respectively; and said courts are hereby given jurisdiction in all such cases; and all such In-[377] dians committing any of the above described crimes against the person or property of another Indian or other person, within the boundaries of any State of the United States, and within the limits of any Indian Reservation, shall be subject to the same laws, tried in the same courts and in the same manner, and subject to the same penalties, as are all other persons committing any of the above crimes within the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States."

The above enactment is clearly separable into two distinct definitions of the conditions under which Indians may be punished for the same crimes as defined by the common law. The first of these is where the offense is committed within the limits of a territorial government, whether on or off an Indian Reservation. In this class of cases the Indian charged with the crime shall be judged by the laws of the Territory on that subject, and tried by its courts. This proposition itself is new in legislation of Congress, which has heretofore only undertaken to punish an Indian who sustains the usual relation to his Tribe, and who commits the offense in the Indian country, or on an Indian Reservation, in exceptional cases; as where the offense was against the person or property of a white man, or was some violation of the trade and intercourse regulations imposed by Congress on the Indian Tribes. It is new, because it now proposes to punish these offenses when they are committed by one Indian on the person or property of another.

The second is where the offense is committed by one Indian against the person or property of another, within the limits of a State of the Union, but on an Indian Reservation. In this case, of which the State and its tribunals would have jurisdiction if the offense was committed by a white man outside an Indian Reservation, the courts of the United States are to exercise jurisdiction as if the offense had been committed at some place within the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States. The first clause subjects all Indians, guilty of these crimes committed within the limits of a Territory, to the laws of that Territory, and to its courts for trial. The second, which applies solely to offenses by Indians which are committed within the limits of a State and the limits of a Reservation, subjects [378] the offenders to the laws of the United States, passed for the government of places under the exclusive jurisdiction of those laws, and to trial by the courts of the United States. This is a still further advance as asserting this jurisdiction over the Indians within the limits of the States of the Union.

Although the offense charged in this indictment was committed within a State and not within a Territory, the considerations which are necessary to a solution of the problem in regard to the one must in a large degree affect the other.

The Constitution of the United States is almost silent in regard to the relations of the Government which were established by it to the numerous Tribes of Indians within its borders.

In declaring the basis on which representation in the lower branch of the Congress and direct taxation should be apportioned, it was fixed that it should be according to numbers, excluding Indians not taxed, which, of course, excluded nearly all of that race, but which meant that if there were such within a State as were taxed to support the Government they should be counted for representation, and in the computation for direct taxes levied by the United States. This expression, excluding Indians not taxed, is found in the Fourteenth Amendment, where it deals with the same subject under the new conditions produced by the emancipation of the slaves. Neither of these shed much light on the power of Congress over the Indians in their existence as Tribes distinct from the ordinary citizens of a State or Territory.

The mention of Indians in the Constitution which has received most attention is that found in the clause which gives Congress "power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States, and with the Indian Tribes."

This clause is relied on in the argument in the present case, the proposition being that the statute under consideration is a regulation of commerce with the Indian Tribes. But we think it would be a very strained construction of this clause, that a system of criminal laws for Indians living peaceably in their Reservations, which left out the entire code of trade and intercourse laws justly enacted under that provision, and established punishments for the common-law crimes of murder, manslaughter, arson, burglary, larceny, and the like, without [379] any reference to their relation to any kind of commerce, was authorized by the grant of power to regulate commerce with the Indian Tribes. While we are not able to see in either of these clauses of the Constitution and its Amendments any delegation of power to enact a code of criminal law for the punishment of the worst class of crimes known to civilized life when committed by Indians, there is a suggestion in the manner in which the Indian Tribes are introduced into that clause, which may have a bearing on the subject before us. The commerce with foreign Nations is distinctly stated as submitted to the control of Congress. Were the Indian Tribes foreign Nations? If so, they came within the first of the three clases of commerce mentioned and did not need to be repeated as Indian Tribes. Were they nations, in the minds of the framers of the Constitution? If so, the natural phrase would have been "foreign Nations and Indian Nations," or, in the terseness of language uniformly used by the framers of the instrument, it would naturally have been "foreign and Indian Nations." And so in the case of Cherokee Nation v. Georgia, brought in the Supreme Court of the United States, under the declaration that the judicial power extends to suits between a State and foreign States, and giving to the supreme court original jurisdiction where a State is a party, it was conceded that Georgia as a State came within the clause, but held that the Cherokees were not a State or nation within the meaning of the Constitution, so as to be able to maintain the suit. 5 Pet. 20 [30 U. S. bk. 8, L. ed. 32].

But these Indians are within the geographical limits of the United States. The soil and the people within these limits are under the political control of the Government of the United States, or of the States of the Union. There exists within the broad domain of sovereignty but these two. There may be cities, counties, and other organized bodies with limited legislative functions, but they are all derived from, or exist in, subordination to one or the other of these. The territorial governments owe all their powers to the statutes of the United States conferring on them the powers which they exercise, and which are liable to be withdrawn, modified, or repealed at any time by Congress. [380] What authority the state governments may have to enact criminal laws for the Indians will be presently considered. But this power of Congress to organize territorial governments, and make laws for their inhabitants, arises not so much from the clause in the Constitution in regard to disposing of and making rules and regulations concerning the territory and other property of the United States as from the ownership of the country in which the Territories are, and the right of exclusive sovereignty which must exist in the National Government, and can be found nowhere else. Murphy v. Ramsey, 114 U. S. 44 [Bk. 29, L. ed. 47.]

In the case of American Ins. Co. v. Canter, 1 Pet. 542 [26 U. S. bk. 7, L. ed. 242] in which the condition of the people of Florida, then under a territorial government, was under consideration, Marshall, Chief Justice, said: "Perhaps the power of governing a Territory belonging to the United States which has not, by becoming a State, acquired the means of self-government, may result necessarily from the fact that it is not within the jurisdiction of any particular State, and is within the power and jurisdiction of the United States. The right to govern may be the inevitable consequence of the right to acquire territory. Whichever may be the source whence the power is derived, the possession of it is unquestionable."

In the case of U. S. v. Rogers, 4 How. 572 [45 U. S. bk. 11, L. ed. 1107], where a white man pleaded in abatement to an indictment for murder committed in the country of the Cherokee Indians, that he had been adopted by and become a member of the Cherokee Tribe, Chief Justice Taney said: "The country in which the crime is charged to have been committed is a part of the territory of the United States and not within the limits of any State. It is true it is occupied by the Cherokee Indians, but it has been assigned to them and they hold with the assent and under the authority of the United States." After referring to the policy of the European Nations and the United States in asserting dominion over all the country discovered by them, and the justice of this course, he adds: "But had it been otherwise, and were the right and propriety of exercising this power now open to question, yet it is a question for the law-making and political departments of [381 the Government and not for the judicial. It is our duty to expound and execute the law as we find it; and we think it too firmly and clearly established to admit of dispute that the Indian Tribes, residing within the territorial limits of the United States, are subject to their authority, and when the country occupied by one of them is not within the limits of one of these, Congress may by law punish every offense committed there, no matter whether the offender be a white man or an Indian."

The Indian Reservation in the case before us is land bought by the United States from Mexico by the Treaty of Guadaloupe Hidalgo, and the whole of California, with the allegiance of its inhabitants, many of whom were Indians, was transferred by that Treaty to the United States.

The relation of the Indian Tribes living within the borders of the United States, both before and since the Revolution, to the people of the United States has always been an anomalous one and of a complex character.

Following the policy of the European Governments in the discovery of America towards the Indians who were found here, the Colonies before the Revolution, and the States and the United States since, have recognized in the Indians a possessory right to the soil over which they roamed and hunted and established occasional villages. But they asserted an ultimate title in the land itself, by which the Indian Tribes were forbidden to sell or transfer it to other nations or peoples without the consent of this paramount authority. When a Tribe wished to dispose of its land or any part of it, or the State or the United States wished to purchase it, a treaty with the Tribe was the only mode in which this could be done. The United States recognized no right in private persons, or in other nations, to make such a purchase by treaty or otherwise. With the Indians themselves these relations are equally difficult to define. They were, and always have been, regarded as having a semi-independent position when they preserved their tribal relations: not [38 as States, not as Nations, not as possessed of the full attributes of sovereignty, but as a separate people, with the power of regulating their internal and social relations, and thus far not brought under the laws of the Union or of the State within whose limits they resided.

Perhaps the best statement of their position is found in the two opinions of this court by Chief Justice Marshall in the case of the Cherokee Nation v. Georgia, 5 Pet. 1 [30 U. S. bk. 8, L. ed. 25], and in the case of Worcester v. Georgia, 6 Pet. 536 [31 U. S. bk. 8, L. ed. 492]. These opinions are exhaustive; and in the separate opinion of Mr. Justice Baldwin in the former is a very valuable résumé of the treaties and statutes concerning the Indian Tribes previous to and during the confederation.

In the first of the above cases it was held that these Tribes were neither States nor Nations, had only some of the attributes of sovereignty, and could not be so far recognized in that capacity as to sustain a suit in the Supreme Court of the United States. In the second case it was said that they were not subject to the jurisdiction asserted over them by the State of Georgia, which, because they were within its limits, where they had been for ages, had attempted to extend her laws and the jurisdiction of her courts over them.

In the opinions in these cases they are spoken of as "wards of the Nation," "pupils," as local dependent communities. In this spirit the United States has conducted its relations to them from its organization to this time. But, after an experience of a hundred years of the treaty-making system of government, Congress has determined upon a new departure—to govern them by Acts of Congress. This is seen in the Act of March 3, 1871, embodied in section 2079 of the Revised Statutes:

"No Indian Nation or Tribe, within the territory of the United States, shall be acknowledged, or recognized as an independent Nation, Tribe, or power, with whom the United States may contract by treaty; but no obligation of any treaty lawfully made and ratified with any such Indian Nation or Tribe prior to March 3, 1871, shall be hereby invalidated or impaired."

The case of Crow Dog, 109 U. S. 556 [Bk. 27, L. ed. 1030], in which an agreement with the Sioux Indians, ratified by an Act of Con-[383] gress, was supposed to extend over them the laws of the United States and the jurisdiction of its courts, covering murder and other grave crimes, shows the purpose of Congress in this new departure. The decision in that case admits that if the intention of Congress had been to punish, by the United States Courts, the murder of one Indian by another, the law would have been valid. But the court could not see, in the agreement with the Indians sanctioned by Congress, a purpose to repeal section 2146 of the Revised Statutes which expressly excludes from that jurisdiction the case of a crime committed by one Indian against another in the Indian country. The passage of the Act now under consideration was designed to remove that objection, and to go further by including such crimes on Reservations lying within a State.

Is this latter fact a fatal objection to the law? The statute itself contains no express limitation upon the powers of a State or the jurisdiction of its courts. If there be any limitation in either of these, it grows out of the implication arising from the fact that Congress has defined a crime committed within the State, and made it punishable in the courts of the United States. But Congress has done this, and can do it, with regard to all offenses relating to matters to which the federal authority extends. Does that authority extend to this case?

It will be seen at once that the nature of the offense (murder) is one which in most all cases of its commission is punishable by the laws of the States, and within the jurisdiction of their courts. The distinction is claimed to be that the offense under the statute is committed by an Indian, that it is committed on a Reservation set apart within the State for residence of the Tribe of Indians by the United States, and the fair inference is that the offending Indian shall belong to that or some other Tribe. It does not interfere with the process of the state courts within the Reservation, nor with the operation of state laws upon white people found there. Its effect is confined to the acts of an Indian of some Tribe, of a criminal character, committed within the limits of the Reservation.

It seems to us that this is within the competency of Congress. These Indian Tribes are the wards of the Nation. They are communities dependent on the United States; dependent [384] largely for their daily food; dependent for their political rights. They owe no allegiance to the States, and receive from them no protection. Because of the local ill feeling, the people of the States where they are found are often their deadliest enemies. From their very weakness and helplessness, so largely due to the course of dealing of the Federal Government with them and the treaties in which it has been promised, there arises the duty of protection, and with it the power. This has always been recognized by the Executive and by Congress, and by this court whenever the question has arisen.

In the case of Worcester v. Georgia, 6 Pet. 515 [31 U. S. bk. 8, L. ed. 483], it was held that, though the Indians had by treaty sold their land within that State, and agreed to remove away, which they had failed to do, the State could not, while they remained on those lands, extend its laws, criminal and civil, over the Tribes; that the duty and power to compel their removal was in the United States, and the Tribe was under their protection, and could not be subjected to the laws of the State and the process of its courts.

The same thing was decided in the case of Fellows v. Blacksmith, 19 How. 366 [60 U. S. bk. 15, L. ed. 684]. In this case, also, the Indians had sold their lands under supervision of the States of Massachusetts and of New York, and had agreed to remove within a given time. When the time came a suit to recover some of the land was brought in the Supreme Court of New York, which gave judgment for the plaintiff. But this court held, on writ of error, that the State could not enforce this removal, but the duty and the power to do so was in the United States. See also the case of the Kansas Indians, 5 Wall. 737 [72 U. S. bk. 18, L. ed. 667]; New York Indians, 5 Wall. 761 [72 U. S. bk. 18, L. ed. 708].

The power of the General Government over these remnants of a race once powerful, now weak and diminished in numbers, is necessary to their protection, as well as to the safety of those among whom they dwell. It must exist in that Government, because it never has existed anywhere else, because the theater of its exercise is within the geographical limits of the United States, because it has never been [385] denied, and because it alone can enforce its laws on all the Tribes.

We answer the questions propounded to us, that the 9th section of the Act of March 3, 1885, is a valid law in both its branches, and that the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of California has jurisdiction of the offense charged in the indictment in this case.

Removal of causes—separable controversy—burden of proof.

1. Where, upon the face of the complaint, the suit is but a single cause of action for the wrongful pollution of the water of the plaintiff's canal by the united action of all of the defendants working together, the controversy arising is not separable for the purpose of removal, even though the defendants answer separately, setting up separate defenses.

2. Where the petition for removal alleges that certain defendants were wrongfully made defendants for the purpose of preventing the removal, the burden of proof to establish that fact is on the petitioner.

Submitted April 26, 1886. Decided, May 10, 1886.

APPEAL from and in error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of California. Affirmed.

The case is stated by the court.

Mr. John H. Boalt, for appellants and plaintiffs in error.

Mr. J. H. McKune, for appellee and defendant in error.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opin-[265] ion of the court.

The Amador and Sacramento Canal Company, a California corporation, brought suit in the Superior Court of Sacramento County, California, against the Plymouth Consolidated Gold Mining Company, a New York corporation, and Alvinza Hayward, E. L. Montgomery, and Walter S. Hobart, citizens of California, to enjoin them from polluting the waters running into the canal of the Amador Company, and to recover $25,000 damages for what had already been done in that way. The material averments in the complaint, as to the alleged wrongful acts of the defendants, are as follows:

"III. That the plaintiff is, and for more than ten years last past has been, the owner in fee and in possession of a certain canal, about 26 miles long, situate partly in the County of Amador, in said State, and partly in said County of Sacramento, called the Amador and Sacramento Canal, extending from a dam across the Cosumnes River, near the southeast corner of section twenty, in township eight north, range nine east, Mount Diablo base and meridian, in said County of Amador, to Sebastopol, in said County of Sacramento, in section sixteen, township seven north, range seven east, Mount Diablo base and meridian; and is also the owner of the water usually flowing through said canal, and has used the said canal and water during all of said period of ten years for mining and agricultural purposes, and selling water for such purposes.

"IV. That the defendant, the Plymouth Consolidated Gold Mining Company, is the owner of two certain mills, situate at Plymouth, in said County of Amador, constructed and used for crushing gold-bearing quartz, and since the 2d day of January, 1882, has been such owner, and the defendants for three years next before the commencement of this action have, at said mills, carried on and conducted the business of crushing gold-bearing quartz rock and extracting and collecting gold therefrom, and have used large quantities of water in and about their business taken from the Moquelumne River.

"V. That from the said mills, the Corporation defendant, extending in a direction a little north of west, has a valley through which runs [266
Little Indian Creek until it intersects the said canal of plaintiff near the southeast corner of section four, in township seven north, range nine east, Mount Diablo base and meridian; and the defendants, since the first day of December, 1881, have used the said creek at their said mills as a dumping place for the tailings, sand, sediment, silt and other débris flowing to and formed by the working of said mills.

"VI. That in and about the working and management of said mills the defendants use large quantities of water taken from the Moquelumne River and other streams by them, and which water, mixed, defiled and polluted with said tailings, sand, quartz sand, sediment, silt and other débris, has been, during the three years next before the commencement of this action, poured into said creek and carried by said water in said creek to and into the said canal of plaintiff.

"VII. That the said water so mixed, polluted and defiled by the defendants, and discharged by them into the plaintiff's canal as aforesaid, has, during all of said three years, mingled with the pure water flowing in the said canal, and has deposited therein all the said tailings, sand, quartz sand, sediment, silt and other débris as aforesaid, and the same has been swept along the said canal of plaintiff by the force of the water flowing therein, and has been distributed and deposited therein, and thereby the bed of the said canal became and was raised, and the canal obstructed and damaged, and filled up and rendered unfit for use, and the water in said canal became loaded with said débris, and thereby rendered less useful."

The Plymouth Company answered separately, setting forth that it was a New York corporation whose powers were by law vested in seven trustees, of whom the defendants Hayward and Hobart were two, and that Montgomery was the superintendent of its mines and mills in California. The answer then admitted that the Corporation was the owner of the mills mentioned in the complaint, and that "It has at said mills carried on and conducted the business of crushing gold-bearing quartz rock and extracting and collecting gold therefrom, and used large quantities of water in and about said business, and that some of said water was taken from the Moque- [26 lumne River; but it denies that all of said water was taken therefrom, and it denies that it has during the time alleged in the complaint, or at any other time or at all, carried on or conducted at said mills, or either of them or elsewhere, the said business, or any business, or has used large quantities of water or any water, in or about said business or otherwise, in connection with the other defendants mentioned in the complaint, or either of them; but, on the contrary, this defendant avers that said business has been carried on and conducted and said water has been used by this defendant exclusively and for its sole use and benefit and without any connection or combination with the other defendants in this action, or either of them, and that this defendant has not had, during any of the times mentioned in the complaint, and does not now have, any connection or relation with the said Hayward or Hobart or Montgomery other than such official relation aforesaid."

After this the separate defense of the Corporation to the action was set forth, to the effect that the Company was operating its mills under a license from the Amador Company, which justified all that had been done for which the suit had been brought. Hayward, Montgomery and Hutchinson filed their separate answer, in which they denied each and every allegation in the complaint against them in connection with the Plymouth Company or otherwise. After the filing of their answer, the Plymouth Company presented to the court a petition for the removal of the suit to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of California, the material parts of which, aside from a statement of the citizenship of the parties, according to the facts, are as follows:

"But your petitioner avers and shows to the court that in the said suit above mentioned there is a controversy which is wholly between citizens of different States, and which can be fully determined as between them, to wit: a controversy between your petitioner and said Amador and Sacramento Canal Company, and that said two Corporations are the sole and only parties interested in said controversy.

"That said defendants, Alvinza Hayward, E. L. Montgomery and Walter S. Hobart, are not, nor is either of them, a necessary or proper party defendant in said action.

[268] "That said defendants, Alvinza Hayward, E. L. Montgomery and Walter S. Hobart, and each of them, are nominal and formal parties defendant to said suit, and they, nor either of them, have any interest in the said controversy, and they, nor either of them, are actual, real or necessary parties defendant, but are sham defendants sued in said action with your petitioner, as it avers on information and belief, with the object, purpose, intent and design of endeavoring thereby to prevent the removal of said cause into the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of California by your petitioner, who is the real defendant therein.

"That said Alvinza Hayward and Walter S. Hobart are stockholders and officers of your petitioner, to wit: two of the members of its board of seven trustees, and they have not, nor has either of them, any interest in the said controversy other than as such officers or stockholders.

"The said defendant E. L. Montgomery, is the superintendent of the mines and mills of your petitioner, and has no interest whatever in said controversy.

"That all the acts and grievances complained of and alleged to have been done by said defendants, if any such were done, were the sole acts of your petitioner.

"And your petitioner avers and shows that the real litigation herein is between said plaintiff and your petitioner, citizens of different States, as aforesaid.

"And your petitioner further shows that it has not carried on or conducted any mining or milling business in connection with said defendants or with either of them.

"And your petitioner further shows that the matter and amount in dispute in the above entitled suit exceeds, exclusive of costs, the sum or value of five hundred dollars."

On the presentation of this petition the state court directed the removal of the suit, and proceeded no further. The case was docketed in the circuit court on the 19th of May, and on the 17th of June the Amador Company moved to remand, among others, on the following grounds:

"I. That the said suit does not really or substantially involve a dispute or controversy properly within the jurisdiction of said circuit court. [269]

* * * *

"III. Because the defendants did not all join in said petition for removal.

"IV. Because the defendants are not all residents or citizens of States other than California, and it does not appear that the parties defendants to said suit were or have been wrongfully joined as such.

"V. It does not appear from the record and papers on file in said circuit court that there is a controversy which is wholly between citizens of different States, which can be tried and which can be fully determined between them without involving necessarily a trial of the whole case as to all of the defendants."

In the notice which was given of this motion the following appears:

"On the hearing of said motion we will rely on and read in evidence:

"1. The transcript and record on file in said circuit court in said cause.

"2. Answer of the plaintiff to the petition of the Corporation defendant for a removal, herewith served.

"3. Affidavits of J. H. McKune, W. F. George and Jennie B. Ritter, herewith served; and,

"4. Also offer oral evidence."

None of the affidavits here referred to are found in the transcript, and there is no statement of any oral evidence that was produced.

The court heard the motion on the 27th of July and remanded the suit. From this order an appeal was taken and writ of error brought, and these have been docketed here as separate causes.

It was not necessary to docket the cause twice because it was brought here both by appeal and writ of error. Hurst v. Hollingsworth, 94 U. S. 111 [Bk. 24, L. ed. 31]. There was but one action in the court below, and there is but one record. The appeal and writ of error bring up but one order or judgment for review, and there is, therefore, but one case here.

Upon the face of the complaint there is in the suit but a single cause of action, and that is the wrongful pollution of the water of the [270] plaintiff's canal by the united action of all the defendants working together. Such being the case, the controversy was not separable for the purposes of a removal, even though the defendants answered separately, setting up separate defenses. Pirie v. Tvedt, 115 U. S. 41 [Bk. 29, L. ed. 331]; Sloane v. Anderson, 117 U. S. 278 [Bk. 29, L. ed. 891].

It is claimed, however, that, as the answers show that the Plymouth Company is the real defendant, and the petition alleges that the others are nominal parties only, and joined with that Company as "sham defendants" to prevent a removal, the suit must be treated as in legal effect against the New York Corporation alone, and, therefore, removable. So far as the complaint goes, all the defendants are necessary and proper parties. A judgment is asked against them all, both for an injunction and for money. Hayward and Hudson are admitted by the answer to be officers of the Corporation, and Montgomery its superintendent. These persons are all citizens of California, and amenable to process in that State. It is not denied that they are all actively engaged in the operations of the Company; and Montgomery, as the superintendent of its mines and mills, must necessarily be himself personally connected with the alleged wrongful acts for which the suit was brought. It is undoubtedly true that if the Company has a good defense to the action, that defense will inure to the benefit of all the other defendants; but it by no means follows that, if the Company is liable, the other defendants may not be equally so, and jointly with the Company. It is possible, also, that the Company may be guilty and the other defendants not guilty, but the plaintiff in its complaint says they are all guilty, and that presents the cause of action to be tried. Each party defends for himself, but until his defense is made out the case stands against him, and the rights of all must be governed accordingly. Under these circumstances the averments in the petition, that the defendants were wrongfully made to avoid a removal can be of no avail in the circuit court upon a motion to remand, until they are proven, and that, so far as the present record discloses, was not attempted. The affirmative of this issue was on [271] the petitioning defendant. That Corporation was the moving party, and was bound to make out its case.

The order remanding the cause is affirmed.

v.

MRS. MARY A. PIKE, Widow of WILLIAM S. PIKE, Deceased, and Natural Tutrix of the Minor, GERTRUDE D. PIKE; JOHN H. PIKE, EMMA C. PIKE, Widow of GRAY DOWSWELL, WILLIAM S. PIKE, JR., AND MARY L. PIKE.

Sale of lands in Louisiana under execution on credit with bond—subsequent sale under execution on bond—action at law by gratuitous donee of first purchaser—remedy.

1. Certain lands were sold under execution in Louisiana on August 3, 1861, on a credit of twelve months, with bond. On September 5, 1861, the purchaser made a gratuitous donation of the lands to the plaintiff, Marie P. Evans, without surrendering possession. The bond not having been paid, on January 6, 1866, the lands were sold under execution issued thereon to William S. Pike, one of the sureties. This suit was brought in 1871 by the plaintiffs, claiming under the donation, against said Pike, to recover the lands. Held, that the lands remained, after the first sale, subject to the judgment, and liable to an execution either on such judgment or on the bond; that the donee took the property subject to all charges in the same manner as the donor held it; and that said donee was not entitled to the delay and formalities of the hypothecary action and is bound by the sale under execution on the bond.

2. It seems that the remedy of the plaintiffs, if any, is a bill in equity to redeem.

Argued and submitted April 22, 1886. Decided May 10, 1886.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Louisiana Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. William Grant, for plaintiffs in error:

Four years prior to the seizure of the property under the writ of fieri facias against Ackley Perkins, the latter had transferred the legal title to Mrs. Evans by an act of donation. Pike's title was derived from Perkins through a proceeding against him, four years after he had thus parted with title, and to which Mrs. Evans was not a party.

He had possessed the property under his deed something over five years, when this suit was brought, and the circuit judge held, in effect, and so instructed the jury, that defendants had acquired the property by such possession.

This instruction was based upon an erroneous interpretation of the opinion of Mr. Justice Bradley in Pike v. Evans, and a clear mistake of the law applicable to the case. It may be fairly presumed, when the issue decided in that opinion is considered, that the court intended simply to decide the question presented by the instruction, which was whether the omission of the sheriff to make a tangible seizure of the property was an irregularity cured by the prescription of five years. The circuit judge had instructed the jury that it was not, but this court held that this, as well as all other irregularities, were included in the statute.

It followed, as a logical sequence to the opinion on the main question, that a sheriff's deed thus cured of irregularity might become the basis of the prescription of ten years, by which property is acquired, under the Civil Code of Louisiana, as was said by Mr. Justice Bradley. But it is not to be inferred that the court intended to decide that possession of property for a less period than ten years, under a deed, either perfect in form originally, or made so by the lapse of five years, can give a title to lands in Louisiana. The whole purpose of the statute was to prevent anyone disputing the regularity of a judicial sale after the lapse of five years.

But the Code provides under what circumstances property may be acquired by possession. Article 3478 provides: "He who acquires an immovable in good faith and by a just title prescribes for it in ten years."

Walden v. Finley, 2 Rob. (La.) 466; Leduf v. Bailly, 8 La. Ann. 8.

But plaintiffs in this case do not, and need not, allege that defendants' title is void, or voidable because there was no tangible seizure of the property. Mrs. Evans was not a party to the judgment, nor to the execution under which her property was sold. As to her the sheriff had no authority to sell, and the prescription of the informalities could not devest her title.

Robert v. Brown, 14 La. Ann. 597.

A defect of this character is not a mere irregularity, but an absolute nullity. As it arises dehors the record, it is not cured by the prescription of five years.

Jackson v. Ludeling, 99 U. S. 538 (Bk. 25. L. ed. 460).

The rule is the same in Louisiana as elsewhere, that the rights of a seizing creditor are no greater than those of his debtor.

Ballio v. Poisset, 8 Mart. N. S. 337; Smith v. McMicken, 3 La. Ann. 319.

A creditor cannot disregard a conveyance made by his debtor, and seize the property without some proceeding against the owner.

Ford v. Douglas, 5 How. 143 (46 U. S. bk. 12, L. ed. 89).

Mr. John A. Campbell, for defendants in error.

[243] Mr. Justice Bradley delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a petitory suit brought by Marie P. Evans and her husband, the plaintiffs in error, to recover a plantation of 1,911 acres, called the Richland plantation, situated in the Parish of West Feliciana, near Baton Rouge, in the State of Louisiana. The action was originally commenced against William S. Pike, and is continued against his widow and heirs, the defendants in error. The plaintiffs claim the property under a gratuitous donation made by Ackley Perkins, to his niece, the said Marie P. Evans (then Marie Linton), by act of donation dated September 5, 1861. The title of the defendants is based on a judgment of the Second District Court of West Feliciana, rendered 18th February, 1859, for the sum of $16,890.25, with interest, in favor of one Eliza C. Johnson, against J. & H. Perkins, upon mortgage notes given by them for the purchase of the plantation. An execution was issued on this judgment, and the property failing to bring two thirds of its appraised value, it was sold on the third of August, 1861, on twelve months' credit, pursuant to the Code of Practice of Louisiana; and the said Ackley Perkins, a brother of the mortgagors, became the purchaser, and to secure the payment of the purchase money he gave a twelve months' bond for $30,695.80, with interest at 10 per cent per annum, with two sureties. This bond contained a declaration of mortgage on the property sold, and an acknowledgment that it was to have the force of a final judgment, but it was not recorded. This was about one month prior to the donation made by Ackley Perkins to the plaintiff. The twelve months' bond not being paid, an execution was issued upon it on the 10th of October, 1865, and under this execution the property was sold on the 6th of January, 1866, and William S. Pike, one of the sureties of Perkins on the bond, to protect himself, became the purchaser for the sum of $46,725, received a deed from the sheriff, and took immediate possession of the premises, and continued in possession until the commencement of this suit in October, 1871, a period of five years and nine months; and he and his heirs have been in possession ever since.

The defendant, William S. Pike, amongst other things, interposed the plea of prescription of five years, under article 3543 of the Revised Civil Code, being a re-enactment of the Statute [244] passed March 10, 1834, which declares that "All informalities connected with, or growing out of, any public sale made by any person authorized to sell at public auction shall be prescribed against by those claiming under such sale, after the lapse of five years from the time of making it, whether against minors, married women, or interdicted persons."

At the first trial of the cause, the plaintiff undertook to rebut this plea by showing that the sheriff did not actually seize the property; and the circuit court held that this defect was not one of the informalities cured by the prescription. On writ of error from this court we held otherwise, and reversed the judgment. Pike v. Evans, 94 U. S. 6 [Bk. 24, L. ed. 40]. Of course, we must have held that the sheriff was authorized to sell the property at public auction, for that is necessary in order to maintain the plea of prescription in such a case.

A second trial has since taken place, and it does not appear by the record that any attempt was made to show a want of seizure by the sheriff. His return to the writ of execution shows that he did seize the property. The plea of prescription, however, was not withdrawn by the defendants, but was still relied on; and the judge, besides charging the jury that if Pike was in possession of the plantation for a period of five years, and purchased the same from a person authorized to sell at public auction, any informality connected with or growing out of the sale was prescribed, went on to charge further, that under the terms of the decision of the supreme court in this case, the prescription of five years, if proved, was decisive of the controversy, operated as a bar to the plaintiffs' action, and gave to the defendants a title by prescription against the plaintiff. To this instruction the plaintiffs excepted, and the substantial ground of their exception was that the prescription of five years only cures defects and informalities in a sale, and not defects in the title itself, which, according to the laws of Louisiana, can only be cured by a prescription of ten years of possession in good faith and under a just title.

But even if this objection were well founded, a question would still arise whether by the [245] sheriff's sale William S. Pike did not acquire a good title as against the plaintiffs. For if he did, prescription, except in reference to informalities of the sale, was not necessary to his defense, and the charge could not injure the plaintiffs. It is necessary, therefore, to examine this question.

The objection made by the plaintiffs to the title conferred by the sheriff's sale is that the plaintiff, Marie P. Evans, was not made a party to the proceedings and not served with notice, though donee of the property, and a third possessor.

The situation of the property at the time of the sale was as follows: on the 18th of February, 1859, it became subject to Eliza C. Johnson's judgment for purchase money. On the third of August, 1861, by virtue of an execution on this judgment, it was sold to Ackley Perkins on a credit of twelve months, and Perkins gave a twelve months' bond for the purchase money. This sale was made in pursuance of a law of Louisiana which authorizes a sheriff to sell property on execution at twelve months' credit if unable to sell it for cash at two thirds of its appraised value. Code Prac. art 680, 681. At such sale on credit, the purchaser is required to furnish good and sufficient joint security and special mortgage on the property sold, bearing interest at the same rate as the judgment. Art. 681. The Code further provides that if the bond is not paid at maturity, "The clerk who first issued the order of seizure shall, on the demand of the judgment creditor, or any other person interested, and on the bond being delivered to him, issue an execution for the amount, both against the purchaser and his surety, in the same manner as on a final judgment; and this execution shall be directed to the sheriff, to be carried into effect." Art. 719. "If the amount of the bond, with interest and costs, be not paid to him on demand, it is the duty of the sheriff, under this execution, to seize immediately the property of the purchaser, or of the surety, or both, to the amount of the debt and costs, and to sell it for ready money." Art. 720.

The course thus prescribed was followed in the present case. But the sale thus made on credit was not a satisfaction of the judgment, which still remained in full force; for, if the bond was not paid at maturity (as it was not), [246] execution might be issued, either on the judgment or on the bond, at the option of the judgment creditor. The land still remained subject to the judgment. The execution on the bond had merely this advantage, that it could be levied on the property of the sureties as well as on that of the principal; but the property for which the bond was given remained subject to the debt and to the lien of the judgment. A sale of the land under an execution issued on the judgment, or on the bond, would relate back to the judgment for its force and effect. Trescott v. Lewis, 11 La. Ann. 184; Baham v. Langfield, 16 La. Ann. 157; Union Bank v. Stafford, 12 How. 339, 340 [53 U. S. bk. 13, L. ed. 1008]. As Ackley Perkins paid nothing on his purchase, but merely gave the twelve months' bond, he could do nothing to defeat the continued lien of the judgment. Though a purchaser from him in possession might be entitled to be proceeded against by a hypothecary action, a mere gratuitous donee would take the property subject to all charges in the same manner as the donor held it. Article 1551 of the Civil Code declares: "The property given passes to the donee with all its charges, even those which the donor has imposed between the time of the donation and that of the acceptance;" in other words, the donee takes cum onere, and undoubtedly with implied notice. This was manifested in the present case by the conduct of the parties at the time of passing the act of donation, which declares that they "dispensed with the production of a certificate from the recorder of the parish as is required by article 3328 of the Civil Code." This means that the donee accepted the property at her own risk, subject to all charges thereon, and amounted to a voluntary assumption by her of those charges, so far as they were specific and not general liens.

It is the general law, it is true, that a third possessor of hypothecated property must be proceeded against by the hypothecary action, which requires thirty days' demand of the principal debtor, and ten days' subsequent notice to the third possessor to pay the debt or give up the property. Article 68 of the Code of Practice declares that "If the hypothecated property be neither in the possession of his debtor nor of his heirs, but in that of a third [247] person, the creditor has his action against that person, in order to compel him either to give up the property or to pay the amount for which it stands hypothecated." And this is the ordinary rule as to third possessors, whether the hypothecation be by act of mortgage or in any other form. A judgment creditor, whose claim bears against a piece of property transferred to a third party who does not assume to pay the judgment, must proceed by hypothecary action. Massey v. Finch, 24 La. Ann. 29. But where the vendee assumes the payment of a mortgage as a part of the purchase price, the mortgagee may proceed against the mortgagor without reference to the sale made by him. (Père v. Goldman, on appeal by Sell, the third possessor, Louque's Dig. 442, pl. 9.) A purchaser of property subject to a mortgage debt, who promises or is personally liable to pay the debt, is held not to be a third possessor entitled to the demand and notice requisite in a hypothecary action. Duncan v. Elam, 1 Rob. 135; Boissac v. Downs, 16 La. Ann. 187.

From these authorities we infer the rule to be that a gratuitous donee, even when in possession, being liable for the charges on the land, is not entitled to the delay and formalities of the hypothecary execution. But if this be not true in all cases, we think it must be true in a case like the present, where the party is not in possession and has accepted a donation of land from a person who bought it on credit, the land being still subject to the judgment under which it was sold, and liable to an execution either on such judgment or on the bond given for purchase money.

In this case the plaintiff was not in possession. As we understand the record, no change of possession took place at the time of the donation; but the plaintiff Marie, the donee, went immediately abroad, out of the country, and Ackley Perkins remained in possession until the sale to William S. Pike, in January, 1866, under the execution on the twelve months' bond. Mrs. Johnson, the judgment creditor, not receiving any fruit of her judgment, finds herself, at the close of the war, obliged to resell the property. She finds no one in possession but Ackley Perkins. She follows the directions of the Code, and an execu- [248] tion is issued on the twelve months' bond. William S. Pike is obliged to purchase the property to protect himself as surety on the bond. Under these circumstances, there is certainly no strong equity in favor of the plaintiff's claim. She never paid a cent for the property; her donor never paid a cent for it; the judgment remains unpaid; the surety is obliged to buy to save himself; and now the plaintiff, after nearly six years have passed away, seeks to deprive Pike of possession, without offering to reimburse him for what he has paid (or bound himself to pay) to relieve the property from the incumbrance resting upon it, and to satisfy the debts of the plaintiff's donor, and of the parties against whom the judgment was originally rendered. There could not well be a case more destitute of equity.

Suppose the plaintiff was entitled to notice of the application for executory process, or to some formality in lieu of notice; does that make the sale so absolutely void that she can recover the property without restoring or offering to restore to Pike or his heirs what he has paid?

In the English system, followed in most of the States, a person having an interest in mortgaged premises sold under a foreclosure, and not made a party to the proceedings, merely retains his equity of redemption; that is, a right to redeem the property by paying the amount due on the mortgage. He cannot turn the purchaser out of possession, without redeeming or offering to redeem the property by paying the mortgage debt. This rule is founded in such manifest justice that we should be surprised not to find it in some form in a system of law drawn from the same source as that of English equity. An examination of the Louisiana decisions shows that we are not mistaken in our anticipations.

In Dufour v. Camfranc, 11 Mart. 607, the plaintiff claimed title to certain slaves; the defendant pleaded that he had purchased them at sheriff's sale, upon an execution issued on a judgment against the heirs of one Dufour, and that plaintiff was one of those heirs. It was replied, amongst other things, that the judgment was null, because plaintiff was not cited. The court said: "Another question still presents itself. It has been proved that the proceeds arising from the sale of the slaves were applied to the discharge of the judgment debts of the plaintiff, and the court is of opinion that he cannot recover in this suit until he repay the money. Nothing could be more unjust than to permit a debtor to recover back his property, because the sale was irregular, and yet allow him to profit by that irregular sale to discharge his debts."

In Donaldson v Rouzan, 8 Mart. N. S. 162, the court said: "The judge below thought the sheriff's deed, without a judgment, did not pass the right of the defendant in execution to the purchaser, and in that opinion we concur. But he thought that, as the purchase money had been applied to the benefit of the estate of the plaintiff's testator, she ought not to recover the lot, without returning the price paid for it. In the view taken by the judge below we also concur;" and the judgment was affirmed.

In Stockton v. Downey, 6 La. Ann. 581, which was a suit to recover property sold under executory process, the court says: "We do not think that judicial sales ought to be disturbed, unless at the instance of a party who has a right to sue for their rescission or nullity, and who can show an injury resulting to him from the sale, as well as an interest in the result of the suit, and without a previous proffer of full indemnity to the bona fide parties, whose interests are to be affected by the judgment." The sale was sustained.

In Taylor v. Huey, 11 La. Ann. 614, which was a petitory action for a tract of land, the plaintiff claimed under a deed from one Fountain, dated in August, 1846, but not recorded until May, 1847; the defendant claimed under a sheriff's sale made in January, 1847, and deed recorded in February, 1847; the sale being made by virtue of executory process issued upon an act of mortgage executed by Fountain in December, 1845, and recorded November, 1846, after the execution of the deed from Fountain to Taylor. The court concludes its judgment as follows: "But conceding that Taylor could be heard to impeach the title of Huey thus acquired, he has not laid a foundation for doing so by the allegations of his petition. He has made no tender to the defendant of the mortgage debt which burdened the land, and [250] was only discharged by the sale he seeks to treat as a nullity." Judgment for defendant affirmed.

We think that these decisions are applicable to the present case, and govern it, and that the remedy of the plaintiffs, in the United States court, if they have one, is a bill in equity to redeem the property, and not an action at law. Under the law of Louisiana, as we understand it, the possessory title of the defendants cannot be disturbed, without returning to them the amount paid by their ancestor in exoneration of the property and in satisfaction of the original judgment of Mrs. Johnson. For the purposes of the present action, their title is good and valid, and they were entitled to a verdict, irrespective of the question whether they and their predecessor, William S. Pike, could maintain title by prescription or not. The charge of the judge, therefore, even if incorrect, did no injury to the plaintiffs.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

MORGAN'S LOUISIANA AND TEXAS RAILROAD AND STEAMSHIP COMPANY, Plff. in Err., [455]

v.

BOARD OF HEALTH OF THE STATE OF LOUISIANA, AND STATE OF LOUISIANA.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 455–467.)

Louisiana quarantine laws—police power of States—regulation of commerce by States in absence of Congressional action—fee for sanitary examination, not a tax within meaning of Constitution—preference of ports of one State over those of another—Constitution, art. 1, sec. 9, a limitation on General Government.

*1. The system of quarantine laws established by Statutes of Louisiana is a rightful exercise of the police power for the protection of health, which is not forbidden by the Constitution of the United States.

2. While some of the rules of that system may amount to regulations of commerce with foreign nations or among the States, though not so designed, they belong to that class which the States may establish until Congress acts in the matter by covering the same ground or forbidding state laws.

3. Congress, so far from doing either of these things, has, by the Act of 1799, chap. 53, Revised Statutes, and previous laws, and by the recent Act of 1878, 20 Stat. at L. 37, adopted the laws of the States on that subject, and forbidden all interference with their enforcement.

4. The requirement that each vessel passing a quarantine station shall pay a fee fixed by the statute for examination as to her sanitary condition, and the ports from which she came, is a part of all quarantine systems, and is a compensation for services rendered to the vessel, and is not a tax within the meaning of the Constitution concerning tonnage tax imposed by the States.

5. Nor is it liable to constitutional objection as giving a preference for a port of one State over those of another. That section (nine) of the first article of the Constitution is a restraint upon powers of the General Government and not of the States, and can have no application to the quarantine laws of Louisiana.

Argued Apr. 26, 27, 1886. Decided May 10, 1886.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Louisiana. Affirmed.

The case is stated by the court.

Messrs. Henry J. Leovy and Joseph E. McDonald, for plaintiff in error:

The Acts in question, and principally those of 1882 (p. 89) and 1870 (extra session, p. 84), are null and void because they impose tonnage duties.

We do not contend that the States have no power to establish quarantine regulations; we say that the States are powerless to impose on vessels the cost of a system created for the benefit of a whole community.

Peete v. Morgan, 19 Wall. 588 (86 U. S. bk. 22, L. ed. 201); Port Warden Case, 6 Wall. 31 (73 U. S. bk. 18, L. ed. 749); "State Tax Tonnage Cases," 12 Wall. 218 (79 U. S. bk. 20, L. ed. 370); The "Cannon" Case, 20 Wall. 580 (87 U. S. bk. 22, L. ed. 417).

Unless the sum imposed on the vessel is for a direct service to the vessel, proportioned to the amount claimed, it is a reprobated tonnage duty.

See 6 Wall. 31, 12 Wall. 218, 19 Wall. 581 and 20 Wall. 580, supra; 92 U. S. 259; 94 U. S. 238; 95 U. S. 80; 100 U. S. 423; 105 U. S. 166.

If it be contended that the tax is for the benefit of commerce, and thus indirectly a service to the vessels for which they should pay, we answer that precisely the same argument was used in defense of the tax for the harbor masters in New York, and also in Louisiana.

Inman Steamship Co. v. Tinker, 94 U. S. 243 (Bk. 24, L. ed. 118); 6 Wall. 31.

The statutes named are null and void because they regulate commerce.

*Head notes by Mr. Justice MILLER.

NOTE.—Constitutional law; regulation of commerce; interstate commerce; powers of States; how far congressional action exclusive.

See Gloucester Ferry Co. v. Pa. 114 U. S. bk. 29, p. 158, note; Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U. S. bk. 6, p. 23, note. Brown v. Maryland, 25 U. S. bk. 6, p. 678, note.

The only difference between the Peete Case and that now before the court is that in the Peete Case the charge is by the ton, and the statute states that the fee is for quarantine purposes, without stating specifically that it is for the inspection. As to the tonnage point, this court has frequently decided that there is no difference as to the constitutionality of a statute, whether the tax be measured by the ton, or imposed on the vessel.

6 Wall. 31; 12 Wall. 218; 20 Wall. 580 supra.

This court has decided that charges for the following purposes are not only in violation of the tonnage provision of the Constitution, but also of that regulating commerce:

Port Wardens, 6 Wall. 31; Quarantine, 19 Wall. 581; 95 U. S. 465; Harbor Masters, 94 U. S. 238; Wharves, 20 Wall. 580; 95 U. S. 80; 100 U. S. 423; 100 U. S. 430; 100 U. S. 434; Passengers, 9 Wheat. 205; 7 How. 383; 92 U. S. 259; 92 U. S. 275; 107 U. S. 60; License Tax on Vessels, Tug Boats, 112 U. S. 69; Ferry Boats, 114 U. S. 197; State Tax on Vessels, 17 How. 596; 16 Wall. 471.

Finally, on the subject of the power of Congress to regulate commerce, and state interference with it, by the imposition of duties, we ask attention to the recent case of the Gloucester Ferry Co. v. Pa. 114 U. S. 204 (Bk. 29, L. ed. 158).

See, also, 112 U. S. 69; Railroad v. Husen, 95 U. S. 465 (Bk. 24, L. ed. 527)

By these Acts, imposing charges exclusively on vessels passing the Mississippi River Quarantine Station, preference is given to vessels from the ports of one State over those of another, and duties imposed on vessels bound from one State to another, in contravention of article 1, sec. 9, par. 6 of the United States Constitution.

Inman Steamship Co. v. Tinker, supra; Guy v. Baltimore, 100 U. S. 434 (Bk 25, L. ed. 743)

One of the most important questions presented by this case is, whether the system created by the Louisiana Statutes, by which vessels from the neighboring healthy ports are detained and heavily taxed, is, in any proper sense, a quarantine system at all. Are the regulations created by these statutes, so detrimental to commerce, at all necessary for self-protection; or rather are they not ingenious devices to fill the coffers of a depleted treasury? The Act of 1882 provides for the detention and inspection of all steamers passing the Mississippi River Station, and a charge of $30 on every steamer is imposed for this "service" to the steamer. If the detention be not necessary, it cannot be justified.

Messrs. Wm. M. Evarts, F. C. Zacharie and Albert Voorhies, for defendants in error:

The statutes attacked as violating the commerce and tonnage clauses of the Constitution impose no tax or burden, as such, on any vessel. They ordain and establish a quarantine, provide for the inspection of every vessel, and for fumigation and other precautionary measures when deemed essential. The only charge authorized to be made is a fee for the service of inspection, and for fumigation when the latter is considered as required. The case, therefore, involves no issue but the validity of the charge for the service of inspection and fumigation when required.

An Act of the State by which it makes a charge for a legal service is neither a regulation of commerce nor a tax on tonnage. The very absence of authority against the proposition is its strongest affirmance. It is not denied that at the time of the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, the Colonial and Confederated Governments had ordained quarantine, had provided for inspection thereunder, and made a charge for the service so rendered. It is equally unquestioned that since the adoption of the Constitution, the quarantine laws of New York and other States have made a charge for inspection.

An adequate charge for the service of quarantine inspection is not a tonnage tax or a regulation of commerce. The source whence comes the power to do the act for which the charge is made seems to have been made the test in Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. 203 (22 U. S. bk. 6, L. ed. 23); Turner v. Maryland, 107 U. S. 51 (Bk. 27, L. ed. 375).

The right to direct the quarantine inspection arises, not from any assertion of governmental authority to regulate commerce or tax tonnage, but from the power to establish quarantine. Authority flowing from a valid and constitutional exercise of power does not become constitutionally inoperative because by its exercise, as was said in Gibbons v. Ogden, it "may have a remote and considerable influence on commerce." The power is the test, not the mere indirect effect to come from the exercise of an incident adhering to it by necessary implication. Cooley v. Port Wardens, 12 How. 299 (53 U. S. bk. 13, L. ed. 996); Turner v. Maryland, 107 U. S. 38 (Bk. 27, L. ed. 370); Transportation Co. v. Parkersburg, 107 U. S. 692 (Bk. 27, L. ed. 585).

But the charge for the service of inspection is so patently not a tax on tonnage, or a regulation of commerce, that, irrespective of the other views, its validity should be upheld.

The record shows that the receipts from quarantine do no more than pay the actual cost of the various stations. What is required beyond comes from the public treasury. It is idle therefore to consider this as a case involving on the part of the State an attempt to raise revenue by indirection. If the State sought within its legal powers by subterfuge and indirection to do so, it may be doubted whether the remedy must not come from Congress. Turner v. Maryland, supra; Transportation Co. v. Parkersburg, 107 U. S. 695 (Bk. 27, L. ed. 585).

Mr. Justice Miller delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error to the Supreme Court of the State of Louisiana.

The plaintiff in error was plaintiff in the state court, and in the court of original jurisdiction obtained an injunction against the Board of Health prohibiting it from collecting from the plaintiffs the fee of $30 and other fees allowed by Act 69 of the Legislature of Louisiana of 1882, for the examination which the quarantine laws of the State required in regard to all vessels passing the station. This decree was reversed on appeal by the Supreme Court of the State, and to this judgment of reversal the present writ of error is prosecuted.

The grounds on which it is sought, in this court, to review the final judgment of the Louisiana court are thus stated in an amended petition filed in the cause in the court of first instance: [456]

"The amended petition of plaintiffs respectfully represents:

"That all the Statutes of the State of Louisiana, relied on by defendants for collection of quarantine and fumigation fees are null and void, because they violate the following provisions of the United States Constitution:

"Article first, section 10, paragraph 3, prohibits the States from imposing tonnage duties without the consent of Congress.

"Article first, section 8, paragraph 3, vesting in Congress the power to regulate commerce, which power is exclusively so vested.

"Article first, paragraph 6, section 9, which declares that no preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce to the ports of one State over that of another; nor shall vessels bound to or from one State be obliged to enter, clear or pay duties in another."

The statute which authorizes the collection of these fees, approved July 1, 1882, is as follows:

"Sec. 1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the State of Louisiana, That the resident physician of the quarantine station on the Mississippi River shall require for every inspection and granting certificate the following fees and charges: For every ship, thirty dollars ($30); for every bark, twenty dollars ($20); for every brig, ten dollars ($10); for every schooner, seven dollars and a half ($7.50); for every steamboat (towboats excepted), five dollars ($5); for every steamship, thirty dollars ($30).

"Sec. 2. Be it further enacted, etc., That the Board of Health shall have an especial lien and privilege on the vessels so inspected for the amount of said fees and charges, and may collect the same, if unpaid, by suit before any court of competent jurisdiction, and in aid thereof shall be entitled to the writ of provisional seizure on said vessels.

"Sec. 3. Be it further enacted, etc., That all laws and parts of laws in conflict with the provisions of this Act, are hereby repealed, and all laws and parts of laws on the same subject matter not in conflict or inconsistent herewith are continued in full force and effect."

The services for which these fees are to be collected are parts of a system of quarantine, provided by the laws of Louisiana, for the protection of the State, and especially of New Orleans, an important commercial city, from infectious and contagious diseases which might be brought there by vessels coming through the Gulf of Mexico from all parts of the world, and up the Mississippi River to New Orleans. [458]

This system of quarantine differs in no essential respect from similar systems in operation in all important seaports all over the world, where commerce and civilization prevail. The distance from the mouth of the Mississippi River to New Orleans is about a hundred miles. A Statute of Louisiana of 1855, organizing this system, created a board of health, to whom its administration was mainly confided, [459] and it authorized this board to select and establish a quarantine station on the Mississippi, not less than seventy-five miles below New Orleans. Money was appropriated to buy land, build hospitals, and furnish other necessary appliances for such an establishment. This and other statutes subsequently passed contained regulations for the examination of vessels ascending the river, and of their passengers, for the purpose of ascertaining the places whence these vessels came, their sanitary condition, and the healthy or diseased condition of their passengers. If any of these were such that the safety of the City of New Orleans or its inhabitants required it as a protection against disease, they could be ordered into quarantine by the proper health officer, until the danger was removed, and, if necessary, the vessel might be ordered to undergo fumigation. If, on this examination, there was no danger to be apprehended from vessel or passengers, a certificate of that fact was given by the examining officer, and she was thereby authorized to proceed and land at her destination. If ordered to quarantine, after such detention and cleansing process as the quarantine authorities required, she was given a similar certificate and proceeded on her way. If the condition of any of the passengers was such that they could not be permitted to enter the city, they might be ordered into quarantine while the vessel proceeded without them. Whether these precautions were judicious or not this court cannot inquire. They are a part of and inherent in every system of quarantine.

If there is a city in the United States which has need of quarantine laws it is New Orleans. Although situated over a hundred miles from the Gulf of Mexico, it is the largest city which partakes of its commerce, and more vessels of every character come to and depart from it than any city connected with that commerce. Partaking, as it does, of the liability to diseases of warm climates, and in the same danger as all other seaports of cholera and other contagious and infectious disorders, these are sources of anxiety to its inhabitants, and to all the interior population of the country who may be affected by their spread among them. Whatever may be the truth with regard to the contagious character of yellow fever and cholera, there can be [460] no doubt of the general belief, and very little of the fact, that all the invasions of these epidemics in the great valley of the Mississippi River and its tributaries in times past have been supposed to have spread from New Orleans, and to have been carried by steamboats and other vessels engaged in commerce with that city. And the origin of these diseases is almost invariably attributed to vessels ascending the Mississippi River from the West Indies and South America, where yellow fever is epidemic almost every year, and from European countries whence our invasions of cholera uniformly come.

If there is any merit or success in guarding against these diseases by modes of exclusion, of which the professional opinion of medical men in America is becoming more convinced of late years, the situation of the City of New Orleans for rendering this exclusion effective is one which invites in the strongest manner the effort. Though a seaport in fact, it is situated a hundred miles from the sea, and is only to be reached by vessels from foreign countries by this approach. A quarantine station, located as this one is under the Louisiana laws, with vigilant officers, can make sure of inspecting every vessel which comes to New Orleans from the great ocean in any direction. Safe and ample arrangements can be made for care and treatment of diseased passengers and for the comfort of their companions, as well as the cleansing and disinfecting of the vessels. The system of quarantine has here, therefore, as fair a trial of its efficacy as it could have anywhere, and the need of it is as great.

None of these facts are denied. In all that is important to the present inquiry they cannot be denied.

Nor is it denied that the enactment of quarantine laws is within the province of the States of this Union. Of all the elements of this quarantine system of the State of Louisiana, the only feature which is assailed as unconstitutional is that which requires that the vessels which are examined at the quarantine station with respect to their sanitary condition and that of their passengers, shall pay the compensation which the law fixes for this service.

This compensation is called a tonnage tax, [461] forbidden by the Constitution of the United States; a regulation of commerce exclusively within the power of Congress; and also a regulation which gives a preference to the Port of New Orleans over ports of other States.

These are grave allegations with regard to the exercise of a power which, in all countries and in all the ports of the United States, has been considered to be a part of, and incident to, the power to establish quarantine.

We must examine into this proposition and see if anything in the Constitution sustains it. Is this requirement, that each vessel shall pay the officer who examines it a fixed compensation for that service, a tax? A tax is defined to be "a contribution imposed by government on individuals for the service of the State." It is argued that a part of these fees go into the treasury of the State or of the city, and it is therefore levied as part of the revenue of the State or city and for that purpose. But an examination of the statute shows that the excess of the fees of this officer over his salary is paid into the city treasury to constitute a fund wholly devoted to quarantine expenses, and that no part of it ever goes to defray the expenses of the state or city government.

That the vessel itself has the primary and deepest interest in this examination it is easy to see. It is obviously to her interest, in the pursuit of her business, that she enter the city and depart from it free from the suspicion which, at certain times, attaches to all vessels coming from the Gulf. This she obtains by the examination and can obtain in no other way. If the law did not make this provision for ascertaining her freedom from infection, it would be compelled to enact more stringent and more expensive penalties against the vessel herself when it was found that she had come to the city from an infected port or had brought contagious persons or contagious matter with her; and throwing the responsibility for this on the vessel, the heaviest punishment would be necessary by fine and imprisonment for any neglect of the duty thus imposed. The State now says you must submit to this examination. If you appear free of objection, you are relieved by the officer's certificate of all responsibility on that [462] subject. If you are in a condition dangerous to the public health, you are quarantined and relieved in this manner. For this examination and fumigation you must pay. The danger comes from you, and though it may turn out that in your case there is no danger, yet as you belong to a class from which all this kind of injury comes, you must pay for the examination which distinguishes you from others of that class. It seems to us that this is much more clearly a fair charge against the vessel than that of half pilotage, where the pilot's services are declined, and where all the pilot has done is to offer himself. This latter has been so repeatedly held to be a valid charge, though made under state laws, as to need no citations to sustain it.

In all cases of this kind it has been repeatedly held that when the question is raised whether the state statute is a just exercise of state power, or is intended by roundabout means to invade the domain of federal authority, this court will look into the operation and effect of the statute to discern its purpose. See Henderson v. Mayor, 92 U. S. 259 [Bk. 23, L. ed. 543]; Chy Lung v. Freeman, 92 U. S. 275 [Bk. 23, L. ed. 550]; Cannon v. New Orleans, 20 Wall. 577 [87 U. S. bk. 22, L. ed. 417].

In the case of Packet Co. v. St. Louis, 100 U. S. 423 [Bk. 25, L. ed. 688], where a city wharfage tax was assailed on the same ground as the fee in the present case, the court said the fee was a fair equivalent for the use of the wharf. "Nor is there any ground whatever to suppose that these wharfage fees were exacted for the purpose of increasing the general revenue of the city beyond what was necessary to meet its outlay, from time to time, in maintaining its wharves in such condition as the immense business of that locality required." So here, there is no reason to suppose that these fees had any other purpose or destination than to keep up and pay the expenses of the quarantine station and system.

But, conceding it to be a tax; in what sense can it be called a tonnage tax? The cases of State Tonnage Tax, 12 Wall. 204 [79 U. S. bk. 20, L. ed. 370]; Peete v Morgan, 19 Wall. 581 [86 U. S. bk. 22, L. ed. 201]; Cannon v New Orleans, [supra]; Inman Steamship Co. v. Tinker, 94 U. S. 234 [Bk. 24, L. ed. 118], are all cited and relied on to show that this is a tonnage tax. But in all these cases the contribution ex- [463] acted was measured by the tonnage of the vessel in express terms; and the decision of the court rested on that fact. In the first of them it was admitted that the Statute of Alabama would have been valid as a tax on property within the State, but for the single fact that the amount of it was measured by the tonnage of the vessel.

In Peete's Case the tax was for every vessel arriving at a quarantine station, whether any service was rendered or not, $5 for the first hundred tons of her capacity, and one and a half cents for every additional ton; and this mode of measuring the tax was held to make it a tonnage tax.

The same fact was presented in Cannon v. New Orleans, though it was called a wharfage tax. The court, however, held it to be a tax for the privilege of landing in the port, whether the vessel used a wharf or not, and for this reason, and because the amount of it was measured by the vessel's tonnage, it was held void.

In the case of Steamship Co. v. Port Wardens, 6 Wall. 31 [73 U. S. bk. 18, L. ed. 749], the court held a fee payable to the port wardens by every vessel which entered the port, whether it received any service or not, to be void as a regulation of commerce and as contravening the policy of the prohibition of a tonnage tax by the States. But in almost all the cases relied on by the appellants there was a reference to the tonnage capacity of the vessel as the measure of the tax, and in all of them there was an absence of any service rendered for which the contribution was a compensation; generally they were held to be imposed for the privilege of entering and anchoring in the port.

In the present case we are of opinion that the fee complained of is not a tonnage tax; that, in fact, it is not a tax within the true meaning of that word as used in the Constitution, but is a compensation for a service rendered, as part of the quarantine system of all countries, to the vessel which receives the certificate that declares it free from further quarantine requirements.

Is the law under consideration void as a regulation of commerce? Undoubtedly it is in some sense a regulation of commerce. It arrests a vessel on a voyage which may have been a long one. It may affect commerce among the States when the vessel is coming from some other State of the Union than Louisiana, and it [464] may affect commerce with foreign nations when the vessel arrested comes from a foreign port. This interruption of the voyage may be for days or for weeks. It extends to the vessel, the cargo, the officers and seamen, and the passengers. In so far as it provides a rule by which this power is exercised, it cannot be denied that it regulates commerce. We do not think it necessary to enter into the inquiry whether, notwithstanding this, it is to be classed among those police powers which were retained by the States as exclusively their own, and, therefore, not ceded to Congress. For, while it may be a police power in the sense that all provisions for the health, comfort and security of the citizens are police regulations, and an exercise of the police power, it has been said more than once in this court that, even where such powers are so exercised as to come within the domain of federal authority as defined by the Constitution, the latter must prevail. Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. 210 [22 U. S. bk. 6, L. ed. 23]; Henderson v. Mayor, 92 U. S. 272 [Bk. 23, L. ed. 549]; New Orleans Gas Co. v. Louisiana Light Co. 115 U. S. 661 [Bk. 29, L. ed. 520].

But it may be conceded that whenever Congress shall undertake to provide for the commercial cities of the United States a general system of quarantine, or shall confide the execution of the details of such a system to a national board of health, or to local boards, as may be found expedient, all state laws on the subject will be abrogated, at least so far as the two are inconsistent. But until this is done the laws of the State on the subject are valid. This follows from two reasons:

1. The Act of 1799, the main features of which are embodied in Title LVIII of the Revised Statutes, clearly recognizes the quarantine laws of the States, and requires of the officers of the Treasury a conformity to their provisions in dealing with vessels affected by the quarantine system. And this very clearly has relation to laws created after the passage of that statute, as well as to those then in existence; and when by the Act of April 29, 1878, 20 Stat. at L. 37, certain powers in this direction were conferred on the surgeon-general of the marine hospital service, and consuls and revenue officers were required to contribute services in preventing the [465] importation of disease, it was provided that "There shall be no interference in any manner with any quarantine laws or regulations as they now exist or may hereafter be adopted under state laws," showing very clearly the intention of Congress to adopt these laws, or to recognize the power of the States to pass them.

2. But, aside from this, quarantine laws belong to that class of state legislation which, whether passed with intent to regulate commerce or not, must be admitted to have that effect, and which are valid until displaced or contravened by some legislation of Congress.

The matter is one in which the rules that should govern it may in many respects be different in different localities, and for that reason be better understood and more wisely established by the local authorities. The practice which should control a quarantine station on the Mississippi River, a hundred miles from the sea, may be widely and wisely different from that which is best for the Harbor of New York. In this respect the case falls within the principle which governed the cases of Wilson v. Blackbird Creek Marsh Co. 2 Pet. 245 [27 U. S. bk. 7, L. ed. 412]; Cooley v. Board of Wardens, 12 How. 299 [53 U. S. bk. 13, L. ed. 996]; Gilman v. Phila. 3 Wall. 727 [70 U. S. bk. 18, L. ed. 96]; Pound v. Turck, 95 U. S. 462 [Bk. 24, L. ed. 526]; Hall v. DeCuir, 95 U. S. 488 [Bk. 24, L. ed. 548]; Packet Co. v. Catlettsburgh, 105 U. S. 562 [Bk. 26, L. ed. 1170]; Transportation Co. v. Parkersburgh, 107 U. S. 702 [Bk. 27, L. ed. 588]; Escanaba Co. v. Chicago, 107 U. S. 678 [Bk. 27, L. ed. 442].

This principle has been so often considered in this court that extended comment on it here is not needed. Quarantine laws are so analogous in most of their features to pilotage laws, in their relation to commerce, that no reason can be seen why the same principle should not apply. In one of the latest of the cases cited above, the Town of Catlettsburgh, on the Ohio River, had enacted that no vessel should, without permission of the wharfmaster, land at any other point on the bank of the river within the town than a space designated by the ordinance. This court said "that if this be a regulation of commerce under the power conferred on Congress by the Constitution, that body has signally failed to provide any such regulation. It belongs, also, manifestly to that class of [466] rules which, like pilotage and some others, can be most wisely exercised by local authorities, and in regard to which no general rules applicable alike to all ports and landing places can be properly made. If a regulation of commerce at all, it comes within that class in which the States may prescribe rules until Congress assumes to do so."

For the period of nearly a century since the government was organized Congress has passed no quarantine law, nor any other law to protect the inhabitants of the United States against the invasion of contagious and infectious diseases from abroad; and yet during the early part of the present century, for many years the cities of the Atlantic Coast, from Boston and New York to Charleston, were devastated by the yellow fever. In later times the cholera has made similar invasions; and the yellow fever has been unchecked in its fearful course in the Southern cities, New Orleans especially, for several generations. During all this time the Congress of the United States never attempted to exercise this or any other power to protect the people from the ravages of these dreadful diseases. No doubt they believed that the power to do this belonged to the States. Or, if it ever occurred to any of its members that Congress might do something in that way, they probably believed that what ought to be done could be better and more wisely done by the authorities of the States who were familiar with the matter.

But to be told now that the requirement of a vessel charged with contagion, or just from an infected city, to submit to examination and pay the cost of it is forbidden by the Constitution because only Congress can do that, is a strong reproach upon the wisdom of a hundred years past, or an overstrained construction of the Constitution.

It is said that the charge to the vessel for the officer's service in examining her is not a necessary part of a quarantine system. It has always been held to be a part in all other countries, and in all quarantine stations in the United States. No reason is perceived for selecting this item from the general system and calling it a regulation of commerce, while the remainder is not. If the arrest of the vessel, the detention of its passengers, the cleansing process it is ordered to go through with, are less important as regulations of commerce than the exaction of the examination fee, it is not easily to be seen. [467]

We think the proposition untenable.

There remains to be considered the objection that the law is forbidden by paragraph 6 of section 9 of the first article of the Constitution, which declares that "No preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another."

It is not readily perceived how this Quarantine Statute of Louisiana, and particularly the fees of the quarantine officers, do give such a preference. Are the ports of Louisiana given a preference over ports of other States? Are the ports of any other State given a preference over those of Louisiana? Or are the ports of other States given a preference as among themselves. Nothing of this is pointed out.

The eighth section of this first article of the Constitution is devoted exclusively to defining the powers conferred on Congress.

The ninth section, including the above paragraph, is in like manner devoted to restraints upon the power of Congress and of the National Government; and the tenth section contains only restraints upon the powers of the States, by declaring what they shall not do. The most casual inspection shows this, and the clause of the Constitution here relied on is not found among the restrictions of the States, but among those imposed upon the Federal Government. As the matter under discussion is the validity of the Statute of Louisiana, it is unaffected by the constitutional provision alluded to. Woodbury, Justice, in Passenger Cases, 7 How. 541 [48 U. S. bk. 12, L. ed. 702]; Wilson v. U. S. 1 Brock. 432; Butler v. Hopper, 1 Wash. C. C. 499; Pennsylvania v. Wheeling & Belmont Bridge Co. 18 How. 435 [59 U. S. bk. 15, L. ed. 439]; Munn v. Ill. 94 U. S. 135 [Bk. 24, L. ed. 86].

We see no error in the judgment of the Supreme Court of Louisiana, and it is affirmed.

[194] DICK E. ARROWSMITH, Plff. in Err.,
v.
AMELIA HARMONING, Admrx., ET AL.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 194-196.)

Jurisdiction — depriving of property "without due process of law" — error of judgment of state court.

A State cannot be deemed guilty of violating the constitutional provision against depriving a person of life, liberty or property "without due process of law," because one of its courts, while acting within its jurisdiction, has made an erroneous decision; as in ordering a guardian's sale without first requiring a bond to be filed and approved as a statute of the State required.

Submitted April 26, 1886. Decided May 10, 1886.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Ohio.

On motion to dismiss, with which is united a motion to affirm. Affirmed.

The case is stated by the court.

Messrs. William C. Cochran and Henry B. Harris, for defendants in error, in support of motions.

Messrs. Henry Newbegin and B. B. Kingsbury, for plaintiff in error, contra.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

This was a suit brought in the Court of Common Pleas of Defiance County, Ohio, by Dick E. Arrowsmith to recover the possession of the principal part of a certain 640 acres of land, and the judgment turned on the validity of a sale of the land by the guardian of Arrowsmith under an order of a probate court for that purpose. The case was tried without a jury, and from the finding of facts it appears that all the proceedings for the sale of the land were regular and in proper form, save only that the court dispensed with the giving of a bond by the guardian, under a certain requirement of the statute, "for the faithful discharge of his duties, [195] and the faithful payment and accounting for of all moneys arising from such sale according to law." The single question for determination was whether the failure to furnish this bond rendered the sale void. The court of common pleas decided that it did not, and gave judgment accordingly. This judgment was afterwards affirmed by the district court on petition in error. The case was then taken to the supreme court on another petition in error, where, among others, the following error was assigned:

"3d. That by affirming the judgment of the court of common pleas * * * by said district court, this plaintiff in error was deprived of his right of trial by jury, contrary to the provisions of the Constitution of this State, and deprived of his property without due process of law, contrary to the provisions of the Constitution of the United States."

This is the first time, so far as the record discloses, that even the semblance of a federal right was set up in the case, and even here it is not easy to see on what ground it could be claimed that Arrowsmith had been deprived of his property in violation of the Constitution of the United States. It was for this reason, perhaps, that the supreme court, while affirming the judgment of the district court, took no notice of this assignment of error in its opinion. The decision, however, necessarily involved a denial of the right which was claimed in this way, and thus we probably have technical jurisdiction. For this reason the motion to dismiss must be denied, but the question on which our jurisdiction depends was so manifestly decided right, that the case ought not to be held for further argument. It is not denied that the probate court had full and complete jurisdiction of the proceeding to sell the land. The statute under which the court acted would, if followed, have furnished Arrowsmith all the protection which had been guaranteed to him by the Constitution of the United States. The bond in question was matter of procedure only; and if it ought to have been required, the court erred in ordering the sale without having first caused it to be filed and approved. At most, this was an error of judgment in the court. The constitutional provision is "Nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law." Certainly a State cannot be [196] deemed guilty of a violation of this constitutional obligation simply because one of its courts, while acting within its jurisdiction, has made an erroneous decision. The Legislature of a State performs its whole duty under the Constitution in this particular when it provides a law for the government of its courts while exercising their respective jurisdictions, which, if followed, will furnish the parties the necessary constitutional protection. All after that pertains to the courts, and the parties are left to the appropriate remedies for the correction of errors in judicial proceedings.

The motion to dismiss is denied, and that to affirm is granted.

Affirmed.

THE DECISIONS

OF THE

Supreme Court of the United States,

AT OCTOBER TERM, 1886.

557] WABASH, ST. LOUIS AND PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,

v.

PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF ILLINOIS.

Constitutional law—commerce among the States—transportation between points in different States—Statute of Illinois forbidding discrimination, invalid—review of authorities.

*A Statute of Illinois enacts that if any railroad company shall, within that State, charge or receive for transporting passengers or freight of the same class, the same or a greater sum for any distance than it does for a longer distance, it shall be liable to a penalty for unjust discrimination. The defendant in this case made such discrimination in regard to goods transported over the same road or roads from Peoria in Illinois, and from Gilman in Illinois, to New York; charging more for the same class of goods carried from Gilman than from Peoria, the former being eighty-six miles nearer to New York than the latter, this difference being in the length of the line within the State of Illinois.

1. This court follows the Supreme Court of Illinois in holding that the Statute of Illinois must be construed to include a transportation of goods under one contract and by one voyage from the interior of the State of Illinois to New York.

2. This court holds further that such a transportation is "commerce among the States," even as to that part of the voyage which lies within the State of Illinois; while it is not denied that there may be a transportation of goods which is begun and ended within its limits and disconnected with any carriage outside of the State, which is not commerce among the States.

3. The latter is subject to regulation by the State, and the Statute of Illinois is valid as applied to it. But the former is national in its character, and its regulation is confided to Congress exclusively, by that clause of the Constitution which empowers it to regulate commerce among the States.

4. The cases of Munn v. Illinois, C. B. & Q. R. R. Co. v. Iowa, and Peik v. Chicago & Northwestern R. R. Co., all in 94 U. S. [Bk. 24, L. ed.] examined in regard to this question, and held, in view of other cases decided near the same time, not to establish a contrary doctrine.

5. Notwithstanding what is there said, this court holds now, and has never consciously held otherwise, that a statute of a State, intended to regulate or to tax, or to impose any other restriction upon the transmission of persons, or property or telegraphic messages, from one State to another, is not within that class of legislation which the States may enact in the absence of legislation by Congress; and that such statutes are void even as to that part of such transmission which may be within the State.

6. It follows that the Statute of Illinois, as construed by the Supreme Court of the State, and as applied to the transaction under consideration, is forbidden by the Constitution of the United States; and the judgment of that court is reversed.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Illinois. Reversed.

The case and agreed statement of facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. H. S. Greene and W. C. Goudy, for plaintiff in error:

Under section 8 of article 1 of the Constitution, a regulation of commerce which is of a purely local character, and does not admit of general application, may be adopted and enforced by local authority. But where the subject of regulation is of national concern, or admits of one uniform plan or system of regulation, it is exclusively within the control of Congress.

The non-exercise by Congress of its power over matters within its exclusive control, is equivalent to a declaration that commerce as to such matters shall be free from any restriction.

Mr. George Hunt, Atty-Gen. of Illinois, for defendants in error:

The Act in question has for its object, neither directly nor indirectly, the promotion, restraint, or regulation of commerce among the States. It presents no hindrances, burdens, privileges or encouragements to commerce among the States, and it seeks no revenue, or advantage or disadvantage, to this or any other State.

Not everything which affects commerce is a regulation of it, within the meaning of the Constitution.

State Tax on R. Gross Receipts, 15 Wall. 284 (82 U. S. bk. 21, L. ed. 164); Munn v. Ill. 94 U. S. 113 (Bk. 24, L. ed. 77); Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. 1 (22 U. S. bk. 6, L. ed. 23); Passenger Cases, 7 How. 283 (48 U. S. bk. 12, L. ed. 702); Slaughter House Cases, 16 Wall. 36 (83 U. S. bk. 21, L. ed. 394).

The subject matter of this Act is the discrimination in the rates charged for carriage. It neither requires the defendant to carry, nor prevents it from carrying, any freight between this State and other States. It may carry any goods it chooses at any time and in any manner. The Act does not interfere with such commerce. But the defendant being a public servant, it requires it not to injure one citizen of the State by imposing upon him a greater charge than it imposes upon another for a similar service. The charge and collection of exorbitant and discriminating rates constitute a violation of the Act.

The Act in question is not in conflict with any Act of Congress and is within the power of the State to enforce. The grant of commercial power to Congress does not exclude the exercise by the State of authority over its subject matter.

Cooley v. Port Wardens, 12 How. 318 (53 U. S. bk. 13, L. ed. 1004).

If this Act amounts to a regulation of interstate commerce, it falls within that class of powers which the States may exercise in the absence of controlling action by Congress.

This case is controlled by the decisions of this court in

The law of Wisconsin, sustained in the Peik Case, fixed the maximum rate to be charged for the transportation of freight from points within to points outside of the State. In this case the Act authorizes the same thing, and undertakes to prevent discrimination in the rates charged. Only that portion of the Act is in issue which forbids unjust discrimination.

The Act in question is a police regulation. It forbids the making and enforcing, by railroad companies doing business in the State, of contracts which unjustly discriminate against one citizen, or locality, at the expense of another. It is not an attempt to regulate commerce among the States, or to interfere with the authority of Congress in regard thereto. It in no way attempts to tax, hinder, delay, control or regulate interstate commerce, but simply brands a discriminating contract as illegal, and provides a penalty for an illegal act. It merely protects persons within the State against unjust discrimination, the offense which it makes punishable.

[560] Mr. Justice Miller delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error to the Supreme Court of Illinois. It was argued here at the last term of this court.

The case was tried in the court of original jurisdiction on an agreed statement of facts. This agreement is short and is here inserted in full:

"For the purposes of the trial of said cause, and to save the making of proof therein, it is hereby agreed on the part of the defendant that the allegations in the first count of the declaration are true, except that part of said count which avers that the same proportionate discrimination was made in the transportation of said property—oil cake and corn—in the State of Illinois, that was made between Peoria and the City of New York, and Gilman and New York City; which averment is not admitted because defendant claims that it is an inference from the fact that the rates charged in each case of said transportation of oil cake and [561] corn were through rates; but it is admitted that said averment is a proper one."

The first count in the declaration, which is referred to in this memorandum of agreement, charged that the Wabash, St. Louis and Pacific Railway Company had, in violation of a Statute of the State of Illinois, been guilty of an unjust discrimination in its rates or charges of toll and compensation for the transportation of freight. The specific allegation is that the Railroad Company charged Elder & McKinney for transporting twenty-six thousand pounds of goods and chattels from Peoria, in the State of Illinois, to New York City, the sum of $39, being at the rate of fifteen cents per hundred pounds for said carload; and that on the same day it agreed to carry and transport for Isaac Bailey and F. O. Swannell another carload of goods and chattels from Gilman, in the State of Illinois, to said City of New York, for which it charged the sum of $65, being at the rate of twenty-five cents per hundred pounds. And it is alleged that the carload transported for Elder & McKinney was carried eighty-six miles further in the State of Illinois than the other carload of the same weight. This freight being of the same class in both instances, and carried over the same road, except as to the difference in the distance, it is obvious that a discrimination against Bailey & Swannell was made in the charges against them as compared with those against Elder & McKinney; and this is true whether we regard the charge for the whole distance from the terminal points in Illinois to New York City or the proportionate charge for the haul within the State of Illinois.

The language of the statute which is supposed to be violated by this transaction is to be found in chapter 114 of the Revised Statutes of Illinois, section 126. It is there enacted that if any railroad corporation shall charge, collect, or receive for the transportation of any passenger or freight of any description upon its rail road, for any distance within the State, the same or a greater amount of toll or compensation than is at the same time charged, collected, or received for the transportation in the same direction of any passenger or like quantity of [562] freight of the same class over a greater distance of the same road, all such discriminating rates, charges, collections, or receipts, whether made directly or by means of rebate, drawback, or other shift or evasion, shall be deemed and taken against any such railroad corporation as prima facie evidence of unjust discrimination prohibited by the provisions of this Act. The statute further provides a penalty of not over $5,000 for that offense, and also that the party aggrieved shall have a right to recover three times the amount of damages sustained, with costs and attorneys' fees.

To this declaration the Railroad Company demurred. The demurrer was sustained by the lower court in Illinois, and judgment rendered for the defendant. This, however, was reversed by the Supreme Court of that State, and on the case being remanded the demurrer was overruled; and the defendant pleaded, among other things, that the rates of toll charged in the declaration were charged and collected for services rendered under an agreement and undertaking to transport freight from Gilman, in the State of Illinois, to New York City, in the State of New York, and that in such undertaking and agreement the portion of the services rendered or to be rendered within the State of Illinois was not apportioned separate from such entire service; that the action is founded solely upon the supposed authority of an Act of the Legislature of the State of Illinois, approved April 7, 1871; and that said Act does not control or affect or relate to undertakings to transport freight from the State of Illinois to the State of New York, which falls within the operation, and is wholly controlled by the terms of the third clause of section eight of article one of the Constitution of the United States, which the defendant sets up and relies upon as a complete defense and protection in said action. This question of whether the Statute of Illinois, as applied to the case in hand, is in violation of the Constitution of the United States, as set forth in the plea, was also raised on the trial by a request of the defendant, the Railroad Company, that the court should hold certain propositions of law on the same subject, which propositions are as follows:

"The court holds as law, that, as the tolls or [563] rates of compensation charged and collected by the defendant, in the instance in question, were for transportation service rendered in transporting freight from a point in the State of Illinois to a point in the State of New York, under an entire contract or undertaking to transport such freight the whole distance between such points, that the Act of the General Assembly of the State of Illinois, approved May 2, 1873, entitled "An Act to Prevent Extortion and Unjust Discrimination in the Rates Charged for the Transportation of Passengers and Freight on Railroads in This State, and to Punish the Same, and Prescribe a Mode of Procedure and Rules of Evidence in Relation Thereto, and to Repeal an Act Entitled 'An Act to Prevent Unjust Discrimination and Extortion in the Rates to be Charged by the Different Railroads in the State for the Transportation of Freight on Said Roads,' approved April 7, 1871," does not apply to or control such tolls and charges, nor can the defendant be held liable in this action for the penalties prescribed by said Act.

"The court further holds as law that said Act in relation to extortion and unjust discrimination cannot apply to transportation service, rendered partly without the State and consisting of the transportation of freight from within the State of Illinois to the State of New York, and that said Act cannot operate beyond the limits of the State of Illinois.

"The court further holds as matter of law, that the transportation in question falls within the proper description of 'commerce among the States,' and as such can only be regulated by the Congress of the United States under the terms of the third clause of section 8 of article 1 of the Constitution of the United States."

All of these propositions were denied by the court, and judgment rendered against the defendant, which judgment was affirmed by the supreme court on appeal.

The matter thus presented, as to the controlling influence of the Constitution of the United States over this legislation of the State of Illinois, raises the question which confers jurisdiction on this court. Although the precise point presented by this case may not have been heretofore decided by this court, the general subject of the power of the state legislatures to regulate taxes, fares and tolls for passengers, [564] and transportation of freight over railroads within their limits has been very much considered recently; State Freight Tax Case, 15 Wall. 232 [82 U. S. bk. 21, L. ed. 146]; Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 133 [Bk. 24, L. ed. 86]; C. B. & Q. R. R. Co. v. Iowa, Id. 155 [Bk. 24, L. ed. 94]; Peik v. N. W. R. R. Co. Id. 164 [Bk. 24, L. ed. 97]; Stone v. Farmers Loan and Trust Co. 116 U. S. 307 [Bk. 29, L. ed. 636]; Gloucester Ferry Co. v. Pa. 114 U. S. 204 [Bk. 29, L. ed. 162]; Pickard v. Pullman Southern Car Co. 117 U. S. 34 [Bk. 29, L. ed. 785]; and the question how far such regulations, made by the States and under state authority, are valid or void, as they may affect the transportation of goods through more than one State, in one voyage, is not entirely new here. The Supreme Court of Illinois, in the case now before us, conceding that each of these contracts was in itself a unit, and that the pay received by the Illinois Railroad Company was the compensation for the entire transportation from the point of departure in the State of Illinois to the City of New York, holds that while the Statute of Illinois is inoperative upon that part of the contract which has reference to the transportation outside of the State, it is binding and effectual as to so much of the transporation as was within the limits of the State of Illinois; People v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. R. Co. 104 Ill. 476; and undertaking for itself to apportion the rates charged over the whole route, decides that the contract and the receipt of the money for so much of it as was performed within the State of Illinois violate the statute of the State on that subject.

If the Illinois Statute could be construed to apply exclusively to contracts for a carriage which begins and ends within the State, disconnected from a continuous transportation through or into other States, there does not seem to be any difficulty in holding it to be valid. For instance, a contract might be made to carry goods for a certain price from Cairo to Chicago, or from Chicago to Alton. The charges for these might be within the competency of the Illinois Legislature to regulate. The reason for this is that both the charge and the actual transportation in such cases are exclusively confined to the limits of the territory of the State, and is not commerce among the [565] States, or interstate commerce, but is exclusively commerce within the State. So far, therefore, as this class of transportation, as an element of commerce, is affected by the statute under consideration, it is not subject to the constitutional provision concerning commerce among the States. It has often been held in this court, and there can be no doubt about it, that there is a commerce wholly within the State which is not subject to the constitutional provision; and the distinction between commerce among the States and the other class of commerce, between the citizens of a single State and conducted within its limits exclusively, is one which has been fully recognized in this court, although it may not be always easy, where the lines of these classes approach each other, to distinguish between the one and the other. The Daniel Ball, 10 Wall. 557 [77 U. S. bk. 19, L. ed. 999]; Hall v. DeCuir, 95 U. S. 485 [Bk. 24, L. ed. 547]; Telegraph Co. v. Texas, 105 U. S. 460 [Bk. 26, L. ed. 1067].

It might admit of question whether the Statute of Illinois, now under consideration, was designed by its framers to affect any other class of transportation than that which begins and ends within the limits of the State. The Supreme Court of Illinois having in this case given an interpretation which makes it apply to what we understand to be commerce among the States, although the contract was made within the State of Illinois, and a part of its performance was within the same State, we are bound, in this court, to accept that construction. It becomes, therefore, necessary to inquire whether the charge exacted from the shippers in this case was a charge for interstate transportation, or was susceptible of a division which would allow so much of it to attach to commerce strictly within the State, and so much more to commerce in other States. The transportation, which is the subject matter of the contract, being the point on which the decision of the case must rest, was it a transportation limited to the State of Illinois, or was it a transportation covering all the lines between Gilman in the one case and Peoria in the other in the State of Illinois, and the City of New York in the State of New York?

The Supreme Court of Illinois does not place [566] its judgment in the present case on the ground that the transportation and the charge are exclusively state commerce; but, conceding that it may be a case of commerce among the States, or interstate commerce, which Congress would have the right to regulate if it had attempted to do so, argues that this Statute of Illinois belongs to that class of commercial regulations which may be established by the laws of a State until Congress shall have exercised its power on that subject; and to this proposition a large part of the argument of the Attorney-General of the State before us is devoted, although he earnestly insists that the Statute of Illinois, which is the foundation of this action, is not a regulation of commerce within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States. In support of its view of the subject the Supreme Court of Illinois cites the cases of Munn v. Illinois, C. B. & Q. R. R. Co. v. Iowa and Peik v. Chicago & N. W. R. R. Co., above referred to. It cannot be denied that the general language of the court in these cases, upon the power of Congress to regulate commerce, may be susceptible of the meaning which the Illinois Court places upon it.

In Munn v. Illinois [supra] the language of this court upon that subject is as follows:

"We come now to consider the effect upon this statute of the power of Congress to regulate commerce. It was very properly said in the case of State Tax on Railway Gross Receipts, 15 Wall. 293 [82 U. S. bk. 21, L. ed. 167] that 'it is not everything that affects commerce that amounts to a regulation of it, within the meaning of the Constitution.' The warehouses of these plaintiffs in error are situated and their business carried on exclusively within the limits of the State of Illinois. They are used as instruments by those engaged in state as well as those engaged in interstate commerce, but they are no more necessarily a part of commerce itself than the dray or the cart by which, but for them, grain would be transferred from one railroad station to another. Incidentally they may become connected with interstate commerce, but not necessarily so. Their regulation is a thing of domestic concern, and, certainly, until Congress acts in reference to their interstate relations, the State may exercise all the powers of [567] government over them, even though in so doing it may indirectly operate upon commerce outside its immediate jurisdiction. We do not say that a case may not arise in which it will be found that a State, under the form of regulating its own affairs, has encroached upon the exclusive domain of Congress in respect to interstate commerce, but we do say that, upon the facts as they are represented to us in this record, that has not been done."

In the case of C. B. & Q. R. R. Co. v. Iowa, [supra] which directly related to railroad transportation, the language is as follows:

"The objection that the statute complained of is void, because it amounts to a regulation of commerce among the States, has been sufficiently considered in the case of Munn v. Illinois. This road, like the warehouse in that case, is situated within the limits of a single State. Its business is carried on there, and its regulation is a matter of domestic concern. It is employed in state as well as in interstate commerce, and, until Congress acts, the State must be permitted to adopt such rules and regulations as may be necessary for the promotion of the general welfare of the people within its own jurisdiction, even though in doing so those without may be indirectly affected."

But the strongest language used by this court in these cases is to be found in Peik v. Chicago & N. W. R. R. Co. [supra], as follows:

"As to the effect of the statute as a regulation of interstate commerce, the law is confined to state commerce, or such interstate commerce as directly affects the people of Wisconsin. Until Congress acts in reference to the relations of this company to interstate commerce, it is certainly within the power of Wisconsin to regulate its fares, etc., so far as they are of domestic concern. With the people of Wisconsin this company has domestic relations. Incidentally, these may reach beyond the State. But certainly, until Congress undertakes to legislate for those who are without the State, Wisconsin may provide for those within, even though it may indirectly affect those without."

[568] These extracts show that the question of the right of the State to regulate the rates of fares and tolls on railroads, and how far that right was affected by the commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States, was presented to the court in those cases. And it must be admitted that, in a general way, the court treated the cases then before it as belonging to that class of regulations of commerce which, like pilotage, bridging navigable rivers, and many others, could be acted upon by the States, in the absence of any legislation by Congress on the same subject.

By the slightest attention to the matter it will be readily seen that the circumstances under which a bridge may be authorized across a navigable stream within the limits of a State for the use of a public highway, and the local rules which shall govern the conduct of the pilots of each of the various harbors of the coasts of the United States, depend upon principles far more limited in their application and importance than those which should regulate the transportation of persons and property across the half or the whole of the continent, over the territory of half a dozen States, through which they are carried without change of car or breaking bulk.

Of the members of the court who concurred in those opinions, there being two dissentients, but three remain, and the writer of this opinion is one of the three. He is prepared to take his share of the responsibility for the language used in those opinions, including the extracts above presented. He does not feel called upon to say whether those extracts justify the decision of the Illinois Court in the present case. It will be seen from the opinions themselves, and from the arguments of counsel presented in the reports, that the question did not receive any very elaborate consideration, either in the opinions of the court or in the arguments of counsel. And the question how far a charge made for a continuous transportation over several States, which included a State whose laws were in question, may be divided into separate charges for each State, in enforcing the power of the State to regulate the fares of its railroads, was evidently not fully considered. These three cases, with others concerning the same subject, were argued [569] at the same time by able counsel, and in relation to the different laws affecting the subject, of the States of Illinois, Iowa, Wisconsin, and Minnesota; the main question in all the cases being the right of the State to establish any limitation upon the power of the railroad companies to fix the price at which they would carry passengers and freight. It was strenuously denied, and very confidently, by all the railroad companies, that any legislative body whatever had a right to limit the tolls and charges to be made by the carrying companies for transportation. And the great question to be decided, and which was decided, and which was argued in all those cases, was the right of the State, within which a railroad company did business, to regulate or limit the amount of any of these traffic charges.

The importance of that question overshadowed all others, and the case of Munn v. Illinois was selected by the court as the most appropriate one in which to give its opinion on that subject, because that case presented the question of a private citizen, or unincorporated partnership, engaged in the warehousing business in Chicago, free from any claim of right or contract under an Act of incorporation of any State whatever, and free from the question of continuous transportation through several States. And in that case the court was presented with the question, which it decided, whether anyone engaged in a public business, in which all the public had a right to require his service, could be regulated by Acts of the Legislature in the exercise of this public function and public duty, so far as to limit the amount of charges that should be made for such services.

The railroad companies set up another defense, apart from denying the general right of the Legislature to regulate transportation charges, namely: that in their charters from the States they each had a contract, express or implied, that they might regulate and establish their own fares and rates of transportation. These two questions were of primary importance; and though it is true that, as incidental or auxiliary to these, the question of the exclusive right of Congress to make such regulations of charges as any legislative power had the right to make, to the exclusion of the States, was presented, it received but little attention at the hands of the [570] court and was passed over with the remarks in the opinions of the court which have been cited.

The case of the State Freight Tax [supra] which was decided only four years before these cases, held an Act of the Legislature of Pennsylvania void, as being in conflict with the commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States, which levied a tax upon all freight carried through the State by any railroad company, or into it from any other State, or out of it into any other State, and valid as to all freight the carriage of which was begun and ended within the limits of the State; because the former was a regulation of interstate commerce, and the latter was a commerce solely within the State which it had a right to regulate. And the question now under consideration, whether these statutes were of a class which the Legislatures of the States could enact in the absence of any Act of Congress on the subject, was considered and decided in the negative.

It is impossible to see any distinction in its effect upon commerce of either class, between a statute which regulates the charges for transportation, and a statute which levies a tax for the benefit of the State upon the same transportation; and in fact the judgment of the court in the State Freight Tax Case rested upon the ground that the tax was always added to the cost of transportation, and thus was a tax in effect upon the privilege of carrying the goods through the State. It is also very difficult to believe that the court consciously intended to overrule the first of these cases without any reference to it in the opinion.

At the very next term of the court, after the delivery of these opinions, the case of Hall v. De Cuir [supra] was decided, in which the same point was considered, in reference to a Statute of the State of Louisiana which attempted to regulate the carriage of passengers upon railroads, steamboats, and other public conveyances, and which provided that no regulations of any companies engaged in that business should make any discrimination on account of race or color. This statute by its terms was limited to persons engaged in that class of [571] business within the State, as is the one now under consideration; and the case presented under the statute was that of a person of color who took passage from New Orleans for Hermitage, both places being within the limits of the State of Louisiana, and was refused accommodations in the general cabin on account of her color. In regard to this, the court declared that "For the purposes of this case, we must treat the Act of Louisiana of February 28, 1869, as requiring those engaged in interstate commerce to give all persons traveling in that State, upon the public conveyances employed in such business, equal rights and privileges in all parts of the conveyance, without distinction or discrimination on account of race or color * * *. We have nothing whatever to do with it as a regulation of internal commerce, or as affecting anything else than commerce among the States."

And, speaking in reference to the right of the States in certain classes of interstate commerce to pass laws regulating them, the opinion says:

"The line which separates the powers of the States from this exclusive power of Congress, is not always distinctly marked; and oftentimes it is not easy to determine on which side a particular case belongs. Judges not unfrequently differ in their reasons for a decision in which they concur. Under such circumstances it would be a useless task to undertake to fix an arbitrary rule by which the line must, in all cases, be located. It is far better to leave a matter of such delicacy to be settled in each case upon a view of the particular rights involved. But we think it may safely be said that state legislation which seeks to impose a direct burden upon interstate commerce, or to interfere directly with its freedom, does encroach upon the exclusive power of Congress. The statute now under consideration, in our opinion, occupies that position. It does not act upon the business through the local instruments to be employed after coming within the State, but directly upon the business as it comes into the State from without, or goes out from within. While it purports only to control the carrier when engaged within the State, it must necessarily influence his conduct to some extent in [572] the management of his business throughout his entire voyage. * * * It was to meet just such a case that the commercial clause in the Constitution was adopted. The River Mississippi passes through or along the borders of ten different States, and its tributaries reach many more. The commerce upon these waters is immense, and its regulation clearly a matter of national concern. If each State was at liberty to regulate the conduct of carriers while within its jurisdiction, the confusion likely to follow could not but be productive of great inconvenience and unnecessary hardship. Each State could provide for its own passengers and regulate the transportation of its own freight, regardless of the interests of others. Nay, more, it could prescribe rules by which the carrier must be governed within the State in respect to passengers and property brought from without. On one side of the river or its tributaries he might be required to observe one set of rules, and on the other, another. Commerce cannot flourish in the midst of such embarrassments."

The applicability of this language to the case now under consideration, of a continuous transportation of goods from New York to central Illinois, or from the latter to New York, is obvious, and it is not easy to see how any distinction can be made. Whatever may be the instrumentalities by which this transportation from the one point to the other is effected, it is but one voyage, as much so as that of the steamboat on the Mississippi River. It is not the railroads themselves that are regulated by this Act of the Illinois Legislature, so much as the charge for transportation; and, in language just cited, if each one of the States through whose territories these goods are transported can fix its own rules for prices, for modes of transit, for times and modes of delivery, and all the other incidents of transportation to which the word "regulation" can be applied, it is readily seen that the embarrassments upon interstate transportation, as an element of interstate commerce, might be too oppressive to be submitted to. "It was," in the language of the court cited above, "to meet just such a case that the commerce clause of the Constitution was adopted."

It cannot be too strongly insisted upon, that [573] the right of continuous transportation from one end of the country to the other is essential in modern times to that freedom of commerce from the restraints which the States might choose to impose upon it, that the commerce clause was intended to secure. This clause, giving to Congress the power to regulate commerce among the States, and with foreign nations, as this court has said before, was among the most important of the subjects which prompted the formation of the Constitution. Cook v. Pennsylvania, 97 U. S. 574 [Bk. 24, L. ed. 1018]; Brown v. Maryland, 12 Wheat. 446 [25 U. S. bk. 6, L. ed. 688]. And it would be a very feeble and almost useless provision, but poorly adapted to secure the entire freedom of commerce among the States which was deemed essential to a more perfect union by the framers of the Constitution, if, at every stage of the transportation of goods and chattels through the country, the State within whose limits a part of this transportation must be done could impose regulations concerning the price, compensation, or taxation, or any other restrictive regulation interfering with and seriously embarrassing this commerce.

The argument on this subject can never be better stated than it is by Chief Justice Marshall in Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. 195–6 [22 U. S. bk. 6, L. ed. 70]. He there demonstrates that commerce among the States, like commerce with foreign nations, is necessarily a commerce which crosses state lines, and extends into the States; and the power of Congress to regulate it exists wherever that commerce is found. Speaking of navigation as an element of commerce, which it is, only as a means of transportation now largely superseded by railroads, he says: "The power of Congress, then, comprehends navigation within the limits of every State in the Union, so far as that navigation may be, in any manner, connected with 'commerce with foreign nations, or among the several States, or with the Indian Tribes.' It may, of consequence, pass the jurisdictional line of New York and act upon the very waters (the Hudson River) to which the prohibition now under consideration applies." P. 197 [70]. So the same power may pass the line of the State of Illinois and act upon its restriction upon the right of transportation extending over several States, including that one.

In the case of Telegraph Co. v. Texas [supra] the court held that "A telegraph company occupies the same relation to commerce as a carrier of messages that a railroad company does as a carrier of goods;" and that "both companies are instruments of commerce, and their business is commerce itself." And relying upon the case of the State Freight Tax [supra] already referred to, the court said that a tax by the State of Texas upon all messages carried within its borders was forbidden by the commerce clause of the Constitution, as being a tax upon commerce among the States; and observed that "The tax is the same on every message sent, and because it is sent, without regard to the distance carried or the price charged. * * * Clearly, if a fixed tax for every two thousand pounds of freight carried is a tax on the freight, or for every measured ton of a vessel a tax on tonnage, or for every passenger carried a tax on the passenger, or for the sale of of goods a tax on the goods, this must be a tax on the messages. As such, so far as it operates on private messages sent out of the State, it is a regulation of foreign and interstate commerce and beyond the power of the State. That is fully established by the cases already cited."

In the case of Welton v. Missouri, 91 U. S. 275 [Bk. 23, L.ed. 347], it was said: "It will not be denied that that portion of commerce with foreign countries and between the States which consists in the transportation and exchange of commodities is of national importance, and admits and requires uniformity of regulation. The very object of investing this power in the General Government was to insure this uniformity against discriminating state legislation."

And in County of Mobile v. Kimball, 102 U. S. 691 [Bk. 26, L. ed. 238], the same idea is very clearly stated in the following language: "Commerce with foreign countries and among the States, strictly considered, consists in intercourse and traffic, including in these terms navigation and the transportation and transit of persons and property, as well as the purchase, sale and exchange of commodities. For the regulation of commerce as thus defined there can be only one system of rules, applicable alike to the whole country; and the authority which can act for the whole country can alone adopt such a system. Action upon it by separate States is not, therefore, permissible. Language affirming the exclusiveness of the grant of power over commerce as thus defined may not be inaccurate, when it would be so if applied to legislation upon subjects which are merely auxiliary to commerce."

In the case of Gloucester Ferry Co. v. Pennsylvania [supra], decided two years ago, the court declared without dissent that: "It needs no argument to show that the commerce with foreign nations and between the States, which consists in the transportation of persons and property between them, is a subject of national character and requires uniformity of regulation." And still later, in the case of Pickard v. Pullman Southern Car Co. [supra], the whole subject is very fully re-examined; and a tax of the State of Tennessee upon sleeping cars of that company, which were used in carrying passengers through the State, and into it and out of it, was held void as a regulation of commerce among the States.

The case of Stone v. Farmers Loan & T. Co. [supra], argued at the same term as the present, while it does not decide the latter, evidently does not support the construction placed by the Supreme Court of Illinois upon the case of Munn v. Illinois, and the other cases on which the court relies.

We must, therefore, hold that it is not, and never has been, the deliberate opinion of a majority of this court that a statute of a State which attempts to regulate the fares and charges by railroad companies within its limits, for a transportation which constitutes a part of commerce among the States, is a valid law.

Let us see precisely what is the degree of interference with transportation of property or persons from one State to another which this statute proposes. A citizen of New York has goods which he desires to have transported by the railroad companies from that city to the interior of the State of Illinois. A continuous line of rail over which a car loaded with these goods can be carried, and is carried habitually, connects the place of shipment with the place of delivery. He undertakes to make a contract with a person engaged in the carrying business at the end of this route from whence the goods are to start, and he is told by the carrier: "I am free to make a fair and reasonable contract for this carriage to the line of the State of Illinois, but when the car which carries these goods is to cross the line of that State, pursuing at the same time this continuous track, I am met by a law of Illinois which forbids me to make a free contract concerning this transportation within that State, and subjects me to certain rules by which I am to be governed as to the charges which the same railroad company in Illinois may make, or has made, with reference to other persons and other places of delivery." So that while that carrier might be willing to carry these goods from the City of New York to the City of Peoria at the rate of fifteen cents per hundred pounds, he is not permitted to do so because the Illinois Railroad Company has already charged at the rate of twenty-five cents per hundred pounds for carriage to Gilman, in Illinois, which is eighty-six miles shorter than the distance to Peoria.

So, also, in the present case; the owner of corn, the principal product of the country, desiring to transport it from Peoria, in Illinois, to

New York, finds a Railroad Company willing to do this at the rate of fifteen cents per hundred pounds for a carload, but is compelled to pay at the rate of twenty-five cents per hundred pounds, because the Railroad Company has received from a person residing at Gilman twenty-five cents per hundred pounds for the transportation of a carload of the same class of freight over the same line of road from Gilman to New York. This is the result of the Statute of Illinois, in its endeavor to prevent unjust discrimination, as construed by the Supreme Court of that State. The effect of it is, that whatever may be the rate of transportation per mile charged by the Railroad Company from Gilman to Sheldon, a distance of twenty-three miles, in which the loading and the unloading of the freight is the largest expense incurred by the Railroad Company, the same rate per mile must be charged from Peoria to the City of New York.

The obvious injustice of such a rule as this, which railroad companies are by heavy penalties compelled to conform to, in regard to commerce among the States, when applied to [577] transportation which includes Illinois in a long line of carriage through several States, shows the value of the constitutional provision which confides the power of regulating interstate commerce to the Congress of the United States, whose enlarged view of the interests of all the States, and of the railroads concerned, better fits it to establish just and equitable rules.

Of the justice or propriety of the principle which lies at the foundation of the Illinois Statute it is not the province of this court to speak. As restricted to a transportation which begins and ends within the limits of the State, it may be very just and equitable, and it certainly is the province of the State Legislature to determine that question. But when it is attempted to apply to transportation through an entire series of States a principle of this kind, and each one of the States shall attempt to establish its own rates of transportation, its own methods to prevent discrimination in rates, or to permit it, the deleterious influence upon the freedom of commerce among the States and upon the transit of goods through those States cannot be overestimated. That this species of regulation is one which must be, if established at all, of a general and national character, and cannot be safely and wisely remitted to local rules and local regulations, we think is clear from what has already been said. And if it be a regulation of commerce, as we think we have demonstrated it is, and as the Illinois Court concedes it to be, it must be of that national character, and the regulation can only appropriately exist by general rules and principles, which demand that it should be done by the Congress of the United States under the commerce clause of the Constitution.

The judgment of the Supreme Court of Illinois is therefore reversed, and the case remanded to that court for further proceedings in conformity with this opinion.

True copy. Test:
James H. McKenney, Clerk, Sup. Court, U. S.

Mr. Justice Bradley dissenting:

The Chief Justice, Mr. Justice Gray and myself dissent from the opinion and judgment of the court in this case, and I am authorized to state the reasons upon which our dissent is founded.

The Wabash, St. Louis and Pacific Railway [578] Company, an Illinois corporation, plaintiff in error, was sued by the State of Illinois to recover a penalty for the breach of its laws, passed "to prevent extortion and unjust discrimination in the rates charged for the transportation of passengers and freight on railroads in the State." The law sued on was originally passed in 1871, and revised in 1873, and the material portions of its most important section are in the following words, to wit:

"If any such railroad corporation shall charge, collect or receive for the transportation of any passenger or freight of any description, upon its railroad, for any distance, within this State, the same or a greater amount of toll or compensation than is at the same time charged, collected or received for the transportation, in the same direction, of any passenger or like quantity of freight, of the same class, over a greater distance of the same railroad; * * * or if it shall charge, collect or receive from any person or persons, for the use and transportation of any railroad car or cars upon its railroad, for any distance, the same or a greater amount of toll or compensation than it at the same time charged, collected or received from any other person or persons, for the use and transportation of any railroad car of the same class or number, for a like purpose, being transported in the same direction, over a greater distance of the same railroad; * * * all such discriminating rates, charges, collections, or receipts, whether made directly or by means of rebate, drawback or other shift or evasion, shall be deemed and taken, against any such railroad corporation, as prima facie evidence of unjust discrimination, prohibited by the provisions of this Act; * * * Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to prevent railroad corporations from issuing commutation, excursion or thousand-mile tickets, as the same are now issued by such corporations."

A penalty of not less than $1,000, and not more than $5,000, for the first offense is imposed for the violation of the law; and it was for this penalty that the Company was sued in the Ford County Circuit Court.

The declaration alleged, in substance, that [579] the Company charged certain parties fifteen cents per hundred pounds for carrying a load of freight from Peoria, in the State of Illinois, to New York, one hundred and nine miles of the distance being in Illinois, whilst at the same time it charged certain other parties twenty-five cents per hundred pounds for carrying a like load of the same class of freight from Gilman, also in the State of Illinois, to New York, twenty-three miles of the distance being in Illinois, both places being on the line of the road. This allegation was substantially admitted, and judgment was finally rendered in favor of the State, and was sustained by the Supreme Court of the State, to which the present writ of error was directed.

The main point insisted on by the Railway Company in its defense was that the law on which the action was founded is unconstitutional in its application to their case, as being a regulation of interstate commerce. They also contended that a gross charge from Peoria or Gilman to New York was no evidence of any particular charge within the State of Illinois.

The construction given to the law by the Supreme Court of Illinois is to be received by us, on a writ of error brought for the purpose of questioning its constitutionality. That construction is clearly exhibited in the following announcement of the opinion of that court when the case was brought before it a second time. The court says:

"We see no reason to depart from the conclusion reached in this case when it was here before. See People v. W. St. L. & P. Railway Co. 104 Ill. 476. But to avoid misapprehension, we deem it desirable to state explicitly that we disclaim any idea that Illinois has authority to regulate commerce in any other State. We understand and simply hold that, in the absence of anything showing to the contrary, a single and entire contract to carry for a gross sum from Gilman, in this State, to the City of New York, implies necessarily that that sum is charged proportionately for the carriage on every part of that distance; and that a single and entire contract to carry for a gross sum from Peoria, in this State, to the City of New York, implies the same thing; and that, therefore, when it is shown that there is charged for [580] carriage upon the same line less from Peoria to New York (the greater distance), than from Gilman to New York (the less distance), and nothing is shown to the effect that such inequality in charge is all for carriage entirely beyond the limits of this State, a prima facie case is made out of unjust discrimination, under our statute, occurring within this State. We hold that the excess in the charge for the less distance presumably affects every part of the line of carriage between Gilman and the state line proportionately with the balance of the line. The judgment is affirmed." Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Illinois, 105 Ill. 236.

We have no doubt that this view of the presumed equal distribution of the charge to every part of the route is correct. If one tenth, or any other proportion, of the whole route of transportation was in Illinois, the clear presumption is, if nothing be shown to the contrary (as nothing was shown), that the like proportion of the whole charge was made for the transportation in that State.

The principal question in this case, therefore, is whether, in the absence of congressional legislation, a State Legislature has the power to regulate the charges made by the railroads of the State for transporting goods and passengers to and from places within the State, when such goods or passengers are brought from, or carried to, points without the State, and are, therefore, in course of transportation from another State, or to another State. It is contended that as such transportation is commerce between or among different States, the power does not exist. The majority of the court so hold. We feel obliged to dissent from that opinion. We think that the State does not lose its power to regulate the charges of its own railroads in its own territory, simply because the goods or persons transported have been brought from or are destined to a point beyond the State in another State.

The case before us is not embarrassed by any allegation of a contract between the State and the Company; it is a question of the power to regulate, pure and simple. The State has never contracted away or attempted to contract away this power.

It is also unembarrassed by any federal legislation on the subject. [58 No one disputes that Congress might, if it saw fit, under its power to regulate commerce among the several States, regulate the matter under consideration; but it has not done so. The question rests solely and entirely upon the power of the State, when unrestrained by any contract, or by any action of the legislative department of the United States. Does it follow, then, that because Congress has the power to regulate this matter, though it has not exercised that power, therefore the State is divested of all power of regulation? That is the question before us.

We had supposed that this question was concluded by the previous decisions of this court; that all local arrangements and regulations respecting highways, turnpikes, railroads, bridges, canals, ferries, dams and wharves, within the State, their construction and repair, and the charges to be made for their use, though materially affecting commerce, both internal and external, and thereby incidentally operating to a certain extent as regulations of interstate commerce, were within the power and jurisdiction of the several States. That is still our opinion.

It is almost a work of supererogation to refer to the cases. They are legion. A few, only, will be selected and referred to:

The first great case on the subject was that of Willson v. Blackbird Creek Co. 2 Pet. 245 [27 U. S. bk. 7, L. ed. 412], where the State of Delaware had authorized a dam in a navigable tide water creek of that State, communicating with Delaware Bay; and Chief Justice Marshall, delivering the unanimous opinion of the court, said: "The value of the property on its banks must be enhanced by excluding the water from the marsh, and the health of the inhabitants probably improved. Measures calculated to produce these objects, provided they do not come into collision with the powers of the General Government, are undoubtedly within those which are reserved to the States. But the measure authorized by this Act stops a navigable creek, and must be supposed to abridge the rights of those who have been accustomed to use it. But this abridgment, unless it comes [in conflict with the Constitution or a law of the United States, is an affair between the government of Delaware and its citizens, of which this court can take no cognizance. The counsel for the plaintiff in error insist that it comes in conflict with the power of the United States 'to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States.' If Congress had passed any Act which bore upon the case, any Act in execution of the power to regulate commerce, the object of which was to control state legislation over those small navigable creeks into which the tide flows, and which abound throughout the lower country of the middle and southern States, we should feel not much difficulty in saying that a state law coming in conflict with such Act would be void. But Congress has passed no such Act. The repugnancy of the law of Delaware to the Constitution is placed entirely on its repugnancy to the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States; a power which has not been so exercised as to affect the question. We do not think the Act empowering the Blackbird Creek Marsh Company to place a dam across the creek can, under all the circumstances of the case, be considered as repugnant to the power to regulate commerce in its dormant state, or as being in conflict with any law passed on the subject."

This case was, in all things, affirmed by the later case of Gilman v. Philadelphia, 3 Wall. 713 [70 U. S. bk. 18, L. ed. 96]. The Legislature of Pennsylvania authorized the City of Philadelphia to erect a permanent bridge across the Schuylkill River, a navigable water, at the foot of Chestnut Street. It was sought to restrain the erection of this bridge on the same grounds which had been urged in the Blackbird Creek Case; but the Circuit Court of the United States refused to interfere, and dismissed a bill for an injunction. The decision was sustained by this court, which held that it was for Congress to determine when its full power to regulate commerce should be brought into activity, and as to the regulations and sanctions which should be provided; and that, until the dormant power of the Constitution is awakened and made effective by appropriate legislation, the reserved power of the States is plenary, and its exercise in good faith cannot be made the subject of review by this court.

[583] These principles are reaffirmed in the still more recent case of Escanaba Co. v. Chicago, 107 U. S. 678 [Bk. 27, L. ed. 442]. In that case the authorities of Chicago, under the powers conferred upon them by the Legislature of Illinois, regulated the times for opening and closing the draws in the bridges crossing the Chicago River, so as to accommodate the local travel across them at certain times, and to allow the passage of vessels at others. This operated as a regulation of the commerce on the river, including interstate and foreign, as well as domestic commerce. But there being no legislation of Congress to the contrary, this court held that the power was constitutionally exercised. Commerce was affected; commerce was even incidentally regulated; but the jurisdiction of the State, and of the city acting under state authority, was unhesitatingly recognized by the court. Mr. Justice Field, delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The Chicago River and its branches must, therefore, be deemed navigable waters of the United States, over which Congress under its commercial power may exercise control to the extent necessary to protect, preserve and improve the free navigation. But the States have full power to regulate within their limits matters of internal police, including in that general designation whatever will promote the peace, comfort, convenience and prosperity of the people. This power embraces the construction of roads, canals and bridges, and the establishment of ferries, and it can generally be exercised more wisely by the States than by a distant authority. * * * Nowhere could the power to control the bridges in that city, their construction, form and strength, and the size of their draws, and the manner and times of using them, be better vested than with the State, or the authority of the city upon whom it has devolved that duty. When its power is exercised, so as to unnecessarily obstruct the navigation of the river or its branches, Congress may interfere and remove the obstruction. * * * But until Congress acts on the subject, the power of the State over bridges across its navigable streams is plenary."

The doctrines announced in these cases apply not only to dams in, and bridges over, navigable streams, but to all structures and appliances in a State which may incidentally interfere with commerce, or which may be erected or created for the furtherance of commerce, whether by water or by land. It is matter of common knowledge that, from the beginning of the government, the States have exercised almost exclusive control over roads, bridges, ferries, wharves and harbors. No one has doubted their right to do so. It is recognized in the great case of Gibbons v. Ogden, where Chief Justice Marshall, after enumerating some of the powers reserved to the States, says: "They form a portion of that immense mass of legislation, which embraces everything within the territory of a State, not surrendered to the General Government; all which can be most advantageously exercised by the States themselves. Inspection laws, quarantine laws, health laws of every description, as well as laws for regulating the internal commerce of a State, and those which respect turnpike roads, ferries, etc., are component parts of this mass." And he adds (what is very pertinent to this discussion): "No direct general power over these objects is granted to Congress; and, consequently, they remain subject to state legislation. If the legislative power of the Union can reach them, it must be for national purposes; it must be where the power is expressly given for a special purpose; or is clearly incidental to some power which is expressly given."

The case of Transportation Co. v. Parkersburg, 107 U. S. 691 [Bk. 27, L. ed. 584], related to wharves. The City of Parkersburg had built certain wharves for the accommodation of vessels, principally steamboats, navigating the Ohio River. The transportation company being the owner of several steamboats plying on that river, complained of the wharfage charges as being extortionate and an unconstitutional interference with the commerce of the Ohio River. It was shown that the charges were imposed by authority derived from the state laws; and we held that until Congress interfered, the charges for wharfage was a matter of state law, and of state jurisdiction. We then said: "Wharves, levees and landing places are essential to commerce by water, no less than a navigable channel and a clear river. But they are attached to the land; they are private property, real estate; and they are primarily, at least, subject to the local state laws. * * * Until Congress has acted, the courts of the United States cannot assume control over the subject as a matter of federal cognizance. It is Congress, and not the judicial department, to which the Constitution has given the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States. The courts can never take the initiative on the subject."

There is a class of subjects, it is true, pertaining to interstate and foreign commerce, which require general and uniform rules for the whole country, so as to obviate unjust discriminations against any part, and in respect of which local regulations made by the States would be repugnant to the power vested in Congress, and, therefore, unconstitutional; but there are other subjects of local character and interest which not only admit of, but are generally best regulated by state authority. This distinction is pointed out and enforced in the case of Cooley v. Port Wardens of Phila. 12 How. 299 [53 U. S, bk. 13, L. ed. 996]. In that case it was held that the pilotage regulations of the different ports of the country belong to the latter class, and are susceptible of state regulation. This case has been approved in several subsequent decisions. Gilman v. Philadelphia, ubi supra; Crandall v. Nevada, 6 Wall. 35, 42 [73 U. S. bk. 18, L. ed. 745]; Ex parte McNiel, 13 Wall. 236 [80 U. S. bk. 20, L. ed. 624]; Osborne v. Mobile, 16 Wall. 482 [83 U. S. bk. 21, L. ed. 473]; R. R. Co. v. Fuller, 17 Wall. 569 [84 U. S. bk. 21, L. ed. 714]; The Lottawanna, 21 Wall. 581, 582 [88 U. S. bk. 22, L. ed. 664]; Packet Co. v. Keokuk, 95 U. S. 88 [Bk. 24, L. ed. 381]; Pound v. Turck, 95 U. S. 462 [Bk. 24, L. ed. 526]; Hall v. De Cuir, 95 U. S. 488 [Bk. 24, L. ed. 548]; Wilson v. McNamee, 102 U. S. 575 [Bk. 26, L. ed. 235]; Co. of Mobile v. Kimball, 102 U. S. 698 [Bk. 26, L. ed. 240]; Packet Co. v. Catlettsburg, 105 U. S. 562 [Bk. 26, L. ed. 1170].

It is hardly necessary to argue that, in reference to this rule, railroads, canals, turnpikes, bridges, ferries and wharves belong to the category of local subjects, local means and local aids of commercial intercourse. Congress may establish national roads, canals and bridges, it is true; but we speak of those, hitherto the most part, which are constructed and established under state authority; and in reference to these, it seems to us very clear that, in the absence of congressional legislation to the contrary, they are not only susceptible of state regulation, but properly amenable to it, irrespective of other considerations to which we shall refer.

The highways in a State are the highways of the State. Convenient ways and means of intercommunication are the first evidence of the civilization of a people. The highways of a country are not of private but of public institution and regulation. In modern times, it is true, government is in the habit, in some countries, of letting out the construction of important highways, requiring a large expenditure of capital, to agents, generally corporate bodies created for the purpose, and giving to them the right of taxing those who travel or transport goods thereon, as a means of obtaining compensation for their outlay. But a superintending power over the highways, and the charges imposed upon the public for their use, always remains in the government. This is not only its indefeasible right, but is necessary for the protection of the people against extortion and abuse. These positions we deem to be incontrovertible. Indeed, they are adjudged law in the decisions of this court. Railroads and railroad corporations are in this category.

Now, since every railroad may be, and generally is, a medium of transportation for interstate commerce, and affects that commerce; and since the charges of fare and freight for such transportation affect and incidentally regulate that commerce; and since the railroad could not be built, and the charges upon it could not be exacted, without authority from the State, it follows as a necessary consequence that the State, in the exercise of its undoubted functions and sovereignty, does, in the establishment and regulation of railroads, to a certain and a very material extent, not only do that which affects, but incidentally regulates commerce. It does so by the very Act of authorizing the construction of railroads and the collection of fares and freights thereon. No one doubts its powers to do this. The very being of the plaintiffs in error, the very existence of their railroad, the very power they exercise of charging fares and freights, are all derived from the State. And yet, according to the argument of the plaintiffs in error, pursued to its legitimate consequences, the Act of the State in doing all this ought to be regarded as null [587 and void because it operates as a regulation of commerce among the States. Not only does the right to charge fares and freights at all, come to a railroad company from the grant of the State, but the amount of such charges is also regulated by the state law, either by the charter of the company, or by legislative regulations, or by the general law that the charges shall be reasonable; and that is state law and not United States law. Where else but from the laws of the State does the railroad company get its right to charge any fares or freight at all? And since its being, its franchises, its powers, its road, its right to charge, all come from the State, and are the creation of state law, how can it be contended that the State has no power of regulation over those charges, and over the conduct of the company in the transaction of its business whilst acting within the State and using its railroad lying within the bounds of the State? Omne majus continet in se minus. If the State created the Company and its franchises, it surely may make regulations as to the manner of using them.

It is evident from what has been said, that the dealing of a State with a railroad corporation of its own creation, in authorizing the construction and maintenance of its road and the charge of fares and freights thereon, is, in its purpose, a matter entirely aside from that kind of regulation of commerce which is obnoxious to the provisions of the Constitution. There is not a particle of doubt that it was the right of the State to prescribe the route of the plaintiff's [in error] road—it might be in a direction north and south, or east and west; it might be by one town, or by a different town; it was its right to prescribe how the road should be built, what means of locomotion should be used on it, how fast the trains might run, at what stations they should stop. It was its right to prescribe its charges, and to declare that they should be uniform, or, if not uniform, how otherwise; this certainly was the right of the State at the inception of the charter, and every one of these things would most materially affect commerce, not only internal but external; and yet not one of them would be repugnant to the power of Congress to regulate commerce within the meaning of the Constitution.

[588] Suppose the original charter of the Railroad Company in this case had contained precisely the provision against discriminating charges which is contained in the general law now complained of, could the Company disregard the conditions of its charter, and defy the authority of the State? We think it clear that it could not. But if the State had the power to impose such a condition in the original charter, it must have the same power at any time afterwards; for the exercise of the power in the original grant would be just as repugnant to the Constitution, and no more, as the exercise of it at a subsequent period. The regulation of charges is just as unconstitutional in a charter as in a general law.

To sum up the matter in a word: we hold it to be a sound proposition of law, that the making of railroads and regulating the charges for their use is not such a regulation of commerce as to be in the remotest degree repugnant to any power given to Congress by the Constitution, so long as that power is dormant, and has not been exercised by Congress. They affect commerce; they incidentally regulate it; but they are acts in relation to the subject which the State has a perfect right to do, subject, always, to the controlling power of Congress over the regulation of commerce when Congress sees fit to act.

It is only for the sake of convenience that the State lets out its railroads to private corporations. It might construct them itself. Suppose it had done so in this case; could not the State have instituted such rates of freight and fare as it pleased? Certainly it could. It might have made them uniform, as the present law requires them to be, or it might have made them discriminative between different places, and no one could have called it to account. Instructions in the form of laws, or in the form of orders made by a state board, might have been given to the superintendents of the road, acting in behalf of the State, to adopt the one course or the other. Could the agents of the State, acting under such instructions, have been interfered with by the judicial department, on the ground of unconstitutionality? Certainly not; certainly not, unless discriminations were made to the prejudice of the citizens of other States, or of the products of other States.

[589] The State of New York built and owns the Erie Canal. Did any court ever attempt to control that State in its regulation of tolls on the canal, even though made for the purpose of affecting the relative movement of goods on the canal and the railroads of the State? We presume that no such attempt was ever made, or would be successful if made.

It is true, and this we concede, that if the laws of a State discriminate adversely to the citizens or products of other States, whether the railroads belong to the State or to private corporations, the courts might interfere on the ground of the repugnancy of such regulations to that freedom of commerce which Congress by its nonaction on the subject has indicated shall exist. This has been frequently decided. Welton v. Missouri, 91 U. S. 282 [Bk. 23, L. ed. 350]; Brown v. Houston, 114 U. S. 622, 631 [Bk. 29, L. ed. 257, 260], and cases there cited. But no such discrimination is made by the law in question.

We also concede that any taxes, duties or impositions upon interstate commerce (that is, upon the commerce itself) carried on over the railroads of the State, would interfere with the freedom of such commerce, and would be repugnant to the presumed intention of Congress. This has frequently been decided. Crandall v. Nevada [supra]; State Freight Tax Cases, 15 Wall. 232 [82 U. S. bk. 21, L. ed. 146]; Coe v. Errol, 116 U. S. 517 [Bk. 29, L. ed. 715]; and the authorities cited in the latter case. But the present is not a case of that kind, and has no semblance of likeness to it. All such discriminations, taxes, duties and impositions are direct regulations and burdens upon the commerce itself, and come fairly within the exclusive prerogatives of Congress.

The distinction between such burdens and charges for service rendered is well explained in the case of Gloucester Ferry Co. v. Pa. 114 U. S. 196, 217 [Bk. 29, L. ed. 158, 166], where Mr. Justice Field, delivering the unanimous opinion of the court, in relation to ferries says: "It is true that, from the earliest period in the history of the government, the States have authorized and regulated ferries, not only over waters entirely within their limits, but over waters separating them; and it may be conceded that in many respects the States can more advantageously manage such interstate ferries than the General Government; and that the privilege of [590] keeping a ferry, with a right to take toll for passengers and freight, is a franchise grantable by the State, to be exercised within such limits and under such regulations as may be required for the safety, comfort and convenience of the public. Still the fact remains that such a ferry is a means, and a necessary means, of commercial intercourse between the States bordering on their dividing waters, and it must, therefore, be conducted without the imposition by the States of taxes or other burdens upon the commerce between them. Freedom from such impositions does not, of course, imply exemption from reasonable charges, as compensation for the carriage of persons, in the way of tolls or fares, or from the ordinary taxation to which other property is subjected, any more than like freedom of transportation on land implies such exemption. Reasonable charges for the use of property, either on water or land, are not an interference with the freedom of transportation between the States secured under the commercial power of Congress. * * * That freedom implies exemption from other charges than such as are imposed by way of compensation for the use of the property employed, or for the facilities afforded for its use, or as ordinary taxes upon the value of property."

This subject in many of its aspects was considered by this court in the case of Baltimore & O. R. R. Co. v. Maryland, 21 Wall. 456 [88 U. S. bk. 22, L. ed. 678]. In that case, in a charter for constructing and operating a railroad from Baltimore to Washington, authority was given to the company to charge $2.50 for each passenger, and it was stipulated that the company should pay to the State one fifth of the whole amount received for the transportation of passengers on the road. The company sued for a return of the sums paid on this account, as being exacted by an unconstitutional law. It was insisted that the reservation was equivalent to the imposition of a tax on passengers, and, therefore, a restriction of free intercourse and traffic between different States—much of the travel being that of passengers coming from, or going to, other States. The argument that the reservation of one fifth of the passage money necessitated an increased charge upon [591] the passenger was met by this court as follows: "Had the State built the road in question, it might to this day have charged $2.50 for carrying a passenger between Baltimore and Washington. So might the railroad company under authority from the State, if it saw fit to do so. This unlimited right of the State to charge, or to authorize others to charge, toll, freight, or fare, for transportation on its roads, canals and railroads, arises from the simple fact that they are its own works, or constructed under its authority. It gives them being. It has a right to exact compensation for their use. It has a discretion as to the amount of that compensation. That discretion is a legislative, a sovereign discretion, and in its very nature is unrestricted and uncontrolled. * * * The exercise of this power on the part of a State is very different from the imposition of a tax or duty upon the movements or operations of commerce between the States. Such an imposition, whether relating to persons or goods, we have decided the States cannot make, because it would be a regulation of commerce between the States in a matter in which uniformity is essential to the rights of all, and therefore, requiring the exclusive legislation of Congress. Crandall v. Nevada, 6 Wall. 42 [73 U. S. bk. 18, L. ed. 746]; State Freight Tax Cases, 15 Id. 232, 279 [82 U. S. bk. 21, L. ed. 146, 162]. It is a tax because of the transportation, and is, therefore, virtually a tax on the transportation, and not in any sense a compensation therefor, or for the franchise enjoyed by the corporation that performs it. * * * The question is practically reduced to this: What amounts to a regulation of commerce between the States? This is often difficult to determine. In view, however, of the very plenary powers which a State has always been conceded to have over its own territory, its highways, its franchises and its corporations, we cannot regard the stipulation in question as amounting to either of these unconstitutional Acts. It is not within the category of such Acts. It may incidentally affect transportation, it is true; but so does every burden or tax imposed on corporations or persons engaged in that business. Such burdens, however, are imposed diverso intuitu, and in the exercise of an undoubted power."

But it is needless to multiply citations which establish or recognize the principles which govern the present case. The very point in question has been already expressly decided by this court. We refer to the case of Peik v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 94 U. S. 164 [Bk. 24, L. ed. 97]. That was a bill filed by the bondholders of the company to restrain the railroad commissioners of Wisconsin from enforcing a law of that State limiting the rate of charges for transporting passengers and freights on the railroads of the State. The bill, amongst other things, complained that the classes of freight established by section 3 of the Act were different from those established by the laws of Illinois, Iowa, and Minnesota, for the transportation of freight upon the railroads of the same company in those States, and rendered it practically impossible to carry on the business of transporting freight from Wisconsin to either of those States; and that the eighteenth section (limiting the rates) was a regulation of interstate commerce. The Act excepted from its operation the case of freight or passengers carried from one State to another State entirely through or across the State of Wisconsin. It did operate on freight and passengers carried from another State to any point within the State of Wisconsin, or from any such point to another State. The Chief Justice, in delivering the opinion of the court, states the precise question to be decided, as follows: "These suits present the single question of the power of the Legislature of Wisconsin to provide by law for a maximum of charge by the Chicago and Northwestern Railway Company for fare and freight upon the transportation of persons and property carried within the State, or taken up outside the State and brought within it, or taken up inside and carried without." He then, after disposing of certain other questions relating to the consolidation of the company with an Illinois company, disposes of the main question as follows: "As to the effect of the statute as a regulation of interstate commerce, the law is confined to state commerce, or such interstate commerce as directly affects the people of Wisconsin. Until Congress acts in reference to the relations of this company to interstate commerce, it is certainly within the power of Wisconsin to regulate its fares, etc., so far as they are of domestic [593] concern. With the people of Wisconsin this company has domestic relations. Incidentally, these may reach beyond the State. But certainly until Congress undertakes to legislate for those who are without the State, Wisconsin may provide for those within, even though it may indirectly affect those without." The law was sustained, and the bill of complaint was dismissed.

We do not see how this case can be distinguished from that now under consideration. The fact that in Peik's Case there was a classification of freights and a limitation of charges, and in the present case a prohibition of discrimination in the charges, is a distinction without a difference. The opinion is brief, it is true, but all the principles involved in it were so fully discussed in the cases immediately preceding, beginning with that of Munn v. Illinois, that no extended discussion of Peik's Case was deemed necessary. All the justices who concurred in the opinion were entirely satisfied with it. The cases were all argued at the same time, or in reference to each other, and were considered together. But there stands the judgment of the court, and, in our apprehension, the judgment in the present case is directly opposed to it.

We have omitted to cite a number of cases corroborating the views we have expressed. The case of State Tax on R. Gross Receipts, 15 Wall. 284 [82 U. S. bk. 21, L. ed. 164], is weighted with arguments and considerations in this direction. We would also refer to the cases of Osborne v. Mobile, 16 Wall. 479 [83 U. S. bk. 21, L. ed. 470]; R. R. Co. v. Fuller, 17 Wall. 560 [84 U. S. bk. 21, L. ed. 710]; R. R. Commission Cases, 116 U. S. 307, 334, 335 [Bk. 29, L. ed. 636, 645].

It is supposed that the decision in Hall v. De

Cuir, 95 U. S. 485 [Bk. 24, L. ed. 547], supports the contention of the plaintiffs in error. We think not. What was that case? A Statute of Louisiana, as construed by its courts, prohibited those engaged in the business of carrying passengers, in that State (including those engaged in interstate commerce), from making any discrimination on account of race or color in the use of the accommodations in their conveyances; a direct regulation of commerce, and within the reason of the tax cases before referred to. A steamer which regularly plied between New Orleans and Vicksburg had a cabin specially set apart for white persons, and De Cuir, [594] a colored person, being refused admission to that cabin, sued for damages. We held that the law (as above suggested) was a direct regulation of commerce and a burden upon it. It compelled the steamboat proprietors to place colored persons traveling from one place to another in Louisiana, in the cabin set apart for white persons, many of whom were bound to another State; and, therefore, in its operation was a regulation of interstate commerce. It was against the rule that, in the absence of action by Congress, commerce must remain free and untrammeled. By that rule the proprietor of the vessel was at liberty to adopt such reasonable rules and regulations for the disposition and comfort of passengers upon his boat, while pursuing its voyage, as seemed to him most for the interest of all concerned. The statute took away from him this power so long as he was within Louisiana. We especially distinguished the case from those of Munn v. Illinois, Peik v. R. R. Co., and the cognate cases, as belonging to a different category, and governed by different consideration; and the difference between them seems to us very apparent.

The Chief Justice, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "There can be no doubt but that exclusive power has been conferred upon Congress in respect to the regulation of commerce among the several States. The difficulty has never been as to the existence of this power, but as to what is to be deemed an encroachment upon it; for, as has been often said, 'Legislation may in a great variety of ways affect commerce and persons engaged in it without constituting a regulation of it within the meaning of the constitution.' Sherlock v. Alling, 93 U. S. 103 [Bk. 23, L. ed. 820]; State Tax on R. Gross Receipts [supra]. Thus, in Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113 [Bk. 24, L. ed. 77], it was decided that a State might regulate the charges of public warehouses, and, in Chic. B. & Q. R. Co. v. Iowa, 94 U. S. 155 [Bk. 24, L. ed. 94], of railroads situate entirely within the State, even though those engaged in commerce among the States might sometimes use the warehouses or the railroads in the prosecution of their business." After referring to the cases of dams and bridges over navigable waters, and of turnpikes and ferries, [595] the Chief Justice continued: "By such statutes the States regulate, as a matter of domestic concern, the instruments of commerce situated wholly within their own jurisdictions, and over which they have exclusive governmental control, except when employed in interstate commerce. As they can only be used in the State, their regulation for all purposes may properly be assumed by the State, until Congress acts in reference to their foreign or interstate relations. When Congress does act, the state laws are superseded only to the extent that they affect commerce outside the State as it comes within the State." He then added: "But we think it may safely be said that state legislation which seeks to impose a direct burden upon interstate commerce, or to interfere directly with its freedom, does encroach upon the exclusive power of Congress. The statute now under consideration, in our opinion, occupies that position. It does not act upon the business through the local instruments to be employed after coming within the State, but directly upon the business as it comes into the State from without, or goes out from within." The distinction here taken seems to us sound and to distinguish the present case from that of De Cuir. In the Peik Case, and others of like character, the State regulated the charges made upon an instrument of commerce (a railroad) situated within the State and under its jurisdiction; such charges being made by virtue of the State's authority; in the De Cuir Case it attempted, as the law operated, to regulate the manner of carrying passengers on an instrument of commerce having no fixed location, by plying on navigable waters within and without the State; in other words, it attempted to regulate interstate commerce itself, directly, in a matter in which it had no special prerogative to legislate.

Other cases are referred to by the plaintiff in error in support of their contention; but we think that no case can be found which is not clearly distinguishable from the present on some or one of the grounds already referred to.

The inconveniences which it has been supposed in argument would follow from the execution of the laws of Illinois we think have been greatly exaggerated. But if it should be found to present any real difficulty in the modes of transacting business on through lines, it is always in the power of Congress to make such [596] reasonable regulations as the interests of interstate commerce may demand, without denuding the States of their just powers over their own roads and their own corporations.

VICKSBURG AND MERIDIAN RAILROAD COMPANY, Plff. in Err., [545]
v.
ISRAEL PUTNAM.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 545-557.)

Action against railroad corporation for personal injuries—evidence—instructions to jury—measure of damages—use of life and annuity tables.

1. In an action against a railroad Corporation for personal injuries, there being evidence tending to show that the accident was caused by a worn out rail, it was within the discretion of the court to admit evidence to show the general condition of that portion of the road which included the place where the accident occurred.

2. Reports made by the superintendent of the road to the board of directors, in the course of his official duty, were competent evidence against the Corporation to show the condition of the road.

3. In an action for personal injuries, the plaintiff is entitled to recover compensation for the loss caused to him by the defendant's wrongful act, including expenses incurred for medical attendance, a reasonable sum for his pain and suffering, and a fair recompense for the loss of what he would otherwise have earned.

4. Standard life and annuity tables are admissible for the purpose of assisting the jury in making an estimate, but the jury are not to be absolutely controlled by them.

5. The instructions of the court below as to the measure of damages, examined and held to be incorrect; (1) because their effect was to permit the jury to take into consideration twice over one element of damage and (2) because they gave the jury to understand that the tables introduced furnished absolute rules to be applied by them in estimating the probable duration of life of the plaintiff and the extent of the injuries which he had suffered.

Argued Apr. 22, 1886. Decided Oct. 25, 1886.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Georgia. Reversed.

The case is stated by the court.

Messrs. Geo. Hoadly, Edgar M. Johnson and Edward Colston, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. Hoke Smith, for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Gray delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action against a Railroad Corporation for personal injuries received on September 16, 1881, by a passenger, then forty-nine years of age. The verdict was for the plaintiff in the sum of $16,000, and the defendant tendered a bill of exceptions and sued out this writ of error.

Some of the exceptions relate to rulings and instructions on the question of the defendant's liability, and others to the measure of damages. Those relating to the defendant's liability present no serious difficulty.

There being evidence tending to show that the accident was caused by a worn out rail, it was, to say the least, within the discretion of the court to admit evidence that the general condition of that portion of the road which included the place where the accident occurred had long been bad, and that the rails had been in use for a great many years. Such evidence had some tendency to prove both that a worn out rail was the cause of the accident, and that the defendant had neglected to repair the defect. The reports made by the superintendent to the board of directors, in the course of his official duty, were competent evidence, as against the Corporation, of the condition of the road.

[553] In the courts of the United States, as in those of England, from which our practice was derived, the judge, in submitting a case to the jury, may at his discretion, whenever he thinks it necessary to assist them in arriving at a just conclusion, comment upon the evidence, call their attention to parts of it which he thinks important, and express his opinion upon the facts; and the expression of such an opinion, when no rule of law is incorrectly stated, and all matters of fact are ultimately submitted to the determination of the jury, cannot be reviewed on writ of error. Carver v. Jackson, 4 Pet. 1, 80 [29 U. S. bk. 7, L. ed. 761, 789]; Magniac v. Thompson, 7 Pet. 348, 390 [32 U. S. bk. 8, L. ed. 709, 723]; Mitchell v. Harmony, 13 How. 115, 131 [54 U. S. bk. 14, L. ed. 75, 82]; Transportation Line v. Hope, 95 U. S. 297, 302 [Bk. 24, L. ed. 477, 479]; Taylor, Ev. 8th ed. § 25. The powers of the courts of the United States in this respect are not controlled by the statutes of the State forbidding judges to express any opinion upon the facts. Nudd v. Burrows, 91 U. S. 426 [Bk. 23, L. ed. 286]; Code of Georgia, § 3248. The exceptions to so much of the judge's charge as bore upon the liability of the defendant cannot therefore be sustained. [5

We are then brought to a consideration of the exceptions which relate to the evidence admitted and the instructions given upon the measure of damages.

In an action for a personal injury, the plaintiff is entitled to recover compensation, so far as it is susceptible of an estimate in money, for the loss and damage caused to him by the defendant's negligence, including not only expenses incurred for medical attendance, and a reasonable sum for his pain and suffering, but also a fair recompense for the loss of what he would otherwise have earned in his trade or profession, and has been deprived of the capacity of earning, by the wrongful act of the defendant. Wade v. Leroy, 20 How. 34 [61 U. S. bk. 15, L. ed. 813]; Nebraska City v. Campbell, 2 Black, 590 [67 U. S. bk. 17, L. ed. 271]; Ballou v. Farnum, 11 Allen, 73; New Jersey Exp. Co v. Nichols, 3 Vroom, 166, and 4 Vroom, 434; Phillips v. London & Southwestern R. 4 Q. B. D. 406, 5 Q. B. D. 78, and 5 C. P. D. 280; S. C. 49 L. J. Q. B. 233.

In order to assist the jury in making such an estimate, standard life and annuity tables, showing at any age the probable duration of life, and the present value of a life annuity, are competent evidence. The D. S. Gregory, 2 Ben. 226, 239, affirmed in 9 Wall. 513 [76 U. S. bk. 19, L. ed. 787]; Rowley v. London & N. W. R. Co. L. R. 8 Exch. 221; Sauter v. N. Y. Cent. R. R. 66 N. Y. 50; McDonald v. Chic. & N. R. R. 26 Iowa, 124, 140; Cent. R. R. v. Richards, 62 Ga. 306.

But it has never been held that the rules to be derived from such tables or computations must be the absolute guides of the judgment and the conscience of the jury. On the contrary, in the important and much considered case of Phillips v. London & Southwestern Railway, above cited, the judges strongly approved the usual practice of instructing the jury in general terms to award a fair and reasonable compensation, taking into consideration what the plaintiff's income would probably have been, how long it would have lasted, and all the contingencies to which it was liable, and as strongly deprecated undertaking to bind them by precise mathematical rules in deciding a question involving so many contingencies incapable of exact estimate or proof. See especially the opinions of Lord Justice Brett and Lord [5
Justice Cotton as reported in 49 L. J. Q. B. 237, 238, and less fully in 5 C. P. D. 291, 293.

In the present case, it was not suggested by the defendant at the trial that the life tables admitted in evidence were not standard tables, or not duly authenticated. The only ground assigned for the objection to their competency was that "The plaintiff had not shown a case in which such evidence is admissible, the plaintiff not having been killed permanently or disabled"—probably meaning "killed or permanently disabled." It is a sufficient answer to this objection that there was evidence from which the jury might conclude that the plaintiff's disability was permanent.

But the instructions on the measure of damages, to which exception was taken, cannot be approved.

Those instructions were: (1) that the plaintiff having lost his time, the presumption would be that he lost his salary, and that would be an element of damage which the jury could ascertain with certainty; and (2) that "The Company was bound to give the plaintiff an annuity, of the amount he had been damaged, by the year, for a period equal to the expectation of his life."

As the judge directed the jury to add the worth of such an annuity at the time of the accident to the amount allowed for loss of time, including the loss of salary, it would seem that the jury were permitted, in making up their verdict, to take into consideration twice over the earnings lost by the plaintiff between the time of the accident and the time of the trial.

But the second instruction is open to the more serious objection of requiring the jury, in estimating the loss of future income, to compute the average amount of injury to the plaintiff's capacity each year, even if they should be satisfied, on the evidence before them, that the effect of that injury would vary from year to year, and would be either greater or less as time went on.

[556] A reference to the rest of the charge rather strengthens than removes this objection. At the beginning of that part of the charge which relates to this subject, the judge told the jury: "To find out what he was capable of making, you must find out what he did make, and then how much his capacity to do his former duties was injured; and having ascertained that, find out how old he is; then find out how much he is damaged every year, and then find out from the table which you will have out before you how much one dollar of annuity to the end of his expectation is worth, and multiply the three together." In the last paragraph of the charge, just before the sentence excepted to, the judge told the jury that in arriving at the amount of liability they must "find out what he has been injured, by the year." And finally, after causing the annuity table to be marked opposite forty-nine years of age, he directed the jury "to find a verdict, first, for the pecuniary damage; next, the pain, if he has suffered any; next, the loss per year; multiply by the amount you find in that table, and add the three together."

The natural, if not the necessary, effect of these peremptory instructions, at the beginning and end of dealing with this matter, would be to lead the jury to understand that they must accept the tables as affording the rule for the principal elements of their computation; and to create an impression on their minds, which would not be removed by the incidental observation of the judge, when speaking of the possibility of the plaintiff's getting well, "This is only one mode of arriving at it;" especially, as it was nowhere, throughout the charge, suggested to the jury that they would be at liberty, if they found difficulty in following the mathematical rules prescribed to them, to estimate the loss of income according to their own judgment.

Life and annuity tables are framed upon the basis of the average duration of the lives of a great number of persons. But what the jury in this case had to consider was the probable duration of this plaintiff's life, and of the injury to his capacity to earn his livelihood. Upon the evidence before them, it was a controverted question whether that injury would be temporary or permanent. The instruction excepted to, either taken by itself or in connection with the whole charge, tended to mislead the jury, [557] by obliging them to ascertain the average injury to the plaintiff's capacity, by the year; whether the extent of that injury would be constant or varying; and by giving them to understand that the tables were not merely competent evidence of the average duration of human life, and of the present value of life annuities, but furnished absolute rules which the law required them to apply in estimating the probable duration of the plaintiff's life, and the extent of the injury which he had suffered. For this reason the judgment is reversed, and the case remanded to the Circuit Court, with directions to set aside the verdict and to order a new trial.

Jurisdiction—amount in dispute, fixed by judgment—waiver of excess.

1. Upon error, in the absence of a partial defense, or a counterclaim, or a set-off, the value of the matter in dispute is fixed by the amount of the judgment.

Submitted Oct. 12, 1886. Decided Nov. 1, 1886.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York.

On motion to dismiss. Denied.

Messrs. William H. Arnoux and William F. MacRae, for defendant in error, in support of motion:

The matter in dispute is the amount of the verdict, and not the interest.

Knapp v. Banks, 2 How. 73 (43 U. S. bk. 11, L. ed. 184); Walker v. U. S. 4 Wall. 163 (71 U. S. bk. 18, L. ed. 319); Josues v. Conner, 75 N. Y. 156.

The defendant in error having waived the interest, it is not in dispute.

First Nat. Bank v. Redick, 110 U. S. 224 (Bk. 28, L. ed. 124); Brown v. Sigourney, 72 N. Y. 122.

Messrs. Henry H. Anderson, Julien T. Davies and Howard Townsend, for plaintiff in error, contra.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a motion to dismiss on the ground that the matter in dispute does not exceed the sum or value of $5,000. The suit was brought by the Fifth National Bank of the City of New York against the New York Elevated Railroad Company to recover damages for injuries to real estate. A trial was had which resulted in a verdict against the Railroad Company, on the 9th of June, 1886, for $5,000. At the time of the rendition of the verdict the Railroad Company moved for a new trial. This motion was denied on the 10th of August, and, on the 26th of the same month, a judgment was entered for $5,068.33, that being the amount of the verdict, with interest added to the date of the judgment. The claim now made is that the value of the matter in dispute is to be determined by the verdict without the interest.

The rule is settled that when a writ of error is sued out from this court by the defendant below, and no question is presented growing out of a partial defense to the action, or a counterclaim or a set-off, the value of the matter in dispute is fixed by the amount of the judgment. Gordon v. Ogden, 3 Pet. 33 [28 U. S. bk. 7, L. ed. 592]; Hilton v. Dickinson, 108 U. S. 165 [Bk. 27, L. ed. 688]; Henderson v. Wadsworth, 115 U. S. 276 [Bk. 29, L. ed. 377]. Our jurisdiction cannot be invoked until after a final judgment; and until such a judgment has been rendered the cause remains in the full judicial control of the court in which it is pending. It was because of this that we declined to take jurisdiction in Thompson v. Butler, 95 U. S. 694 [Bk. 24, L. ed. 540], where the verdict was for more than $5,000, but reduced to that amount, by leave of the court, before the judgment, which was for the reduced sum. It is true that our jurisdiction depends on the amount of the judgment, exclusive of interest thereon; Knapp v. Banks, 2 How. 73 [43 U. S. bk. 11, L. ed. 184]; W. U. Tel. Co. v. Rogers, 93 U. S. 566 [Bk. 23, L. ed. 978]; but here the interest accrued before judgment and not after. In The Patapsco, 12 Wall. 451 [79 U. S. bk. 20, L. ed. 457], jurisdiction was taken in a case where the decree was for $1,932, "and interest from the date of the report," which made more than $2,000 due at the time of the decree, that being then the jurisdictional limit.

As the jurisdiction has once attached it cannot be defeated by a waiver or release of the amount in excess of $5,000.

The motion to dismiss is denied.

Mr. Justice Field took no part in this decision.

[634] JOHN P. DELANO, Plff. in Err.

v.

PETER BUTLER, Receiver of the PACIFIC NATIONAL BANK OF BOSTON.

SAME, Appt., v. SAME.

National banks—increase of stock—sections 5151 and 5205 R. S.—liability of stockholders—payments to avoid liquidation, not applicable to the satisfaction of individual liability of stockholders under section 5151 R. S.—equity.

1. On September 13, 1881, the directors of the Pacific National Bank of Boston voted to increase its capital stock from $500,000 to $1,000,000. On November 18, 1881, the bank suspended payment, and the Comptroller of the Currency placed an examiner in charge of its assets, who remained in possession until March 18, 1882. On December 13, 1881, the directors voted to fix the stock at $961,300, as $38,700 of the increase had not been taken, and notified the Comptroller of an increase of $461,300. On December 16, 1881, the Comptroller issued a certificate of such increase, and notified the bank (under section 5205 R. S.) to pay the deficiency in its capital stock, which had been lost, by an assessment of 100 per cent upon its stockholders. On January 10, 1882, at a meeting of the stockholders such assessment was voted. Prior to May 20, 1882, the amount of $742,800 was paid in under this assessment. On March 18, 1882, the bank reopened and continued in business until May 20, 1882, when it finally suspended; it having largely reduced its liabilities within this period.

2. Upon error to a judgment in an action at law brought by the receiver to enforce the liability of the plaintiff in error under section 5151 R. S. for $6,000, the amount of his stock, $3,000 of which was a part of the bank's increase, and upon appeal from a decree dismissing a bill to enjoin said action at law, it is held:

a. That the increase in the capital stock of the bank was valid, although part of the proposed increase was not taken.

b. That, if the payment for his shares and the acceptance of his certificate by the plaintiff in error, prior to the final action of the association and the issue of the certificate by the Comptroller, did not amount to a waiver of his right to object to the reduction of the amount of the increase, his subsequent payment of the assessment of January 10, 1882, on his entire stock amounted to a ratification of such reduction, although he was not present at the meeting at which the assessment was made.

c. That payments made under section 5205, R. S., to avoid liquidation, cannot be applied to satisfy the individual responsibility of stockholders secured by section 5151, R. S.

d. That, even if the appellant paid the assessment of January 10, 1882, under the mistaken supposition that it would extinguish his liability under section 5151, R. S. in the event of future failure, and the money so paid was applied to the payment of the indebtedness of the bank, there being nothing to show that it was done ratably, he is not entitled to equitable relief.

Argued Oct. 12, 13, 1886. Decided Nov. 1, 1886.

IN ERROR to, and appeal from, the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts. Affirmed.

Statement of the case by Mr. Justice Matthews:

The first of these cases was an action at law [635] brought in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts, by Linus M. Price, as Receiver of the Pacific National Bank of Boston, for whom Peter Butler has been substituted, against John P. Delano, a citizen of Bath, Maine, to enforce the personal liability of the defendant, under section 5151 of the Revised Statutes, upon an assessment of 100 per centum of the par value of [636] sixty shares of the capital stock of the Pacific National Bank alleged to be held and owned by said Delano at the time of the insolvency and suspension of said bank.

The Pacific National Bank was duly organized and authorized to do business as a national bank under the provisions embraced in Title 62 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and located in Boston, in October, 1877. Its capital stock was fixed at $500,000, paid in cash, with a right to increase it to $1,000,000. It continued business on this basis until September 18, 1881, when, as appears by the records of a meeting of the directors held in Boston, it was—

"Voted, That the capital of this bank be increased to one million dollars, and that stockholders of this date have the right to take the new stock at par in equal amounts to that now held by them."

On the same date, a copy of the following notice was sent by the cashier to each stockholder of the bank:

"A. I. BENYON, President.
J. M. PETTINGILL, Cashier.
PACIFIC NATIONAL BANK, 105 DEVONSHIRE STREET, BOSTON, Sept. 18, 1881.

"At a meeting of the directors of this bank, held this day, it was—

"'Voted, That the capital of this bank be increased to one million dollars, and that stockholders of this date have the right to take the new stock at par in equal amounts to that now held by them.'

"Subscription to the new stock will be payable October 1st. Parties desiring to anticipate payment will be allowed interest to that date at 4 per cent per annum.

J. M. PETTINGILL, Cashier."

The whole amount of the increase of capital voted was not taken and paid in, nor was notice ever transmitted to the Comptroller of the Currency that all of such increase had been paid in; nor was that official's certificate of the increase to $1,000,000, with his approval thereof, ever issued. But $461,300 of the proposed increase of $500,000 was actually subscribed for and paid in as capital stock prior to November 18, 1881, and was used in the general business of the bank. [637]

On November 18, 1881, the bank became insolvent, supended payment, and closed its doors. On the same day, Daniel Needham, an examiner of national banks, was placed by the Comptroller of the Currency in charge of the assets of the bank, for the purpose of ascertaining its condition, where he remained until March 18, 1882.

The directors of the bank met on December 13, 1881, during the period of suspension, and passed a vote that, as $38,700 of the increase of capital voted on September 13, 1881, had not been taken and paid in, that amount be canceled and deducted from the capital stock of $1,000,000 and the paid up capital stock fixed at $961,300; and that the Comptroller of the Currency be notified of the increase of $461,300, which had been paid in, and requested to issue a certificate of such increase according to law.

Thereupon the Comptroller of the Currency, under date of December 16, 1881, made and issued the following certificate:

"TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
"OFFICE OF COMPTROLLER OF THE CURRENCY,
WASHINGTON, Dec. 16, 1881.

"Whereas, satisfactory notice has been transmitted to the Comptroller of the Currency that the capital stock of 'The Pacific National Bank of Boston, Mass.,' has been increased in the sum of four hundred and sixty-one thousand three hundred dollars, in accordance with the provisions of its articles of association, and that the whole amount of such increase has been paid in:

"Now, it is hereby certified that the capital stock of 'The Pacific National Bank of Boston, Mass.,' aforesaid, has been increased as aforesaid, in the sum of four hundred and sixty-one thousand three hundred dollars; that said increase of capital has been paid into said bank as a part of the capital stock thereof, and that the said increase of capital is approved by the Comptroller of the Currency. [638]

"In witness whereof I hereunto affix my official signature.

"[Seal.] JOHN J. KNOX, Comptroller."

No vote of the stockholders was taken relating to the increase or decrease of the capital stock of the bank.

Under date of December 16, 1881, the Comptroller of the Currency addressed the following letter to the bank:

"WASHINGTON, December 16, 1881.

"The Pacific National Bank of Boston, Massachusetts:

"The entire capital stock of the Pacific National Bank of Boston, Massachusetts, amounting to nine hundred and sixty-one thousand three hundred (961,300) dollars, having been lost, notice is hereby given to said bank, under the provisions of section 5205 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, to pay the deficiency in its capital stock by an assessment of one hundred (100) per cent upon its shareholders pro rata for the amount of capital stock held by each, and that if such deficiency shall not be paid, and said bank shall refuse to go into liquidation, as provided by law, for three months after this notice shall have been received by it, a receiver may be appointed to close up the business of the association, according to the provisions of section 5234 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

"In testimony whereof I have hereto subscribed my name and caused my seal of office to be affixed to these presents, at the Treasury Department, in the City of Washington and District of Columbia, this sixteenth day of December, A. D. 1881.

"[Seal.] "JOHN JAY KNOX,
"Comptroller of the Currency."

On January 10, 1882, during the suspension of the bank, the stockholders held their annual meeting (it being the first held since January 11, 1881) pursuant to the following notice duly published in the Boston Daily Advertiser:

"Pacific National Bank. [639]

"The annual meeting of the stockholders of this bank, for choice of directors and for any other business that may legally come before them, will be held at their banking rooms, 105 Devonshire Street, on Tuesday, Jan. 10, 1882, at 11 o'clock A. M.

"J. M. PETTINGILL, Cashier."

At this meeting, after discussing the general condition of the affairs of the bank, the foregoing call of the Comptroller of the Currency for an assessment of 100 per centum on the capital stock of the bank was read. Thereupon the following was offered:

"Voted, In accordance with the notice of the Comptroller of the Currency, dated December 16, 1881, there be, and hereby is, laid an assessment of one hundred per cent upon the shareholders of the Pacific National Bank, of Boston, Mass., pro rata for the amount of capital stock of said bank held by each shareholder.

"Voted, That the board of directors notify each shareholder of said assessment and collect the same forthwith."

On the question of the adoption of the above, a stock vote was ordered; the total number of votes cast was 5,549, representing 5,549 shares, of which 5,494 were in the affirmative, and 55 in the negative.

The amount paid in by the stockholders on this assessment was $742,800, prior to May 20, 1882.

The following notice to depositors was issued by the bank on March 16, 1882:

"THE PACIFIC NATIONAL BANK,
BOSTON, March 16, 1882.

"To our Depositors:

"By vote of the directors and the approval of the Comptroller of the Currency the bank will reopen for business on Saturday, the 18th. Every effort has been made to put the bank again into a sound and solvent condition; and the stockholders have been called upon to pay an assessment of 100 per cent on their stock, thus making the depositors' balances secure and available. The bank will be run on strict business principles and in the interest of its customers and stockholders; and, while thanking you for past favors, we solicit your confidence and support for the future.

"LEWIS COLEMAN, President.
"E. C. WHITNEY, Cashier."

Pursuant thereto, the directors resumed active control of the bank and its assets on March 18, 1882, and again conducted a general banking business until May 20, 1882, when the bank ceased business, and the directors voted to go into liquidation. Thereupon Linus M. Price was appointed receiver by the Comptroller of the Currency under section 5234 of the Revised Statutes, and took charge of the assets and records of the bank.

During the period between March 18, 1882, and May 20, 1882, while the bank was carrying on business in its own name, the amount due depositors was reduced from $4,101,865.91 on the former date, to $2,052,957.82 on the latter, $62,693.40 being due to new depositors. The amount of deposits made between the dates named was $2,338,617.21. New liabilities were contracted subsequent to March 18, 1882, amounting to $200,000, including the $62,693.40 due to new depositors.

The plaintiff in error owned thirty shares of stock in said bank prior to the vote of September 18, 1881, to increase the stock to $1,000,000. After that vote he received from the cashier of the bank a printed copy of the notice dated September 13, 1881, at the bottom of which he wrote a subscription for thirty shares of the increase of stock, and returned it to the bank. Three days after the passage of the vote he paid $3,000 for the thirty shares so subscribed, and received a receipt for $3,000 "on account of subscription to new stock," signed by the cashier of the bank. In October he returned the receipt to the bank, and received for it certificate No. 780 for thirty shares of the new stock, dated October 1, 1881.

Plaintiff in error supposed at that time that the whole $500,000 increase of capital had been taken and paid in, and believed that the increase to $1,000,000 had been regularly and legally made. He did not attend the stockholders' meeting of January 10, 1882, and received no other notice thereof than seeing the call published in the Boston Advertiser. On January 12 or 13 he received notice of the assessment of 100 per centum upon the stock of the bank, and, after consultation, was assured by another shareholder and a director of the bank, that if this was paid there could be no further assessment made on his stock; in consequence of which assurances he paid the assessment of $3,000 on January 20 and 23, which were indorsed on the certificates under the dates of payment, being one hundred per centum on thirty shares of the stock.

Upon the trial the intervention of a jury was waived by consent of parties, and the cause, submitted to the court, which found the foregoing facts, and rendered judgment September 8, 1885, in favor of the receiver for the amount claimed.

On June 8, 1885, the appellant, Delano, filed a bill in equity in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts, against Linus M. Price, Receiver of the Pacific National Bank, the object and prayer of which were to enjoin the further prosecution of the pending action at law, brought by the said receiver against him for the purpose of enforcing the alleged liability of the appellant on account of the assessment upon his said stock, on the ground that upon the facts, as heretofore stated, the voluntary payment made by the appellant of the one hundred per centum assessed to restore the lost capital of $961,300, and which had been applied to the payment of the creditors of the bank, constituted in equity, if not at law, a complete defense to the claim of the Receiver as an extinguishment of his liability upon the assessment sued on.

This cause was heard upon the facts as heretofore stated and a decree rendered dismissing the bill for want of equity, from which the present appeal was taken and is prosecuted.

Messrs. Benjamin N. Johnson, George F. Hoar and A. P. Gould, for plaintiff in error and appellant:

A reasonable construction of the statute only requires a stockholder of an insolvent bank to contribute a sum equal to the par value of his stock toward a fund for the payment of its debts.

Terry v. Little, 101 U. S. 216 (Bk. 25, L. ed. 864).

The payment by the stockholders of such a sum, which was devoted to the payment of the debts of the bank, constituted an equitable performance of their statutory obligation, or an equitable satisfaction of their statutory liability.

2 Pom. Eq. sec. 579. See also Smith, Prin. Eq. 461; Lechmere v. Carlisle, 3 P. Wms. 227; Sowden v. Sowden, 1 Brown, Ch. 582; approved in Lenach v. Lenach, 10 Ves. 516.

The doctrine of equitable performance applies to an obligation imposed by Act of Parliament.

Tubbs v. Broadwood, 2 R. & Myl. 487.

Closely allied to the doctrine of equitable performance is the doctrine of equitable satisfaction, where intention either express or implied is required.

2 Story, Eq. secs. 1099, 1104; 1 Pom. Eq. sec. 521.

In this case the creditors have received and retain the benefit of the voluntary payment.

The stockholders having paid their hundred per cent may also invoke the doctrine of equitable set-off.

Raleigh v. Raleigh, 35 Ill. 512; Briggs v. Penniman, 8 Cow. 390; Tallmadge v. Fishkill Iron Co. 4 Barb. 382; Jones v. Wiltberger, 42 Ga. 578.

The pivotal inquiry in this case is, whether the payment was made with the intention, express or implied, of satisfying the obligation of the plaintiff in error, or in such a manner as to constitute performance of it.

The statute was intended to impose upon the the shareholder but one liability at any time during the life of the stock.

The money paid was in fact paid for the benefit of creditors and appropriated to the debts of the bank; not to the repair of the stock. The creditors have the full benefit of it, and the stockholders have no consideration for its payment, unless it goes to the liquidation of their statute liability.

Equity relieves against mistakes, and refuses to allow parties to have the benefit of money paid through a misapprehension of the facts.

1 Story, Eq. 140; 2 Pom. Eq. sec. 852.

Under many circumstances relief will be granted where payments have been made under mistake as to the parties' existing legal rights or liabilities.

2 Pom. Eq. sec. 849.

The principal mistake was of fact, concerning the value of the assets, and a court of equity will give relief.

Id.; Bank of Hindustan v. Allison, L. R. 6 C. P. 54.

The Comptroller was in possession of the bank and was bound to know its condition. The stockholders had a right to rely upon him. It is sufficient that he deceived them—whether intentionally or otherwise is immaterial; and he should not be allowed to proceed with another assessment.

U. S. v. Knox, 102 U. S. 422, 425 (Bk. 26, L. ed. 216, 217).

The stockholders were only required to contribute to a fund for the payment of the debts—not to pay them. Under the authority of the Comptroller the officers of the bank received the fund from the examiner, and devoted the whole of it to the payment of debts. The plaintiff in error was not responsible for its proper distribution.

Patterson v. Lynde, 106 U. S. 519 (Bk. 27, L. ed. 265); Smith v. Hurd, 12 Met. 371; Thompson, Liability of Officers and Agents of Corporations, pp. 352, 461.

Equity will not permit double benefits where but one benefit is intended, or impose double burdens where but one obligation is due. The money due from this debtor has reached these creditors, and the substance of his obligation has been fully performed.

Terry v. Little and U. S. v. Knox, supra; Marine Bank v. Fulton Bank, 2 Wall. 256 (69 U. S. bk. 17, L. ed. 787); Scammon v. Kimball, 92 U. S. 370 (Bk. 23, L. ed. 486); Nat. Bank v. Ins. Co. 104 U. S. 54 (Bk. 26, L. ed. 693); Patterson v. Lynde and Smith v. Hurd, supra; 2 Pom. Eq. sec. 579; Smith, Prin. Eq. 461.

Mr. A. A. Ranney, for defendant in error and appellee.

Mr. Justice Matthews delivered the opinion of the court: [646]

Section 5151 of the Revised Statutes provides that "The shareholders of every national banking association shall be held individually responsible, equally and ratably, and not one for another, for all contracts, debts and engagements of such association, to the extent of the amount of their stock therein, at the par value thereof, in addition to the amount invested in such shares."

The object of the action at law brought by the Receiver of the Pacific National Bank of Boston, in which judgment was rendered against the defendant, the plaintiff in error, was to enforce his liability under that section of the statute. The object of the suit in equity, in which Delano was the complainant, was to restrain the prosecution of the action at law, on the ground that if his legal defenses failed, he had in equity performed and extinguished his obligation.

The questions arising upon the records of these cases in various forms, upon the facts already stated, may be reduced to three, which will be considered and disposed of in their order.

The plaintiff in error in the action at law contends, as grounds for reversing the judgment against him: [647]

1. That he was not, at the time of the appointment of the Receiver, or at any time, the holder of sixty shares of the stock of the Pacific National Bank, but was, in fact and in law, a holder of only thirty shares thereof. He contends that the attempt on the part of the directors and the Comptroller of the Currency, in December, 1881, to fix the capital stock of the bank at $961,300, was contrary to law and void; that the alleged thirty shares of new stock on account of which he is sued never had any legal existence, and that he, by virtue of his subscription in September, 1881, for thirty shares in the then proposed increase of capital from $500,000 to $1,000,000, and by his other acts, never became liable on account of the debts of the Pacific National Bank beyond his liability as the holder of thirty shares of valid stock.

2. That by his contribution in January, 1882, of an amount equal to the par value of all the stock ever held by him towards the fund, which was all used in the payment of the debts of the bank, the bank then being insolvent, he, in law, discharged his liability as a stockholder in said bank, and should therefore have judgment in his favor.

3. As appellant in the suit in equity, Delano alleges, as ground for reversing the decree dismissing his bill, that the contribution made by him on January 23, 1882, of an amount equal to the par value of the stock held by him, towards a fund which was actually used in the payment of the debts of the bank, the bank then being insolvent, constituted in equity a satisfaction and extinguishment of his liability as a stockholder for the debts of the bank, if not at law.

It is further contended by him, as an additional ground for equitable relief, that by the payment of the $3,000 upon the thirty shares of alleged new stock, which he claimed never had any legal existence, and on which therefore he never incurred any liability, he really contributed towards a fund actually used for the payment of the debts of the bank an amount equal to 200 per centum of the stock held by him; which payment, if not available in his favor as a satisfaction of his statutory liability [648] technically at law, nevertheless, must be regarded in equity as a substantial equivalent, exonerating him from further liability.

The first question to be considered is whether there was a valid increase of the capital stock of the Pacific National Bank, of which the plaintiff in error became the owner of thirty shares, so as to be charged with liability thereon as a stockholder. The articles of association of the bank provide that "The capital may be increased according to the provisions of section 5142 of the Revised Statutes, to any sum not exceeding ten hundred thousand dollars."

The 11th section of the by-laws of the bank provides as follows:

"Whenever an increase of stock shall be determined upon, it shall be the duty of the board to notify all the stockholders of the same, and cause a subscription to be opened for such increase; and each stockholder shall have the privilege of subscribing for such number of shares of new stock as he may be entitled to subscribe for, in proportion to his existing stock in the bank. If any stockholder should fail to subscribe for the amount of stock to which he may be entitled, within a reasonable time, which shall be stated in the notice, the directors may determine what disposition shall be made of the privilege of subscribing for the new stock."

Section 5142 of the Revised Statutes is as follows: "Any association formed under this title may, by its articles of association, provide for an increase of its capital, from time to time, as may be deemed expedient, subject to the limitations of this title. But the maximum of such increase to be provided in the articles of association shall be determined by the Comptroller of the Currency; and no increase of capital shall be valid until the whole amount of such increase is paid in, and notice thereof has been transmitted to the Comptroller of the Currency, and his certificate obtained, specifying the amount of such increase of capital stock, with his approval thereof, and that it has been duly paid in as part of the capital of such association."

[649] It is urged on behalf of the plaintiff in error that no increase of the capital stock of the bank was ever proposed by the directors or assented to by the subscribers, except an increase of the full sum of $500,000; that no such increase as that was ever fully paid in, as required by the statute, and that no such increase was approved by the certificate of the Comptroller of the Currency; that his agreement of subscription was to take thirty shares of the new stock out of the whole sum of $500,000; that that agreement has never been carried into effect, and that he has never consented to any modification of it, and that, consequently, whatever effect would be attributable to the acts of the directors or stockholders of the bank, in conjunction with the Comptroller of the Currency, they are res inter alios acta, and not binding on him.

On looking at the terms of section 5142 of the Revised Statutes, it appears that three things must concur to constitute a valid increase of the capital stock of a national banking association: (1) that the association, in the mode pointed out in its articles, and not in excess of the maximum provided for by them, shall assent to an increased amount; (2) that the whole amount of the proposed increase shall be paid in as part of the capital of such association; and (3) that the Comptroller of the Currency, by his certificate specifying the amount of such increase of capital stock, shall approve thereof, and certify to the fact of its payment.

In the present case, the association did in fact finally assent to an increase of the capital stock, limited to $461,300; that amount was paid in as capital, and the Comptroller of the Currency by his certificate approved of the increase and certified to its payment; so that there seems little room to question the validity of the proceedings resulting in such increase. All the requisitions of the statute were complied with. The circumstance that the original proposal was for an increase of $500,000, subsequently reduced to the amount actually paid in, does not seem to affect the question; for the amount of the increase within the maximum was always subject to the discretionary power of the association itself, exerted in accordance with its articles of association, and to the approval and confirmation of the Comptroller of the Currency.

The question, therefore, seems to be converted into this: whether the subscription of the plaintiff in error to a proposed increase of $500,000, and his payment thereof, can be held to be a binding agreement to accept thirty shares out of the reduced amount.

It will be observed that, without waiting to see what the future action of the association and the Comptroller of the Currency might be on the question of the ultimate amount of the increased stock, the plaintiff in error paid for his shares and accepted his certificate. This he did, in legal contemplation, with knowledge of the law, which authorized the association and the Comptroller of the Currency to reduce the amount of the proposed increase to a less sum than that fixed in the original proposal of the directors; and such payment and acceptance of certificates in accordance therewith might amount, under such circumstances, on his part, to a waiver of the right to insist that he should not be bound unless the whole amount of the proposed increase should be subscribed for and paid in. But without insisting upon that point, or deciding it, we think that the subsequent conduct of the plaintiff in error amounts to a ratification on his part of the action of the association, and of the Comptroller of the Currency, in fixing the amount of the increased stock at the less sum.

After he paid his subscription and received his certificates of stock, he was called upon, as a stockholder, alleged to be the owner of sixty shares of the capital, to pay an assessment voluntarily imposed upon themselves by the stockholders at a regular meeting, at which the transaction of such business was not only legitimate, but necessary as a condition on compliance with which, alone, the association was to be permitted to resume and continue its business as a bank. The bank was in a condition of open and notorious insolvency. It was in the actual control of an examiner appointed by the Comptroller of the Currency, so far as lawful, for the express purpose of ascertaining its true condition, in order to determine the question whether it might be permitted, on any conditions, to resume business, or whether it should be required to go into liquidation by the appointment of a receiver to wind up its affairs. These facts were [651] certainly known to the plaintiff in error, or, at any rate, were so notorious that he cannot be permitted to allege ignorance of them. A regular meeting of the stockholders was called by public notice, given in the usual form, for the election of directors and the transaction of any other business that might be brought before them. At this meeting official communication was made that, according to the determination of the association and of the Comptroller of the Currency, the increased and paid up capital stock of the bank had been fixed at $961,300, and that the whole amount of it had been lost; that it was necessary to replace it by an assessment of one hundred per centum on the par value of all the shares in order to enable it to resume and carry on its business, and that otherwise it would be placed in the hands of a receiver and required to go into liquidation.

Section 5205 of the Revised Statutes provides that "Every association which shall have failed to pay up its capital stock, as required by law, and every association whose capital stock shall have become impaired by losses or otherwise, shall, within three months after receiving notice thereof from the Comptroller of the Currency, pay the deficiency in the capital stock by assessment upon the shareholders pro rata for the amount of capital stock held by each. * * * If any such association shall fail to pay up its capital stock, and shall refuse to go into liquidation, as provided by law, for three months after receiving notice from the Comptroller, a receiver may be appointed to close up the business of the association, according to the provisions of section 5234."

It was in pursuance of these provisions of the law that notice was given by the Comptroller of the Currency to the stockholders of the bank, at this, their regular annual meeting, that they must either assess themselves and pay in the whole amount of 100 per centum upon their capital stock, fixed at the sum of $961,300, or, in the alternative, go into liquidation. In pursuance of this notice, in full view of the facts, and with a presumed knowledge of the law, the stockholders, by a vote that was almost unanimous, assented to the first branch of the alternative, and, as a condition for being permitted to re- [652] sume business, voluntarily voted the required assessment. The plaintiff in error, it is true, was not present at this meeting, but he had notice of its proceedings, and in pursuance of its vote paid the full amount of the assessment imposed upon him as the holder of sixty shares of the capital stock of the company.

In our opinion, it is not open to him now to say that he made this payment in ignorance of the facts, or in ignorance of the legal right which he now seeks to assert to avoid the obligation. His payment was voluntary; it was made either with actual knowledge of the facts, or with such opportunity and means of knowledge as, by the exercise of common diligence, would have made him acquainted with the facts, and the payment made by him in conjunction with his co-stockholders was made upon a distinct consideration, whereby the bank in which he was interested was enabled to undertake anew its regular and active business. Such a course of action on his part must be construed to constitute a complete acquiescence in and ratification of the previous action of the association and the Comptroller of the Currency in reference to the increase of the capital stock; and he cannot be permitted now to deny that he thereby became, and has continued to be, an owner of sixty shares of the capital stock of the bank fixed at the increased sum.

This conclusion is not weakened by the suggestion made in argument, that these proceedings of the bank took place during the period when its affairs were under the supervision of the Comptroller of the Currency, acting through the examiner. Notwithstanding the suspension of its business while under his control, the association continued its corporate existence, and was competent to exercise corporate functions. The increase of its capital, the vote of the assessment for the purpose of restoring what had been lost, and the acceptance of the alternative proposed by the Comptroller of the Currency to avoid going into liquidation, were all exertions of corporate powers, which, under the circumstances, the statute expressly contemplated and authorized. It is, therefore, not at all to the point that its assets and affairs were subject to the supervision of the bank examiner. Nor is the conclusion affected by the other consideration, also urged in argument, that the attempt to revive the business [653] of the bank by means of the assessment proved unsuccessful and abortive. The association, through its directors and stockholders, undertook the task, and entered upon its accomplishment, and in doing so materially changed its relations to its creditors. The failure to prosecute its business successfully certainly cannot have the operation now claimed for it, of making illegal all that was done in the prosecution of the experiment. The hazard of failure must be presumed to have been in the contemplation of the stockholders when they consented to the risk; and the consequences of failure cannot now be shifted from themselves to their creditors.

The second ground of defense to the action at law is, in our opinion, equally untenable. The assessment imposed upon the stockholders by their own vote, for the purpose of restoring their lost capital, as a consideration for the privilege of continuing business, and to avoid liquidation under section 5205 of the Revised Statutes, is not the assessment contemplated by section 5151, by which the shareholders of every national banking association may be compelled to discharge their individual responsibility for the contracts, debts, and engagements of the association. The assessment as made under section 5205 is voluntary, made by the stockholders themselves, paid into the general funds of the bank as a further investment in the capital stock, and disposed of by its officers in the ordinary course of its business. It may or may not be applied by them to the payment of creditors; and in the ordinary course of business certainly would not be applied, as in cases of liquidation, to the payment of creditors ratably; whereas, under section 5151 the individual liability does not arise, except in case of liquidation and for the purpose of winding up the affairs of the bank. The assessment under that section is made by authority of the Comptroller of the Currency, is not voluntary, and can be applied only to the satisfaction of the creditors equally and ratably. If the claim in the present case were allowed, it would follow that in every case payments made by stockholders, for the purpose of restoring the impaired capital, would be considered as credits on the ultimate individual responsibility of shareholders, and the whole efficiency of the provisions of section 5151 for the protection of the creditors of the company at the time of liquidation would be destroyed. The obligations of the shareholders under the two sections are entirely diverse; and payments made under section 5205 cannot be applied to the satisfaction of the individual responsibility secured by section 5151. Scovill v. Thayer, 105 U. S. 143 [Bk. 26, L. ed. 968].

But, it is said, in the third place, as the ground of relief under the bill in equity, that while this may be the result of a strict application of technical law, there remains to the complainant an equity which entitles him, by some process of substitution, to apply the payment which he has made under section 5205 to extinguish his liability under section 5151. So far as can be gathered from the allegations of the bill, the facts found, and the argument of counsel, this equity is supposed to rest upon the facts that the money paid by the stockholders under the assessment was in fact applied to the satisfaction of the debts of the bank; that such application was intended by the appellant when the assessment was paid; and that he paid it in the belief that it would exonerate him from further liability as a stockholder, induced by representations made to him to that effect by others interested in the affairs of the bank. Whatever hardship there may be in the circumstances of the case, we are unable to discover any ground of equitable relief. If the assessment was applied by the officers of the bank to the satisfaction of its debts, there is nothing to show that it was done ratably, as required by section 5151. The assessment was not paid by the stockholders for the purpose of effecting a liquidation of the affairs of the bank, but was understood to be the price paid for the privilege of continuing its business, in the hope of saving their investment. If it was paid under a mistaken supposition that, in the event of future failure, nothing more could be required of them, there is nothing to show that the shareholders were led into the mistake by any misrepresentations either of fact or of law on the part of the creditors for whose benefit the receiver is now acting. The mistake, if any, is one for which each shareholder is alone responsible.

[655] On the whole, we are constrained to conclude that the defenses at law and the alleged ground of relief in equity are alike insufficient, and that the judgment and the decree of the Circuit Court must be affirmed, and it is accordingly so ordered.

PETER BUTLER, Receiver of the PACIFIC NATIONAL BANK OF BOSTON.

National banks—action to enforce the liability of the estate of a shareholder under sections 5157, 5152, R. S. after surrender of certificates with power of attorney—construction of statute—transfer of stock.

Upon a reasonable construction of the statute imposing liability upon shareholders for the debts of national banks, and for all the objects intended to be accomplished by the provision imposing liability of shareholders for the debts of national banks, the responsibility of the defendants ceased upon the surrender of certain stock certificates to the bank, and the delivery to its president of a power of attorney sufficient to effect, and intended to effect, as that officer knew, a transfer of the stock on the books of the association to the purchaser; although such transfer was not in fact made.

Mr. Justice Harlan delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiffs in error are the personal representatives of Leonard Whitney, who, at the time of his death, held two certificates for fifty shares each of the capital stock of the Pacific National Bank of Boston. That bank suspended on November 18, 1881, and from that date until March 18, 1882, was in charge of an examiner of national banks. On the day last named, with the permission of the Comptroller of the Currency, it resumed business and so continued until May 20, 1882, when it failed, and was placed by that officer in the hands of a receiver to be wound up. At the time the Receiver took possession, as well as when this action was brought, March 14, 1883, the above shares of stock stood in the name of Whitney on the books of the bank.

This suit was brought against the executors of Whitney, pursuant to the orders of the Comptroller of the Currency. It is based upon those provisions of the statute which declare that the shareholders of national banking associations shall be individually responsible, equally and ratably, and not one for another, for all contracts, debts and engagements, to the extent or amount of their stock therein, at the par value thereof, in addition to the amount invested in such shares; and that estates and funds in the hands of executors of persons holding stock shall be liable in like manner and to the same extent as the testator would have been if living. R. S. secs. 5157, 5152. The assessment by the Comptroller upon shareholders to meet the bank's debts was for the full amount authorized by the statute.

The defendants insist that they were not shareholders of the bank, and did not hold, nor were entitled to hold, any certificates of shares of its capital stock, either at the date of its suspension, or when the Receiver was appointed, or when the assessment was made by the Comptroller. This defense was overruled, and the executors of Whitney were adjudged to be liable, the circuit judge observing: "This being a suit brought by the Receiver, who represents the creditors, and it appearing that the stock was not transferred on the books of the company, as provided by the by-laws, we think the defendants liable."

The question before the court is whether, under the statute and the facts specially found, the defendants were liable to be assessed for the contracts, debts and engagements of the bank. The statute declares that the capital stock of a national bank shall be transferable on its books in such manner as may be prescribed in the by-laws or articles of the association; every person becoming a shareholder by such transfer succeeding, in proportion to his shares, to all the rights and liabilities of the prior holder. R. S. sec. 5139. The by-laws of this bank provide [658] that its stock should be assignable only on its books, subject to the restrictions and provisions of the statute; that a transfer book be kept, in which all assignments and transfers of stock should be made; that each certificate should state upon its face that the stock is transferable only on the books of the bank; and that when a transfer is made the certificate shall be returned and canceled, and a new one issued. Whether these by-laws were so far complied with as to release the defendants as executors from the liability imposed by statute, depends upon the effect to be given to certain acts of the executors and of the president of the bank in connection with the sale of the stock standing in Whitney's name.

It appears from the special finding of facts that Abner Coburn, of Maine, desiring to buy two hundred and fifty shares of the stock of this bank, made a special deposit in it of $25,000 to be applied for that purpose. This fact appears from a letter addressed to him by Benyon, the president of the bank, under date of September 21, 1881, in which the latter said: "Yours of 20th received with check $25,000, which we will use pending the purchase of our stock, and will hold on your account, as a special deposit, securities to the same amount, till we succeed in making the purchase. This leaves the amount in your control until invested, and, I trust, will be satisfactory to you." That the stock might be obtained, Benyon secured the services of one Eager who had a deposit account with the bank; and that the latter might have money with which to buy the stock, Benyon placed to his credit, as a temporary loan, out of the funds of the bank, the exact amount required for the purchase.

On November 8, 1881, the defendants—having no reason whatever to believe that the bank was insolvent, or was about to become so; on the contrary, believing it to be solvent, and having no information as to Coburn's order—placed the certificates held by them in the hands of Day & Co., brokers, with directions to sell the stock. They also placed in their hands a power of attorney in the form usually adopted for transfers of stock. It was blank as to the names of the attorney and the purchaser, but was [659] signed by the executors and duly witnessed. It was in these words: "Know all men by these presents, that, for value received, we, the executors of the estate of Leonard Whitney, of Watertown, do hereby make, constitute, and appoint, irrevocably, ——— true and lawful attorney (with power of substitution), for and in our name and our behalf to sell, assign, and transfer unto ——— one hundred shares now standing in the name of L. Whitney, of Watertown, Mass., in the capital stock of the Pacific National Bank; and said attorney is hereby fully empowered to make and pass all necessary acts for the said assignment and transfer. Witness our hands and seals." To that power of attorney was appended the following: "For value received, I appoint, irrevocably, —— as my substitute, with all the powers above given to me. Witness —— hand and seal, ——, 187-, —— ——. [Seal.]" The other papers were the two certificates of stock and the certificate from the proper probate court, showing the appointment and qualification of the defendants as executors. Each stock certificate contained the following words: "Transferable only on the books of the said bank, in person or by attorney, on surrender of this certificate."

On November 12, 1881, Day & Co. offered the stock for sale at public auction, and the same was, at Benyon's request, bought by Eager at the sum of $10,400. Three days thereafter, November 15, 1881, Eager offered to the brokers in payment for the stock his check on the Pacific National Bank. The bank at which the brokers did business declined to take that check in its deposit account. Benyon, being informed of that fact, substituted for the check of Eager a cashier's check on another bank, which last check being paid, Day & Co., with the knowledge of Eager, delivered to Benyon, the president of the bank, the foregoing certificates of stock, with the power of attorney, the certificate from the probate court, and other papers—he thereafter holding the same "as purporting to be security for and as representing said loan, awaiting the filling of Coburn's order, with the design then to have the stock [660] transferred to him as soon as his order had been filled." On the 16th of November the defendants received from the brokers the proceeds of the sale of the Whitney stock. Benyon obtained only fifty additional shares, for the purpose of filling the order of Coburn. All this happened before the bank suspended on November 18, 1881.

The executors of Whitney did not know by whom the stock was bought at the auction sale, unless the knowledge of the brokers is to be imputed to them. Believing in good faith, and having no reason to doubt that the purchaser had caused the transfer to be made, neither they nor the brokers took steps to ascertain whether it had in fact been done.

They had no knowledge or information until after the appointment of the Receiver as to the purpose for which either Benyon or Eager held the before-mentioned papers or the stock.

While the bank did not purchase nor intend to purchase the stock for itself, its president, in execution of Coburn's order, procured Eager to buy this stock with funds furnished him for that purpose. Coburn did not take it; and the Receiver, after he took possession, found the before-mentioned papers in an envelope purporting to represent a security for a demand loan to Benyon.

We do not think that the question arising upon these facts is concluded by any of the cases cited in the opinion of the circuit judge,* or in those cited in the brief for the Receiver.† In nearly all of them, where the issue was between the receiver, representing the creditors, and the person standing on the register of the bank as a shareholder, it is said, generally, that the creditors of a national bank are entitled to know who, as shareholders, have pledged their individual liability as security for its debts, engagements and contracts; that if a person permits his name to appear and remain in its outstanding certificates of stock, and on its register, as a shareholder, he is estopped, as between himself and the creditors of the bank, to deny [66] that he is a shareholder; and that his individual liability continues until there is a transfer of the stock on the books of the bank, even where he has in good faith previously sold it and delivered to the buyer the certificate of stock, with a power of attorney in such form as to enable the transfer to be made. Some of the cases hold that the seller is liable as a shareholder, even where the buyer agreed to have the transfer made on the books of the bank, but fraudulently or negligently failed to do so. But it will be found, upon careful examination, that in no one of the cases in which these general principles have been announced, as between creditors and shareholders, does it appear that the precaution was taken, after the sale of the stock, to surrender the certificates therefor to the bank itself, accompanied (where such surrender was not by the shareholder in person) by a power of attorney, which would enable its officers to make the transfer on the register. The position of the seller, in such case, is analogous to that of a grantor of a deed deposited in the proper office to be recorded. The general rule is that the deed is considered as recorded from the time of such deposit. 2 Washb. Real Prop. B. 3, chap. 4, par. 52. Where the seller delivers the stock certificate and power of attorney to the buyer, relying upon the promise of the latter to have the necessary transfer made, or where the certificate and power of attorney are delivered to the bank without communicating to its officers the name of the buyer, the seller may well be held liable as a shareholder until, at least, he shall have done all that he reasonably can do to effect a transfer on the stock register.

In the case before us the personal presence of the defendants at the bank was not required, in order to secure their release from liability as shareholders. Besides, the certificates of stock authorized them to act by attorney. Through their agents, the brokers, who sold the stock, and through whom they received the money paid for it, they surrendered the certificates and power of attorney to the president of the bank; he receiving them, with knowledge not only that defendants had parted with all title to the stock and had been paid for it, but also that it had been purchased at public auction by [66 Eager. He knew equally well that the surrender of the certificates and the delivery of the power of attorney and the certificate from the probate court could only have been for the purpose of having it appear, by means of a transfer on the books of the bank, that Whitney's executors were no longer shareholders. The right to have the transfer made, and thereby secure exemption from further responsibility, was secured to the defendants both by the statute and by the by-laws of the bank. They did all that was required by either as preliminary to such transfer. Nothing remained to be done except for some officer of the bank to make the necessary formal entries on its books. If, when the agents of defendants delivered the certificates and power of attorney to the president of the bank, the latter had given any intimation of a purpose not to make the transfer promptly, or had avowed an intention to postpone action until a sufficient amount of stock was obtained to fill Coburn's order, it may be that the failure of the defendants to take legal steps to compel a transfer would, in favor of the creditors of the bank, have been deemed a waiver of the right to an immediate transfer on the stock register. But no such intimation was given; no such avowal was made. No objection was made to the power of attorney, or to the discharge of the defendants from liability. So far as the record shows, nothing was said or done by the bank's officers to raise a doubt in the minds of the defendants' agents that the transfer would be made at once.

It was suggested in argument that the defendants should have seen that the transfer was made. But we were not told precisely what ought to have been done to this end that was not done by them and their agents. Had anything occurred that would have justified the defendants in believing, or even in suspecting, that the transfer had not been promptly made on the books of the bank, they would, perhaps, have been wanting in due diligence had they not, by inspection of the bank's stock register, ascertained whether the proper transfer had in fact been made. But there was nothing to justify such a belief or to excite such a suspicion.
[663] Their conduct was, under all the circumstances, that of careful, prudent business men, and it would be a harsh interpretation of their acts to hold (in the language in some of the cases, when considering the general question under a different state of facts) that they allowed or permitted the name of Whitney to remain on the stock register as a shareholder. We are of opinion that, within a reasonable construction of the statute, and for all the objects intended to be accomplished by the provision imposing liability upon shareholders for the debts of national banks, the responsibility of the defendants must be held to have ceased upon the surrender of the certificates to the bank and the delivery to its president of a power of attorney sufficient to effect, and intended to effect, as that officer knew, a transfer of the stock on the books of the association to the purchaser.

For the reasons stated, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to enter a judgment for the defendants. Reversed.

EZEKIEL GILES ET AL.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 596-608.)

Jurisdiction—removal of causes—defendants charged as co-conspirators—collusion—stipulation.

1. When a bill, filed in a state court, charges the defendants, part of whom resided in the same State with the complainants, as co-conspirators, the cause is not removable to the federal court, although the defendants who resided in another State allege in their petition for removal that they are not jointly interested with the other defendants, and that their controversy with the complainants is a separate one.

2. The evidence examined, and a deed to a defendant, who was a resident of another State than the grantors and the complainants, held to have been collusively made for the purpose of conferring jurisdiction on the federal courts.

3. A stipulation that the decision of an issue in another case should be taken as the decision in the present case, so far as the issue was the same, does not make the decision of the circuit court in accordance with such stipulation binding upon this court.

Submitted Oct. 19, 1886. Decided Nov. 1, 1886.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Nebraska. Reversed.

The case is stated by the court.

Messrs. T. M. Marquett, N. S. Harwood, John H. Ames and Walter J. Lamb, for appellants.

Messrs. L. C. Burr and J. M. Woolworth, for appellees.

Mr. Justice Bradley delived the opinion of [59
the court:

The original bill in this case was filed in January, 1882, in the District Court of Lancaster County, in the State of Nebraska, to quiet the title of the complainants, some seventy in number, to certain lots of land in and about the Town of Lincoln in that State, severally owned by them (as they allege) and derived under conveyances in fee from one Edith J. Dawson. The bill alleges that Jacob Dawson died seised of the lands in 1869, and by his will, dated June 15 of that year, gave to his wife, the said Edith, all his real and personal estate, to be and remain hers, with full power, right and authority to dispose of the same as to her should seem meet and proper, so long as she should remain his widow, upon the express condition that if she should marry again, then that all the estate, or whatever might remain, should go to the testator's surviving children, share and share alike, and appointed his wife executrix; that she duly proved the will, and afterwards, in order to raise money to pay the debts of her deceased husband, and advance her children, made the conveyances referred to, pretending to be, and the defendants represented that she was, authorized by the power given her in the will to convey the property in fee. The bill states these conveyances, and alleges that the complainants, or their grantors, had severally erected expensive buildings and made valuable improvements on the lands. The bill further states that the said Edith afterwards, on the 15th of November, 1879, was reputed to have intermarried with one Pickering, and that, upon this marriage, the children and heirs of the said Jacob Dawson, namely: William R. Dawson, Albert L. Dawson, and others named in the bill, claimed to be seised in fee under the said will, and fraudulently conspired with one Highland H. Wheeler and one Lionel C. Burr, attorneys, to cloud and incumber the titles of the complainants by various suits at law, and to extort money from them; and that for this purpose the said [59 heirs, without any consideration, but for the pretended consideration of $75,000, executed and delivered to said Wheeler and Burr a pretended deed or deeds for said lands, in consideration whereof it was agreed that the latter should pay and deliver to said heirs one fourth part of whatever they could extort from the complainants, and retain the balance for themselves; and that further to carry out this fraudulent scheme, Wheeler and Burr, on the 27th of April, 1880, for the purpose of prosecuting complainants in the United States Courts, and for no other consideration whatever, executed a pretended deed for said lands to one Ezekiel Giles, father-in-law of said Burr, a man of no property or means, who resided in Iowa; and that they have already commenced several vexatious suits in ejectment in said courts against the complainants, and threaten to commence others. The bill makes Giles, Wheeler and Burr and the Dawson heirs defendants, and prays against all of them an injunction, a decree to quiet title, and to cancel the fraudulent conveyances made by Dawson's heirs to Wheeler and Burr, and by Wheeler and Burr to Giles, to establish the complainants' title, and for further relief.

Wheeler and Burr and three of the heirs of Dawson, namely, Albert L. Dawson, M. S. Dawson, and Melita C. D. Tillman, filed a disclaimer of any right, title, or interest in the property; and affidavits were filed by thirty-one of the co-complainants, denying that they had authorized their names to be used in the bill, and repudiating all connection with it.

Giles then, on the 28th of February, 1882, presented a petition to remove the cause, as against him, to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Nebraska, alleging that he was and is a citizen of Iowa, and that the complainants (those of them who had not repudiated the proceedings) were citizens of Nebraska and other States; that there were as many different controversies as there were complainants, each claiming a separate parcel of the land, and that the several controversies were wholly between each individual plaintiff and himself, and were capable of being fully determined between them without the others being parties; that the several matters in dispute exceed the value of $500, etc. An order to remove the cause was made accordingly.

On the first of March, 1882, a motion was made by the complainants in the circuit court to remand the cause, on the ground, amongst other things, that it appeared by the pleadings that Giles is not the real party in interest, but that Wheeler and Burr, and the heirs of Jacob Dawson, are the really interested parties, and that the action is brought in this court (the circuit court) for their benefit; that all these parties are residents of Nebraska, except Giles, who is a mere nominal defendant. The motion to remand was not granted, although no action of the court on the subject at this time appears in the record; but it does appear afterwards, as will be shown hereafter, that the motion to remand was refused.

On the 5th of April, 1882, Giles filed his answer and a cross bill. The answer denies the charge of fraud, but admits that the only consideration of the deed from Dawson's heirs to Wheeler and Burr was $200 and an agreement to pay the heirs one third of the proceeds which Wheeler and Burr might recover; it denies that the deed to Giles was made for the purpose of suing in the courts of the United States. It states the marriage of the widow, Edith, and insists that her deeds conveyed only an estate during her widowhood, and that the title derived by Giles from the heirs of Jacob Dawson is valid. It sets out the proceedings in various suits brought against some of the complainants, particularly one in which the judgment was brought to this court, by which the will of Dawson was construed in favor of Giles and against the title of complainants. Giles v. Little, 104 U. S. 291 [Bk. 26, L. ed 745].

The cross bill is filed against all the complainants who did not repudiate the suit. It describes the different tracts held by the several complainants, alleges that they took with full knowledge of the will; that they have received large amounts of rents and profits; that their pretensions are a cloud on Giles' title, and prays for a construction of the will, a decree to quiet title, an account of rents and profits, an injunction, a receiver, etc. The complainants answered the cross bill, amongst other things denying that Giles had any real interest, and again raising the question of jurisdiction. It is unnecessary to notice the other pleadings in the cause. The parties went to proofs, and, on the final hearing, the original bill was dismissed in June, 1883, and an account of the improvements erected by the complainants, and of the rents and profits received by them, was ordered to be taken under the cross bill, and in September, 1884, a decree was rendered in favor of Giles, directing a surrender of the property held by the complainants respectively, on payment of the difference, in each case, between the value of the improvements erected and the rents and profits received. An appeal was taken from each of these decrees.

The first question to be considered is the jurisdiction of the circuit court to hear and determine the case. The complainants contested that jurisdiction from the time of the filing of the petition of removal; and a great deal of evidence was taken in reference to the charge that the deed to Giles was collusively made for the purpose of making a case for the federal courts.

But before examining that matter, there is another aspect of the question which presents itself on the face of the pleadings as they stood when the petition for removal was filed. The bill charged the defendants as co-conspirators in a scheme to raise a cloud on the title of the complainants, and to defraud them of their property. According to the allegations of the bill, the deed to Giles was a link in the chain of fraudulent acts charged. We have repeatedly held that a suit brought against several defendants, some of whom are citizens of the same State with the plaintiff, charging them all as joint contractors or joint trespassers, cannot be removed into the United States Court by those who are citizens of another State, although they allege in their petition for removal that they are not jointly interested or liable with the other defendants, and that their controversy with the plaintiff is a separate one. We think that the present case is one of that kind. The bill, as we have said, charges the defendants jointly. Giles could not, by merely making contrary averments in his petition for [601] removal, and setting up a case inconsistent with the allegations of the bill, segregate himself from the other defendants, and thus entitle himself to remove the case into the United States Court. This matter has been fully considered in the following cases: Louisville & N. R. R. Co. v. Ide, 114 U. S. 52 [Bk. 29, L. ed. 63]; Farmington v. Pillsbury, 114 U. S. 138 [Bk. 29, L. ed. 114]; Pirie v. Tvedt, 115 U. S. 41 [Bk. 29, L. ed. 331]; Crump v. Thurber, 115 U. S. 56 [Bk. 29, L. ed. 328]; Starin v. New York, 115 U. S. 248 [Bk. 29, L. ed. 388]; Sloane v. Anderson, 117 U. S. 278 [Bk. 29, L. ed. 899]; Fidelity Ins. Co. v. Huntington, 117 U. S. 280 [Bk. 29, L. ed. 898]; Core v. Vinal, 117 U. S. 347 [Bk. 29, L. ed. 912]; Mining Co v. Canal Co. 118 U. S. 264 [ante, 232].

In Louisville & N. R. R. Co. v. Ide, the suit was originally brought by Ide in the Supreme Court of New York against several railroad companies forming a continuous line, including the plaintiff in error, to recover damages for the loss of cotton shipped at one end of the line and destined to the other. The Louisville and Nashville Company separated in pleading, and denied that the loss had occurred on its road, and removed the case, as to itself, to the Circuit Court of the United States, alleging in the petition for removal that the controversy with it was a separate one. The circuit court remanded the case, and on a writ of error we affirmed the order to remand. In delivering the opinion of the court, the Chief Justice said: "The claim of right to a removal is based entirely on the fact that the Louisville and Nashville Company, the petitioning defendant, has presented a separate defense to the joint action by filing a separate answer tendering separate issues for trial. This, it has been been frequently decided, is not enough to introduce a separate controversy into the suit, within the meaning of the statute. Hyde v. Ruble, 104 U. S. 407 [Bk. 26, L. ed. 823]; Ayres v. Wiswall, 112 U. S. 187, 192 [Bk. 28, L. ed. 693, 695]. Separate answers by the several defendants, sued on joint causes of action, may present different questions for determination, but they do not necessarily divide the suit into separate controversies. A defendant has no right to say that an action shall be several which a plaintiff elects to make joint. Smith v. Rines, 2 Sumn. 348. A separate defense may defeat a joint recovery, but it cannot deprive a plaintiff of his right to prosecute his own suit to final deter-[602] mination in his own way. The cause of action is the subject matter of the controversy, and that is, for all the purposes of the suit, whatever the plaintiff declares it to be in his pleadings."

In Pirie v. Tvedt [supra] the case was one of malicious prosecution, and of course, by the common law, the defendants could be sued jointly or severally. But the plaintiff had elected to sue them jointly, as being jointly concerned in the prosecution complained of. The Chief Justice delivered the opinion of the court, and, after citing and reaffirming the case of Louisville & N. R. R. Co. v. Ide, he said: "The cause of action is several, as well as joint, and the plaintiffs might have sued each defendant separately, or all jointly. It was for the plaintiffs to elect which course to pursue. They did elect to proceed against all jointly, and to this the defendants are not permitted to object. The fact that a judgment in the action may be rendered against a part of the defendants only does not divide a joint action in tort into separate parts any more than it does a joint action on contract."

The present case is clearly within the rule established by these and the other cases referred to.

But we are also satisfied that the other ground is well taken; that the deed to Giles was collusively made for the mere purpose of giving jurisdiction to the courts of the United States; and that for this reason the case should have been remanded to the state court. We have examined the evidence on this subject with some care, and have come to that conclusion. Whether, under the former practice of the court, the deed to Giles, being binding between him and his grantors Wheeler and Burr, would have been deemed sufficient to give jurisdiction to the circuit court, although made for the purpose of such jurisdiction, it is not necessary to inquire. We are satisfied that by the Act of March 3, 1875, chap. 137, sec. 1, 18 Stat. at L. 470, Congress has intended to introduce a rule that shall put a stop to all collusive shifts and contrivances for giving such jurisdiction. The language of the fifth section of that Act is as follows: "That if, in any suit commenced in a circuit court, or removed from a state court to a Circuit Court of the United States, it shall appear to the satisfaction of the said circuit court, at any time after such suit has been brought or removed thereto, that such suit does [603] not really and substantially involve a dispute or controversy properly within the jurisdiction of said circuit court, or that the parties to said suit have been improperly or collusively made or joined, either as plaintiffs or defendants, for the purpose of creating a case cognizable or removable under this Act, the said circuit court shall proceed no further therein, but shall dismiss the suit or remand it to the court from which it was removed, as justice may require." Supp. to Rev. Stat. 175. Here the words "really" and "substantially," and the expression "improperly or collusively made or joined, either as plaintiffs or defendants, for the purpose of creating a case cognizable or removable," are very suggestive, and show that, by giving the circuit courts authority to dismiss or remand the cause at once, if these things are made to appear, it was the intent of Congress to prevent and put an end to all collusive arrangements made to give jurisdiction, where the parties really interested are citizens of the same State. Of course, where the interest of the nominal party is real, the fact that others are interested who are not necessary parties, and are not made parties, will not affect the jurisdiction of the circuit court; but when it is simulated and collusive, and created for the very purpose of giving jurisdiction, the courts should not hesitate to apply the wholesome provisions of the law.

In Farmington v. Pillsbury [supra], where certain bonds of a municipal corporation were declared void by a state court, as issued under an unconstitutional Act, and thereupon the holders of some of the coupons cut them off and transferred them to a citizen of another State, at much less than their face value, and took his note therefor, with an agreement that he should give them one half of what he might recover, and the transferee then brought suit in the Circuit Court of the United States, we held that this was a collusive transfer, and within the provisions of the fifth section of the Act of 1875. The Chief Justice, in delivering the opinion of the court, after showing that the question of colorable transfers to create a case for the federal courts was formerly presented for the most part in writs for the recovery of real property, and could only be raised by plea in abatement; and that if the transfer was shown to be fictitious and colorable such plea would be sustained, added: "Such was the condition of the law when the Act of 1875 was passed, which allowed suits to be brought by the assignees of promissory notes negotiable by the law merchant, as well as of foreign and domestic bills of exchange, if the necessary citizenship existed. This opened a wide door for frauds upon the jurisdiction of the court by collusive transfers, so as to make colorable parties and create cases cognizable by the courts of the United States. To protect the courts as well as parties against such frauds upon their jurisdiction, it was made the duty of a court, at any time when it satisfactorily appeared that a suit did not 'really and substantially involve a dispute or controversy' properly within its jurisdiction, or that the parties had been improperly or collusively made or joined, for the purpose of creating a case cognizable under that Act, 'to proceed no further therein,' but to dismiss the suit, or remand it to the state court from which it had been removed. The old rule established by the decisions, which required all objections to the citizenship of the parties, unless shown on the face of the record to be taken by plea in abatement before pleading to the merits, was changed, and the courts were given full authority to protect themselves against the false pretenses of apparent parties. This is a salutary provision which ought not to be neglected. It was intended to promote the ends of justice, and is equivalent to an express enactment by Congress, that the circuit courts shall not have jurisdiction of suits which do not really and substantially involve a dispute or controversy of which they have cognizance, nor of suits in which the parties have been improperly or collusively made or joined for the purpose of creating a case cognizable under the Act."

An examination of the evidence in the present case shows conclusively, as it seems to us, that it is one of the kind referred to by the Chief Justice.

The widow, Edith J. Dawson, was married to her second husband, Pickering, November 15, 1879. Pickering was sworn as a witness, and says that the marriage was delayed some [605] time on the suggestion of Mrs. Dawson that she must first sell her property and give her children a chance to make a contract with Wheeler and Burr. She denies this, it is true, but the facts seem to corroborate Pickering's story. She certainly did dispose of most of the lands before the marriage at prices based upon the supposition that she could convey a fee; and, in evident anticipation of the marriage—for it was on the tapis for a considerable time—on the 15th of September, 1879, the heirs conveyed their interest in the property to Wheeler and Burr; and on the 10th of November, only five days before the marriage, Wheeler and Burr executed an agreement with the heirs that whenever they (Wheeler and Burr) should come into possession and be seised in fee simple absolute of the estate, or any part thereof, they would quitclaim to the heirs one undivided third interest, or pay them the value of such third in cash. This agreement was really the whole consideration of the conveyance.

The next thing done was the making of the deed from Wheeler and Burr to Giles, dated April 27, 1880, for the nominal consideration of $75,000, but really for no consideration at all except an agreement between them, of the same date as the deed, by which Wheeler and Burr agreed to prosecute all suits against claimants, at the expense of Giles, for the possession of the premises, and to render or procure all necessary legal assistance for such purpose; and Giles agreed to pay all expenses of such suits, and, in the event of final success of any such suits, to pay Wheeler and Burr the value of one third of the lands recovered, and to assume and discharge all indebtedness arising by reason of the contract of November 10, 1879, made with the Dawson heirs. A little later Giles gave Burr (who was his son-in-law) a full power of attorney to act for him in the matter; to sue, recover possession, sell, lease, mortgage and otherwise dispose of the lands, and execute deeds, and other instruments to that end, and to manage and control the property. But it nowhere appears that Giles ever advanced any money or did anything in the matter.

Now, who was Giles, who entered into this large speculation in real estate in Lincoln, amounting in value to over $75,000, and in the hands of adverse claimants, against whom suits [606] would have to be brought to get possession? He was a poor farmer, living in Clay County, Iowa, two hundred and fifty or three hundred miles from Lincoln. He had never seen the property; he did not know its value; he had never been at Lincoln; and when, some time after the deed was made to him, he was told that the property was worth $75,000, he seemed greatly surprised. He further admitted that he had never had the deed in his possession, and had never seen it. The record has a large mass of evidence on the subject, pro and con, which it is unnecessary to repeat. The contemporary declarations of Burr are equally suggestive. He is proved to have admitted that the deed was made to Giles in order that suit might be brought in the United States court. In July, 1880, he wrote a long and urgent letter to William R. Dawson, one of the heirs, in which he speaks of the case as his and theirs, and that, if properly managed, it would make all of them rich. Amongst other things, this is what he says:

"Your letter of late date was received, and I want to reply to some things relating to the suit of the Dawson Heirs v Bacon. I have but very little doubt in my mind but what I shall within four years from to-day win this suit and get you heirs all this property back again, and thereby not only make myself, but all of you heirs, independently rich. Of course it is a long and tiresome and expensive suit, but I expect and know that now, while commencing the same. Yet you heirs are all interested with me, and must help me all you can, as the men I must fight are rich and numerous, and will do all they can to delay and hurt my prospects to win the case. Galey is already helping them all he can, by saying that he saw the will about one year after it was put in court; that your father at the time of his death was heavily in debt—to the full extent of his property, viz.: $10,000, etc., and that H. S. Jennings drew the will." This evidence might not be admissible against Giles, if it did not appear (as it does) that they were all concerned and implicated together in carrying out the general scheme, Burr being the alter ego of Giles, and Giles of Burr.

[627] Much more evidence to the same purport is contained in the record; and although counter-evidence was adduced by the defendants, we think that the weight of it all is decidedly to the effect that Giles really had no interest in the matter, and that the deed to him was made for the sole purpose of giving the circuit court jurisdiction. Being of this opinion, we think that the court was in error in not remanding the case to the state court.

It is contended by the appellees, however, that the decision of the judge in the case at law of Giles against Owens et al, upon the plea in abatement in that case, in which the issue was, whether the deed to Giles was collusively made for the purpose of bringing suit in the United States court, concludes the appellants on that point. A stipulation was entered into between the parties in this case that the issue on said plea in abatement should be tried, and that the decision thereon should be taken and entered of record as the decision upon the pleas filed in four other actions at law against other parties, and also of the issues in this suit as far as they are the same.

All that this stipulation amounts to, so far as it affects this case, is, that the trial and decision in the law case should be regarded as the decision in this. It is the same as if an issue had been directed by the circuit court, and a verdict had been rendered. The decision of the judge was adverse to the appellants and in favor of Giles; and, so far as this case is concerned, that decision, by virtue of the stipulation, is to be considered as the decision of the circuit court, and nothing more. But all the evidence taken on that trial is incorporated into this case, and is now before us. If we are satisfied that the whole evidence in the case, taken together, including that before the judge, does not support the decision, we are not bound by it. We have already stated our conclusion.

The stipulation above referred to, and the adoption thereby of the judge's decision in the case at law, as the decision of the circuit court, obviates another objection made by the appellee; to wit, that no decision of the circuit court was ever made on the motion to remand the cause.

The decrees of the Circuit Court are reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to remand the same to the District Court of Lancaster County, from which it was removed.

JACKSONVILLE, PENSACOLA AND MOBILE RAILROAD COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

UNITED STATES.

Act of Congress granting land to railroad corporation—construction of provision as to carrying mail—power of Postmaster-General.

1. The appellant was aided in the construction of its road by a grant of land from the United States. The granting Act contained a provision that the mails should be carried over the road at such rates as Congress might direct and, until the price should be so fixed, the Postmaster-General should have power to determine the same. Appellant had a written contract for the carrying of the mails from July 1, 1871 to June 30, 1875, at prescribed rates. After the termination of this contract appellant continued to carry the mails until June 30, 1880. March 21, 1876, the Postmaster-General fixed the compensation at a less rate until June 30, 1876. Further reductions were made under the Acts of July 12, 1876, and June 17, 1878. In each case notice was given the Company, and the service was continued and the reduced price received by it without objection.

2. On a petition filed to recover the difference between the price allowed and the price fixed previous to July 1, 1876, held:

That no implication arose that such was to be the compensation, either from the continuation of the service by the Postmaster-General after June 30, 1876, without objection, or from the fact that, under the regulations of the Department, appellant's road fell within the section in which contracts were to be made for four years from June 30, 1876.

[No. 867.]

Argued Oct. 21, 1886. Decided Nov. 1, 1886.

APPEAL from the Court of Claims. Affirmed

The case is stated by the court.

Messrs. S. F. Phillips, A. J. Willard and S. M. Lake, for appellant.

Mr. E. M. Watson, for appellee.

Mr. Justice Field delivered the opinion of [627] the court:

The petitioner, the Jacksonville, Pensacola and Mobile Railroad Company, was incorporated under the laws of Florida, and aided in the construction of its road by a grant of land from the United States. The Act making the grant contained a clause providing that the mails of the United States should be transported over the road and its branches under the direction of the Postmaster-General, at such price as Congress might, by law, direct; and that until the price should be thus fixed, the Postmaster-General should have power to determine the same. 11 Stat. at L. chap. 31, sec. 5. This provision was a condition attending the grant, with which the Company could not refuse to comply without subjecting itself to a claim for damages on the part of the Government, and possibly to a forfeiture of the grant. As was said in the case of Ohio & N. W. R. R. Co. v. United States, 104 U. S. 680 [Bk. 26, L. ed. 891], the power thus vested in the Postmaster-General to establish the price includes the power to prescribe the period of its duration. He might, if he thought expedient, and in many cases it would be so, prescribe specially for the service of each day. There may be, under some circumstances, temporary difficulties of transportation which would call for frequent, and, perhaps, daily changes in the prices allowed. When however, a price is agreed upon for a prescribed service for a designated period, and there are collateral stipulations annexed to the same which could not be exacted by the Government, without the assent of the company, as, for instance, the giving of sureties for the performance of the service in a particular way, then, as held in the case cited, a contract is created which cannot be disregarded by the Government without a breach of good faith. But where no such collateral stipulations are made, and no duration of time is prescribed, but the [628] service is exacted simply from the obligation growing out of the acceptance of the condition of the land grant, it rests in the discretion of the Postmaster-General to change the price, from time to time, as in his judgment the public interests may require. It is not to be presumed that in such matters he will act in an arbitrary or unreasonable manner. For any abuse of his authority there is the security which exists with reference to the action of all heads of the Executive Departments, in their responsibility to their superior, and liability to be called to account by Congress. No abuse of authority, however, is suggested in the present case. An error of construction as to the rights of the petitioner is alone alleged.

It appears from the record that the petitioner had a written contract with the Government for the transportation of the mail between certain designated points, from July 1, 1871, to June 30, 1875, at prescribed rates; that the contract contained various stipulations on the part of the Company as to the manner in which the service should be performed, the free transportation of special agents of the Department, its liability to fine for neglects and omissions of duty, and for the giving of adequate security for the performance of its undertaking. The price for the service was prescribed, and no question is made as to the entire and satisfactory fulfillment of the contract by the Company, or of the payment of the compensation stipulated by the Government. After the termination of this contract the petitioner continued to carry the mail as previously, without any notice from the Postmaster-General that the price to be allowed for the service would be in any respect different, until the 21st of March, 1876, when he fixed the rate of compensation at a less sum for the service until June 30, 1876. The service was performed by the Company, notwithstanding the reduction made, and the reduced price was received without objection.

From the first of July, 1876, until June 30, 1880, the same service was performed by the Company; but further reductions from the compensation previously allowed were made under the Acts of Congress of July 12, 1876, [629] and of June 17, 1878. Notice of them was given to the Company, but the service by it was continued, and the reduced price was received, also, without objection. It is now claimed that the Company is entitled to the difference between the price thus allowed and the price paid previous to July 1, 1876. It is to recover such difference that the petition is filed; the contention being that, by the continuation of the service of the Company after June 30, 1876, without objection from the Postmaster-General, a contract was implied that the same compensation should be subsequently allowed.

At this time, also, by regulation of the Department, the United States were divided into four contract sections. A general letting for one of these sections was to take place every year, and contracts were to be then made for four consecutive years, commencing on the first of July. The road of the petitioner was within the section in which contracts were to end on June 30, 1875, until the regulation was altered, when it came within the section in which contracts were to end on June 30, 1876. From this latter fact, that the road was thus within the section in which contracts were to be made for four years from July 1, 1876, it is further contended that the contract implied from the service afterwards rendered, as mentioned above, was to continue for four years.

The answer to both positions is obvious. By the condition contained in the land grant, the Company, as already stated, was to transport the mail at such price as the Postmaster-General should determine, unless fixed by the law of Congress. No implication could, therefore, arise from the continuance of the service, other than that the Company was carrying out the obligation imposed by its acceptance of the land grant. Without specific stipulations by sureties, there could be no obligation on their part for the Company; nor, without specific stipulations by the Company, could there be any requirement on its part to perform many of the duties specially designated in the written contract. The Postmaster-General may have deemed it expedient for the public interest to change, enlarge, or omit entirely the requirements previously prescribed, and to call for others of a different character. No implication [630] can arise, one way or the other, from his inaction. All that the Company could ask or expect under the law was that he should prescribe a reasonable compensation for its service, and that the service would be continued so long as the public interests should require. No implication of law could extend further than this.

And as to the alleged duration of four years, it is sufficient to say that the regulation of the Department referred to was designed only to further the administration of the postal service, not to impose any obligation on the Postmaster-General; and it would be against all analogies to hold that a continuance of service, after the termination of a written contract for years, creates an obligation of a renewed contract, not merely upon a like compensation, but for the same duration of time. There is no principle that could justify the implication.

Decree affirmed.

In the Matter of the PHENIX INSURANCE COMPANY OF BROOKLYN, NEW YORK, ET AL., Petitioners. [610

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 610–626.)

Admiralty—jurisdiction of district courts—petition for limitation of liability—writ of prohibition.

1. A District Court of the United States, as a court of admiralty, has no jurisdiction of a suit, either in rem or in personam, brought by a sufferer from a fire, alleged to have been set on land by the negligence of a passing vessel, to recover damages from the vessel or her owner.

2. A district court cannot take jurisdiction in admiralty, of a petition for a limitation of liability, where it would not have had cognizance in admiralty originally of the cause of action involved.

3. Where it appears upon the face of the proceedings that a district court has no jurisdiction of an admiralty case, the case is one for a writ of prohibition.

[No. 4, Orig.]

Argued Oct. 12, 1886. Decided Nov. 1, 1886.

PETITION for a writ of prohibition. Allowed.

The case is stated by the court.

Mr. Robert Rae in support of the petition:

If the Act of 1851 does embrace injuries to real estate on land, a question which we do not here discuss, the District Courts of the United States, neither under the statute nor by the Rules in Admiralty, promulgated by the United States Supreme Court in that proceeding, have jurisdiction to give the petitioner the relief which it seeks, the tort complained of not being a maritime tort, and as such, not within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction.

That the case is not within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction is not now an open question.

The tort complained of, not being a maritime one, and as a consequence the admiralty without jurisdiction, the admiralty court is not competent to herein determine the facts out of which the liability and its limitation grew. It is only in such cases as are within the admiralty jurisdiction that its courts can properly hear and decide the matter in dispute.

Ex parte Hagar, 104 U. S. 520 (Bk. 26, L. ed. 816); Ex parte Ferry Co. 104 U. S. 519 (Bk. 26, L. ed. 815); Ex parte Pa. 109 U. S. 175 (Bk. 27, L. ed. 894).

The court must rightfully get jurisdiction before it can proceed to do this. The case must be of admiralty cognizance. In the case at bar, the vessel was not seized upon any libel filed; no proceedings were in the registry of the court and no cause was pending in such courts; under such circumstances the court cannot attempt to take jurisdiction and proceed to take cognizance of matters over which it has not admiralty jurisdiction; and when it does so it falls within the duty of this court under the Act of 1789 to issue a writ of prohibition to the district court. Rev. Stat. 688.

The writ of prohibition has been used time out of mind to restrain the admiralty from taking jurisdiction of things occurring on land.

It is confessed that the district court has no jurisdiction to try the subject matter of the tort in controversy, but it is denied that a mistake in deciding to exercise its jurisdiction will justify a writ of prohibition. The jurisdiction of the admiralty is not general over torts committed on land; it has no jurisdiction whatever and therefore has no power to decide that the wrong doer may escape liability on any terms. It neither can give judgment against the defendant for the tort committed, nor satisfy the judgments of common-law courts. If it attempts it, it is a usurpation of jurisdiction, and not a mere error in the general exercise of its powers within the limits of its legitimate jurisdiction, and this usurpation may be prevented by prohibition.

Messrs. Geo. G. Greene, Jas. G. Jenkins, Jno. J. Fish, Fred. C. Winkler and A. A. L. Smith, for respondent:

The statutory rule of limited liability is a maritime rule or regulation which courts of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction have jurisdiction to enforce.

While federal courts cannot, under the Constitution, be given jurisdiction in admiralty of cases not inherently of admiralty jurisdiction, the maritime law may be changed by Congress.

The Lottawanna, 21 Wall. 558 (88 U. S. bk. 22, L. ed. 654); Prov. & N. Y. S. S. Co. v. Hill Mfg. Co. 109 U. S. 589 (Bk. 27, L. ed. 1042).

And when a case arises under the maritime law as changed or established by Congress it is a maritime case, although it would not have been before the change, jurisdiction of which belongs to the federal courts as courts of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction. The case of the respondent, then, being within the statutory limitation of liability, if that limitation is a maritime rule or regulation, whether the damage by the vessel is on land or water, the enforcement of that regulation by the respondent's proceeding must be a maritime case. The vice of the contention of the other side, that the subject of this proceeding being a tort or the enforcement of liability for a tort not maritime nor of admiralty jurisdiction—The Plymouth, 3 Wall. 30 (70 U. S. bk. 18, L. ed. 125)—therefore the proceeding cannot be maintained, consists in the assumption that such is the subject of the proceeding; whereas, that subject is the enforcement of the limitation of such liability—of the commercial regulation of Congress. That regulation being one which Congress could rightfully make, it must have power to provide for its enforcement; and as it is a regulation of a maritime subject—ships and shipping or commerce by water—it is a maritime regulation; jurisdiction of the enforcement of which Congress may repose in the federal courts, under the provision of the Constitution that the judicial power of the United States shall extend to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction. The rule is equally maritime whether it protects against liability for damage done by the ship on water, or on land. It is the thing protected that characterizes the rule, not the thing against which protection is given; and the thing protected being shipping and commerce by water, the rule is maritime.

Prov. & N. Y. S. S. Co. v. Hill Mfg. Co. 109 U. S. 593 (Bk. 27, L. ed. 1044); Norwich Co. v. Wright, 13 Wall. 104 (80 U.S. bk. 20, L. ed. 535).

Error of the district court in sustaining the foregoing positions does not warrant a writ of prohibition; but the mistake, if any, must be corrected on appeal.

The writ of prohibition is an extraordinary legal remedy used to prevent an inferior tribunal from usurping jurisdiction or abusing power. It is never allowed except in cases of usurpation or abuse of power, and not then unless other existing remedies are inadequate to afford relief. If, therefore, the inferior court has jurisdiction of the subject matter in controversy, a mistaken exercise of the jurisdiction or of its acknowledged powers will not justify its employment.

Such being the office of the writ and the limitations of its use, it ought not to be granted on this application.

The district court in deciding the respondent's case within the maritime rule neither usurped or abused power. It did not usurp power, for having general jurisdiction of the enforcement of the rule it of necessity had power to determine its meaning and application. If it erred in the exercise of that power its mistake was not so glaring and indefensible as to amount to an abuse of power.

When a court has jurisdiction of the general subject matter of an action or proceeding it has power to determine whether the facts presented in a particular case make it a "part or instance" of that subject matter.

The district court has original jurisdiction of the enforcement of the rule of limited liability. In the exercise of that jurisdiction it must have power to decide whether the rule applies to the particular case; for that question is inherent in every case presented.

Ruling wrongly that a specified case is within some general subject of its jurisdiction, it commits error. Attempting to exercise jurisdiction over some subject matter when it has none, it usurps power. The error must be corrected by appeal; the usurpation may be prevented by prohibition.

The distinction is enforced by numerous decisions of this court.

Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 14th of January, 1886, the Goodrich Transportation Company, a Wisconsin corporation, filed, in the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Wisconsin, a petition for a limitation of its liability, as owner of the steamer Oconto, claiming the benefit of the provisions of sections 4283 and 4284 of the Revised Statutes. The substantial matters set forth in the petition are these: The Oconto was on a voyage, from Chicago, Illinois, through Lake Michigan and Green Bay, to the City of Green Bay, in Wisconsin, which she approached by entering the mouth of the Fox River. While she was passing up the river opposite the city, on the 20th of September, 1880, a fire broke out in a planing-mill, which the steamer had passed, and it spread to other buildings, about sixty-seven being destroyed or injured, causing a damage of not less than $100,000 to the buildings and property in them. Such damage exceeds the value of the steamer, and of her freight pending at the time of the fire, that value being about $12,400. There was insurance against fire on some of the buildings and property. The owners and insurers claimed that the fire was negligently communicated to the planing-mill from the steamer, and that the corporation was liable for all the loss and damage occasioned by the fire. Some of the owners sued it in state courts in Wisconsin to recover damages, by six suits, in which the Phenix Insurance Company, as insurer, was joined as a coplaintiff. One of those suits had been disposed of by a judgment in favor of the corporation. In another, a judgment against the corporation for $2,570 and costs was rendered in March 1885. An appeal from it by the corporation to the Supreme Court of Wisconsin is pending. The other four suits are pending. Other persons are threatening to sue the corporation by like suits. It denies its liability for any loss or damage occasioned by the fire, and insists that the fire did not originate from, or was not negligently communicated from, The Oconto, but says that, if it is so liable, the fire originated, and the losses and damages were occasioned, without the privity or knowledge of the corporation; and that it desires as well to contest its liability, and the liability of the vessel, for such losses and damages, as also to claim the benefit of sections 4283 and 4284 of the Revised Statutes, and to limit its liability to the value of the vessel and her freight then pending. It offers to enter into a stipulation with sureties to pay into the court the value of the vessel, and the amount of her pending freight, whenever ordered so to do. [611] [612]

The prayer of the petition is for a decree that the corporation may have the benefit of such statutory provisions; that the value of the vessel immediately after the fire, and the amount of her freight then pending, be appraised; that the corporation may enter into a stipulation to pay such value and amount into court when required; that a monition issue for the proof of claims; that a commissioner be designated before whom claims shall be presented, and before whom the corporation may appear and contest said claims, and its liability on account of any loss or damage occasioned by the fire; that if it shall appear that the corporation was not liable for any such loss or damage, it may be so finally decreed; or otherwise, that the moneys secured by the stipulation be divided pro rata among the claimants; and that the prosecution of all the suits be restrained.

On this petition an order to show cause, returnable February 1, 1886, was made. The Phenix Insurance Company and the other plaintiffs in the five pending suits filed an answer, setting forth that, with the exception of the Insurance Company, they all were, and had been from before the fire, citizens of Wisconsin; that the amount of the insurance the Company had made on the property covered by the five suits was $9,700; and that the value of the property so insured and uninsured, belonging to the respondents, and partly insured in the Insurance Company, amounted to $28,000, with interest from the date of the loss. The answer also contains these statements: the property burned was situated on the shore of Fox River, wholly in the body of the City of Green Bay, and at a great distance from any navigable stream or other waters within the jurisdiction of the United States. The negligence of the owner of the steamer, in not having on her a contrivance to prevent the escape of sparks and fire from her smoke stack, and in starting her from her wharf with the exhaust on the inside of her smoke stack, within the City of Green Bay, caused the fire; the shore being covered with dry wooden buildings, and a heavy wind blowing across the course of the vessel towards the shore, and her [613] smoke stack throwing out large quantities of sparks, which were carried by the wind on to the shore and set fire to a planing-mill, from which the flames spread to the other buildings and property. The suits were all of them brought in the fall of 1880. The answer alleges that the court ought not to take jurisdiction of the petition, because the liability, if any, accrued by reason of a tort committed on the land to real estate in the body of a county and a State, and not on any navigable waters of the United States; and that the matters complained of are purely of common-law cognizance, and of right triable by a jury, and not by a commissioner appointed under the admiralty rules applicable to such proceedings.

The respondents moved to dismiss the petition for want of jurisdiction, which motion was denied, and the court, on March 15, 1886, made an order appointing appraisers to appraise the value of the steamer as it was on September 20, 1880, with the value of her freight earned on the voyage she was on.

The Phenix Insurance Company and the other plaintiffs in the five suits now present to this court a petition for a writ of prohibition to the judge of the district court, prohibiting him from proceeding to give the relief prayed for in the petition of the owner of the vessel.

It is provided by section 688 of the Revised [616] Statutes, that this court "shall have power to issue writs of prohibition to the district courts, when proceeding as courts of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction." This provision is taken from section 13 of the Act of September 24, 1789, 1 Stat. at L. 80. The question to be determined is, therefore, whether the district court has jurisdiction to entertain the proceeding in this case for the limitation of liability.

Sections 4283, 4284, and 4285 of the Revised Statutes provide as follows:

"Sec. 4283. The liability of the owner of any vessel, for any embezzlement, loss or destruction, by any person, of any property, goods or merchandise, shipped or put on board of such vessel, or for any loss, damage, or injury by collision, or for any act, matter, or thing, loss, damage, or forfeiture, done, occasioned or incurred, without the privity or knowledge of [617] such owner or owners, shall in no case exceed the amount or value of the interest of such owner in such vessel, and her freight then pending.

Sec. 4284. Whenever any such embezzlement, loss, or destruction is suffered by several freighters or owners of goods, wares, merchandise or any property whatever, on the same voyage, and the whole value of the vessel and her freight for the voyage is not sufficient to make compensation to each of them, they shall receive compensation from the owner of the vessel in proportion to their respective losses; and for that purpose the freighters and owners of the property, and the owner of the vessel, or any of them, may take the appropriate proceedings in any court, for the purpose of apportioning the sum for which the owner of the vessel may be liable among the parties entitled thereto.

Sec. 4285. It shall be deemed a sufficient compliance on the part of such owner with the requirements of this title relating to his liability for any embezzlement, loss or destruction of any property, goods, or merchandise, if he shall transfer his interest in such vessel and freight, for the benefit of such claimants, to a trustee, to be appointed by any court of competent jurisdiction, to act as such trustee for the person who may prove to be legally entitled thereto; from and after which transfer all claims and proceedings against the owner shall cease."

The claim to a limitation of liability in the present case is made under that clause of section 4283 which provides that "the liability of the owner of any vessel" "for any act, matter or thing, loss, damage or forfeiture, done, occasioned or incurred, without the privity or knowledge of such owner or owners, shall in no case exceed the amount or value of the interest of such owner in such vessel and her freight then pending." That section does not purport to confer any jurisdiction upon a district court. Section 4285, in providing for the transfer to a trustee of the interest of the owner in the vessel and freight, provides only that the trustee may "be appointed by any court of competent jurisdiction," leaving the question of such competency to depend on other [618] provisions of law.

Nothing is clearer than that by the express adjudication of this court, the district court, as a court of admiralty, would have no jurisdiction of a suit either in rem or in personam, by any one of the sufferers by the fire, to recover damages from the vessel or her owner It was so held in The Plymouth, 3 Wall. 20 [70 U. S. bk. 18, L. ed. 125]. In that case a steam vessel, anchored beside a wharf in the Chicago River, in navigable water, took fire through the negligence of those in charge of her. The flames spread to the wharf and buildings upon it. Their owners sued the owners of the steam vessel in personam, in the District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, in admiralty, for the damage. That court dismissed the libel for want of jurisdiction, and the circuit court affirmed the decree. On appeal by the libelant this court affirmed the decree of the circuit court. The argument in favor of the jurisdiction is very fully given in the report. It was urged that the vessel was a maritime thing; that the locality was maritime, because the vessel was moored in navigable water; that the principal thing drew after it the incident, although the damage was suffered on land; and that, under the "rule of locality," "that, in cases of tort, the jurisdiction depends on the locality of the act done, and that it must be done on navigable water," the locality of the act "embraced the entire space occupied by the agent and the object, and the spatial distance passed over by the casual influence in accomplishing the effect." But Mr. Justice Nelson, delivering the unanimous opinion of this court, said that the true meaning of the rule of locality in cases of marine torts was, that the wrong must have been committed wholly on navigable waters, or, at least, the substance and consummation of the same must have taken place upon those waters, to be within the admiralty jurisdiction. In answer to the argument that the vessel which communicated the fire was a maritime instrument, the court said that the jurisdiction did not depend on the wrong having been committed on board the vessel, but on its having been committed on navigable waters; and that the substantial cause of action, arising out of the wrong, must be complete within the locality on which the jurisdiction depended. It added: "The remedy for the injury belongs [619] to the courts of common law."

Under this authoritative decision, as the owners of the burned property could not sue originally in the admiralty for their damages, it is impossible to see how, by the present form of proceeding, the owner of the steamer can give to the admiralty court jurisdiction to entertain the suits for the damage, by a practical removal of them into the admiralty court. For the petition of the owner of the vessel says that it desires as well to contest its liability for the damage, as to claim the benefit of a limitation of liability; and it prays that it may be allowed to contest in the admiralty court its liability for the damage, and that, if it is not liable. there may be a decree to that effect.

As there is no foundation in the general admiralty jurisdiction of the district court for its assumption of jurisdiction in this case, and none in the special provisions of the statute for the limitation of liability, it is sought to uphold the jurisdiction under the Rules in Admiralty promulgated by this court in reference to the limitation of liability. The provisions of the Revised Statutes on the subject of the limitation of liability were taken from the Act of March 3, 1851, 9 Stat. at L. 635. There is nothing in that Act, nor in the corresponding enactments in the Revised Statutes, in regard to the promulgation of any rules by this court for procedure in the matter. The rules it has made (Rules 54, 55, 56, 57) are Rules in Admiralty, promulgated May 6,1872, 13 Wall. XIII [Bk. 20, L. ed. 921]. They were announced as "Supplementary Rules of Practice in Admiralty, under the Act of March 3, 1851, entitled 'An Act to Limit the Liability of Shipowners, and for Other Purposes.'" They are authoritatively embodied in, and numbered as part of, the "Rules of Practice for the Courts of the United States in Admiralty and Maritime Jurisdiction on the Instance Side of the Court, in pursuance of the Act of the 23d of August, 1842, chapter 188." The authority given to this court by the Act of 1842 was in section 6, 5 Stat. at L. 518, and was in these words: "The supreme court shall have full power and authority, from time to time, to prescribe and regulate and alter the forms of writs and other process to be used and issued in the District and Circuit Courts of the United States, and the forms and modes of framing and filing libels, bills, answers and other proceedings and pleadings in suits at common law or in admiralty and equity pending in the said courts, and also [620] the forms and modes of taking and obtaining evidence, and of obtaining discovery, and generally the forms and modes of proceeding to obtain relief, and the forms and modes of drawing up, entering and enrolling decrees, and the forms and modes of proceeding before trustees appointed by the court, and generally to regulate the whole practice of the said courts, so as to prevent delays, and to promote brevity and succinctness in all pleadings and proceedings therein, and to abolish all unnecessary costs and expenses in any suit therein." These provisions, as applied to suits in admiralty in the district courts, are to be found now, with some variations. in sections 862 and 917 of the Revised Statutes. In section 862 it is enacted that "the mode of process in causes" "of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction shall be according to rules now or hereafter prescribed by the supreme court, except as herein specially provided." In section 917 the enactment is that "The supreme court shall have power to prescribe, from time to time, and in any manner not inconsistent with any law of the United States, the forms of writs and other process, the modes of framing and filing proceedings and pleadings, of taking and obtaining evidence, of obtaining discovery, of proceeding to obtain relief, of drawing up, entering and enrolling decrees, and of proceeding before trustees appointed by the court, and generally to regulate the whole practice to be used, in suits in equity or admiralty, by the circuit and district courts." The addition, in section 917, of the words "in any manner not inconsistent with any law of the United States," not found in section 6 of the Act of 1842, is worthy of note, as bearing on the construction of that section, and of rules to be sustained under its provisions, though not implying that any power existed, under the Act of 1842, to make rules inconsistent with a law of the United States. So, too, by section 913 of the Revised Statutes it is enacted, that "The forms of mesne process, and the forms and modes of proceeding in suits of equity, and of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, in the circuit and district courts, shall be according to the principles, rules and usages which belong to courts of equity and admiralty, respectively, except when it is otherwise provided by statute or by rules of court made in pursuance there-[621] of, but the same shall be subject to alteration and addition by the said courts, respectively, and to regulation by the supreme court, by rules prescribed, from time to time, to any circuit or district court, not inconsistent with the laws of the United States." These words, "not inconsistent with the laws of the United States," are not found in the original statutory provisions from which section 913 was taken. See Providence & N. Y. S. S. Co. v. Hill Mfg. Co. 109 U. S. 578, 591-594 [Bk. 27, L. ed. 1038-1044].

In view of the decision made by this court at December Term, 1865, in the case of The Plymouth, it is not to be presumed that the six of the judges upon the bench when it was made, who were also upon the bench when the rules of May 6, 1872, were promulgated, intended that those rules should contain anything in conflict with the decision in the case of The Plymouth. Nor are those rules capable of any such construction. They are in these words:

"Supplementary Rules of Practice in Admiralty, under the Act of March 3, 1851, entitled 'An Act to Limit the Liability of Shipowners, and for Other Purposes.'

54. When any ship or vessel shall be libeled, or the owner or owners thereof shall be sued, for any embezzlement, loss or destruction by the master, officers, mariners, passengers, or any other person or persons, of any property, goods or merchandise, shipped or put on board of such ship or vessel, or for any loss, damage or injury by collision, or for any act, matter or thing, loss, damage or forfeiture done, occasioned or incurred, without the privity or knowledge of such owner or owners, and he or they shall desire to claim the benefit of limitation of liability provided for in the third and fourth sections of the said Act above recited, the said owner or owners shall and may file a libel or petition in the proper District Court of the United States, as hereinafter specified, setting forth the facts and circumstances on which such limitation of liability is claimed, and praying proper relief in that behalf; and thereupon said court, having caused due appraisement to be had of the amount or value of the interest of said owner
[622] or owners, respectively, in such ship or vessel, and her freight, for the voyage, shall make an order for the payment of the same into court, or for the giving of a stipulation, with sureties, for payment thereof into court whenever the same shall be ordered; or, if the said owner or owners shall so elect, the said court shall, without such appraisement, make an order for the transfer by him or them of his or their interest in such vessel and freight, to a trustee to be appointed by the court under the fourth section of said Act; and, upon compliance with such order, the said court shall issue a monition against all persons claiming damages for any such embezzlement, loss, destruction, damage or injury, citing them to appear before the said court and make due proof of their respective claims at or before a certain time to be named in said writ, not less than three months from the issuing of the same; and public notice of such monition shall be given as in other cases, and such further notice served through the postoffice, or otherwise, as the court, in its discretion, may direct; and the said court shall also, on the application of the said owner or owners, make an order to restrain the further prosecution of all and any suit or suits against said owner or owners in respect of any such claim or claims.

55. Proof of all claims which shall be presented in pursuance of said monition shall be made before a commissioner, to be designated by the court, subject to the right of any person interested to question or controvert the same; and, upon the completion of said proofs, the commissioner shall make report of the claims so proven, and upon confirmation of said report, after hearing any exceptions thereto, the moneys paid or secured to be paid into court as aforesaid, or the proceeds of said ship or vessel and freight (after payment of costs and expense) shall be divided pro rata amongst the several claimants, in proportion to the amount of their respective claims, duly proved and confirmed as aforesaid, saving, however, to all parties any priority to which they may be legally entitled.

56. In the proceedings aforesaid, the said owner or owners shall be at liberty to contest his or their liability, or the liability of said ship [623] or vessel for said embezzlement, loss, destruction, damage or injury (independently of the limitation of liability claimed under said Act), provided that, in his or their libel or petition, he or they shall state the facts and circumstances by reason of which exemption from liability is claimed; and any person or persons claiming damages as aforesaid, and who shall have presented his or their claim to the commissioner under oath, shall and may answer such libel or petition, and contest the right of the owner or owners of said ship or vessel, either to an exemption from liability, or to a limitation of liability under the said Act of Congress, or both.

57. The said libel or petition shall be filed and the said proceedings had in any District Court of the United States in which said ship or vessel may be libeled to answer for any such embezzlement, loss, destruction, damage or injury; or, if the said ship or vessel be not libeled, then in the district court for any district in which the said owner or owners may be sued in that behalf. If the ship have already been libeled and sold, the proceeds shall represent the same for the purposes of these rules."

There is nothing in any of these rules which purports to enlarge the jurisdiction of the District Courts of the United States as to subject matter. On the contrary, they exclude any such construction, and leave that jurisdiction in admiralty within the bounds set for it by the Constitution and statutes and the judicial decisions under them. Rule 54 provides that when a vessel is libeled, or her owner is sued, he may file a libel or petition for a limitation of liability "in the proper District Court of the United States, as hereinafter specified." Rule 56 provides that in the proceeding the owner may contest his liability or that of the vessel, independently of the limitation of liability claimed, and that the opposing party may contest the right of the owner either to an exemption from liability or to a limitation of liability. What is the "proper district court" referred to in Rule 54 and contemplated by Rule 56? It is the court, and only the court, mentioned in Rule 57; namely, the district court in which the vessel is libeled; or, if she is not libeled, then the 324] district court for any district in which the owner "may be sued in that behalf." There is nothing in these rules which sanctions the taking of jurisdiction by a district court on a petition under the rules, where that court could not have had original cognizance in admiralty of a suit in rem or in personam to recover for the loss or damage involved.

Nor do we find anything in any of the decisions of this court on the subject of the limitation of liability, which supports the view that a district court can take jurisdiction in admiralty of a petition for a limitation of liability where it would not have had cognizance in admiralty originally of the cause of action involved. In Norwich Co. v. Wright, 13 Wall. 104 [80 U. S. bk. 20, L. ed. 585], the case which furnished the occasion for the making of the rules, and which came before this court again in The City of Norwich, 118 U. S. 468 [ante, 134], the damage was occasioned by a collision on navigable water between two vessels, and a fire resulting from it on board of one of them. In all the other cases in which this court has upheld proceedings for limitation in a district court, there was original admiralty jurisdiction of the cause of action. In The Benefactor, 103 U. S. 239 [Bk. 26, L. ed. 351], the cause of damage was a collision on the high seas, and the petition for limitation was filed in the same district court in which the offending vessel was libeled. In The Scotland, 105 U. S. 25 [Bk. 26, L. ed. 1001], and 118 U. S. 507 [ante, 153], there was a like cause of action, and the limitation was claimed by an answer to a libel in personam in a district court. In Ex parte Slayton, 105 U. S. 451 [Bk. 26, L. ed. 1066], the petition for limitation was filed in a district court, by the owner of a vessel which had foundered, to limit his liability for the loss of goods carried, and for damage to another vessel by a prior collision, he not having been first sued. He transferred to a trustee, appointed by the court, his interest in the vessel and in the freight pending. See The Alpena, 10 Biss. 486. This court, being applied to for a writ of prohibition, refused to grant it. It held that the owner of a vessel may, before he is sued, institute appropriate proceedings in a court of competent jurisdiction, to obtain a limitation of liability; that the words "any court," in section 4284, mean, "any court of competent jurisdiction;" and that, as the transfer had been made and the freight 325] money paid over to the trustee, the district court had jurisdiction to apportion the fund. But it is to be noted that the causes of action were in fact of admiralty jurisdiction. In Providence & N. Y. S. S. Co. v. Hill Mfg. Co. [supra], the cause of action was a loss, by the burning of a vessel, of goods carried by her; and the petition for limitation was filed in the district court of the district where the fire occurred and where the remnants of the vessel remained, and the contract of affreightment was of admiralty cognizance. In The Great Western, 118 U. S. 520 [ante, 156], the cause of damage was a collision on the high seas, and the claim to limitation was made in the answer in a suit in personam in a district court in admiralty to recover for the damage.

We are brought, therefore, to the conclusion that there is nothing in the Admiralty Rules prescribed by this court which warrants the jurisdiction of the district court in the present case.

Our decision against the jurisdiction of the district court is made, without deciding whether or not the statutory limitation of liability extends to the damages sustained by the fire in question, so as to be enforcible in an appropriate court of competent jurisdiction. The decision of that question is unnecessary for the disposition of this case.

It is contended that the mistake of the district court must be corrected by appeal, and that the case is not one for a writ of prohibition. Where the case is within admiralty cognizance, the district court may decide whether the party is entitled to the benefit of the statute, and a writ of prohibition will not lie. But where, as here, the tort is not a maritime tort, there can be no jurisdiction in the admiralty to determine the issue of liability or that of limitation of liability. This court refused a writ of prohibition where a suit in rem was brought against a vessel, in admiralty, in a district court, to enforce an alleged lien for wharfage on the ground that a contract for the use of a wharf by a vessel was a maritime contract, and cognizable in the admiralty, and that, as a lien arose in certain cases, the admiralty court was competent to decide in the given case whether there was a lien. Ex parte Easton, 95 U. S. 68 [Bk. 24, L. ed. 373]. So, also, a writ of [626] prohibition was refused where a suit in admiralty was brought, in a district court, to recover damages for the loss of life by a collision between two vessels, on the ground that damages from collision were within admiralty jurisdiction, and the admiralty court could, therefore, lawfully decide whether such damages embraced damages for the loss of life. Ex parte Gordon, 104 U. S. 515 [Bk. 26, L. ed. 814]. But in the present case the district court is called upon by the petition of the owner of the vessel to first determine the question of any liability, when it has no jurisdiction of the cause of action, and then to determine whether the statute covers the case.

The case is clearly one for a writ of prohibition, as the want of jurisdiction appears on the face of the proceedings. U. S. v. Peters, 3 Dall. 121 [3 U. S. bk. 1, L. ed. 535].

A writ of prohibition will issue.

[682] KANSAS CITY, LAWRENCE & SOUTH KANSAS RAILROAD COMPANY, Appt.

v.

BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER, ATTORNEY-GENERAL of the UNITED STATES, For and On Behalf of the UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 682-695.)

Public lands—grants for railroad purposes—construction of statutes—point of junction—action of the officers of the Land Department—how far conclusive.

*1. The Acts of Congress of March 3, 1863, July 1 1864, and July 26, 1866, granting lands to the State of Kansas for railroad purposes, are to be construed in pari materia, and as having the one purpose of building a single road from Fort Riley, down the Neosho Valley, to the southern line of that State; and not as distinct grants for different roads, which may come in conflict in the claims under them in regard to the lands granted.

2. The junction of this road with the one from Leavenworth by way of Lawrence in the direction of Galveston Bay, as provided in the Act of 1863, was not required to be on the very crest of the Neosho Valley, as reached by the latter road, but at a convenient point for such crossing in the narrow valley of the Neosho River; and as this point has been adopted by the companies building both roads, and accepted by the officers of the land department in selecting indemnity lands, there is no sufficient reason to be found in the point of junction to vacate the certification of these lands to the State for the company which has built the road and received the patents of the State.

3. Nor is there any other sufficient reason found in the record in this case for setting aside the evidences of title to these lands issued to the corporation which built the road within the time required by law, to the approval of the officers of the Government, whose primary duty it was to certify these lands, and who did so within the scope of their powers.

Argued Oct. 18, 19, 1886. Decided Nov. 8, 1886.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Kansas. Reversed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. A. T. Britton, John F. Dillon, Geo. W. McCrary, James Hagerman and A. B. Browne, for appellant.

Messrs. Wm. Lawrence, E. M. Watson and A. H. Garland, Atty-Gen., for appellee.

[685] Mr. Justice Miller delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from the Circuit Court of the District of Kansas. The suit is brought by [686] B. H. Brewster, Attorney-General of the United States, for and on behalf of the United States. The object of it is to set aside certain instruments in writing, which, if they are valid, are supposed to convey title from the United States for a considerable quantity of land in southeastern Kansas.

An Act of Congress, approved July 26, 1866, granted to the State of Kansas "Every alternate section of land or parts thereof designated by odd numbers to the extent of five alternate sections per mile on each side of the road, and not exceeding in all ten sections per mile: * * *

*Head notes by Mr. Justice MILLER.

for the purpose of aiding the Union Pacific Railroad Company, Southern Branch, the same being a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Kansas, to construct and operate a railroad from Fort Riley, Kansas, or near that military reservation, thence down the valley of the Neosho River to the southern line of the State of Kansas, with a view to an extension of the same through a portion of the Indian Territory to Fort Smith, Arkansas."

There is the usual clause in this grant providing that if "it shall appear that the United States have, when the line of said road is definitely located, sold any section or any part thereof, granted as aforesaid, or that the right of preemption or homestead settlement has attached to the same, or that the same has been reserved by the United States for any purpose whatever, then it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to cause to be selected for the purposes aforesaid, from the public lands of the United States nearest to the sections above specified, so much land as shall be equal to the amount of such lands as the United States have sold, reserved, or otherwise appropriated, or to which the right of homestead settlement or preemption has attached as aforesaid, which lands, thus indicated by the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, shall be reserved and held for the State of Kansas for the use of said company by the said Secretary for the purpose of the construction and operation of said railroad, as provided by this Act."

This railroad company, for whose benefit the grant was made to the State of Kansas, afterwards changed its name, by a valid procedure, into that of the Missouri, Kansas and Texas [687] Railroad Company. Under this latter name it built the road contemplated by this grant, which was completed in due time, and asserted a claim before the Commissioner of the General Land-Office for the lands now in question as indemnity for others lost by the previous sale, appropriation, or other disposition of them under the clause above cited in the Act of 1866. These lands were, on that demand, certified to the State of Kansas, and by the State patented to the railroad company. The Missouri, Kansas and Texas Railroad Company afterwards, for a valuable consideration, conveyed them to the appellant in the present case, the Kansas City, Lawrence and Southern Kansas Railroad Company.

The object of this suit is to vacate and declare void the certification of the lands by the Secretary of the Interior to the State of Kansas, as well as the patents issued by that State to the railroad company. There is no allegation of fraud, accident, or mistake, except as the alleged want of authority or power in the officers of the United States to certify these lands to that State may be a mistake in law. Unquestionably, if there was no such power, the government has a right by this proceeding to have those instruments declared void and set aside as a cloud upon its title. The authority of the Commissioner of the General Land-Office and the Secretary of the Interior to make this certification of the lands to that State for the benefit of this company depends upon the true construction of this Act of 1866, and of certain other statutes on the same subject.

Since the railroad company has constructed from where this last named road crosses the Neosho River, down the valley of that river to the point where the said first-named road enters the said Neosho Valley. This branch down the Neosho Valley is the road now under consideration, and the grant of lands of 1863 is to the point on its line where the first-named road, the Leavenworth, Lawrence & Fort Gibson, enters the said Neosho Valley.

It is said that the road of the M. K. & T. R. R. Co., which we have already held to represent the grant of Congress under this statute, was not constructed to the point where the L. L. & F. G. R. R. entered the Neosho Valley, but that those two roads joined at a point far within the entrance of the L. L. & F. G. R. R. into the valley. The distance is said to be about eight or ten miles, and this is supposed to defeat the right of the company building this road to the lands on each side of it. But we are of opinion that this is too narrow a construction of the language describing the point [694] at which the two roads mentioned in the same statute were expected to meet and cross each other. The construction thus asserted requires that the exact point of the high ground on the north of the Neosho River should be ascertained with great precision where the railroad of the other company, coming from the north, enters the valley. It seems to us, however, that the purpose of Congress was to make a grant of lands along the Neosho Valley to the company which should build it to the most appropriate point, wherever that might be, in this narrow valley at which the two roads might chance to come together; and that, as the road has been built and the lands earned, and the officers of the Federal Government having charge of the matter have accepted this place of junction as the proper one to govern the selection of lands for the company building the road, and since neither of those roads make any objection to this decision, and it is impossible to see how any substantial right of any person can be injured by it, it is the duty of the court to accept the location of the road as a proper location, in accordance with the action of the officers of the Land Department; and that it is not a case for the Government of the United States to interfere to set aside its own action in the matter, under the loose terms employed in the Acts of Congress.

In support of this view of the subject it must appear to any thinking mind, that the grant of lands to the M. K. & T. R. R. Co. would not be defeated if the other road from the north did not build into the valley of the Neosho River at all; and yet, if the strict and literal construction of the phrase, "where that road enters the valley," should be adopted, that would be the effect upon the grant. The purpose of Congress being to have these roads cross within the narrow valley of the Neosho River, and the grant of lands to the M. K. & T. R. R. Co. terminate at the point where it came to a junction with the L. L. & F. G. R. R., the latter being continued on to the south, we do not think this objection sufficient to justify a decree setting aside the action of the officers of the government.

It is to be observed that this objection is raised under the language of the Act of 1863, and that the Act of 1866 contains no such requirement as that with reference to the crossing of [695] the roads, it being declared in the latter Act that the road is to be built down the valley of the Neosho River to the southern line of the State. Of course, if the Act of 1866 is, as we suppose, supplementary to the Acts of 1863 and 1864, the description of the route of the road and its terminus in the later Act is the one which must govern the grant of lands.

Another objection urged to the ownership of the lands by this Company under the patents from the State of Kansas is, that the Company has received more lands than it was entitled to under the grant. We do not think it necessary to enter into the details of the evidence of how much land was granted, how much was found in place, and how much the road was entitled to as indemnity for lands not so found in place. In the first place, we are not at all satisfied by the evidence in the record that the lands received are in excess of the various grants to this Company. In the next place, the issue is not made fairly in the bill; and certainly no particular certificate, nor any particular patent from the State of Kansas is pointed out as being the one which contains the excess over the grant; and it is not possible for the court, under any evidence or any pleading, to ascertain which of these certificates and of these patents, or what particular portions of them, should be held void and what valid. U. S. v. B. & M. R. R. Co. 98 U. S. 334 [Bk. 25, L. ed. 198].

And, lastly, while we are not disposed to hold the action of the officers of the Land Department of the Government as absolutely conclusive upon such a subject as this, we see no reason why their deliberate action, with careful attention and all the means of ascertaining what was right, should be set aside in this case. There are other grounds urged for granting the relief sought by the bill, but they are not sufficient to justify such a decree, nor are they important enough to require further discussion here.

The decree of the Circuit Court is reversed, and the case remanded to it, with directions to dismiss the bill.

[633] Mr Justice Miller delivered the opinion of the court:

The opinion of the court in this case accompanying its judgment, was delivered very near the close of the last term; and for that reason, among others, a special leave was granted the appellees to file a petition for rehearing at the beginning of the present term.

We have very carefully examined this petition, and while on one of the main points in the case; namely, the statutory authority of the Indianapolis & St. Louis Railroad Company, under the laws of Indiana, to make the lease which was the foundation of the suit, there are some other statutes and some other decisions of the State and the state court cited, we do not [634] think they invalidate the ground on which the decision of this court at the last term rested.

It was said in that opinion that there was no decisive or conclusive expression of opinion on that subject by the Supreme Court of Indiana, and that this court was therefore compelled to exercise its own judgment and to follow it in deciding the case. We are not able to see in the cases cited for the first time in this petition anything which modifies this proposition.

The same may be said of the statutes specially relied on in the petition. There is, in our opinion, no authority found in them for the lease by the defendant company of the entire road, property, franchise, powers and control of the plaintiff's road for ninety-nine years.

The judgment of the plaintiff against the Indianapolis and St. Louis Company remains unaffected by the decision of this court, because there was no appeal by the latter Company, and we see no reason to change our views on the other questions involved in the case.

The petition is therefore overruled.

The case is stated by the court.

Messrs. Parley L. Williams, James N. Kimball and Abbot R. Heywood, for appellant.

Mr. C. W. Bennett, for appellees.

Mr. Justice Bradley delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from the Supreme Court of Utah. The action was brought in the District Court for Weber County, to recover the value of two steam engines and boilers, and a portable saw mill connected with each engine. A jury being waived, the court found the facts and rendered judgment for the plaintiff, Russell & Co. The plaintiff is an Ohio corporation, and by its agent in Idaho, on the 2d of October, 1882, agreed with a partnership firm by the name of Phelan & Ferguson, residents of Idaho, to sell to them the said engines, boilers and saw mills for the price of $4,988, nearly all of which was secured by certain promissory notes, which severally contained the terms of the agreement between the parties. One of the notes (the others being in the same form) was as follows, to wit:

"SALT LAKE CITY, Oct. 2, 1882.

"On or before the first day of May, 1883, for [664] value received in one sixteen-horse portable engine, No. 1,026, and one portable sawmill, No. 128, all complete, bought of L. B. Mattison, agent of Russell & Co., we, or either of us, promise to pay to the order of Russell & Co., Massillon, Ohio, $300, payable at Wells, Fargo & Co.'s bank, Salt Lake City, Utah Territory, with 10 per cent interest per annum from October 1, 1882, until paid, and reasonable attorney's fees, or any costs that may be paid or incurred in any action or proceeding instituted for the collection of this note or enforcement of this covenant. The express condition of this transaction is such that the title, ownership or possession of said engine and sawmill does not pass from the said Russell & Co., until this [665] note and interest shall have been paid in full, and the said Russell & Co. or his agent, has full power to declare this note due and take possession of said engine and sawmill when they may deem themselves insecure, even before the maturity of this note; and it is further agreed by the makers hereof, that if said note is not paid at maturity, that the interest shall be 2 per cent per month from maturity hereof till paid, both before and after judgment, if any should be rendered. In case said sawmill and engine shall be taken back, Russell & Co. may sell the same at public or private sale without notice, or they may without sale indorse the true value of the property on this note, and we agree to pay on the note any balance due thereon after such indorsement, as damages and rental for said machinery. As to this debt we waive the right to exempt or claim as exempt any property, real or personal, we now own, or may hereafter acquire, by virtue of any homestead or exemption law, state or federal, now in force, or that hereafter may be enacted.

"P. O., Oxford, Oneida County, Idaho Territory.

"$300." "PHELAN & FERGUSON."

Some of the notes were given for the price of one of the engines with its accompanying boiler and mill, and the others for the price of the other. Some of the notes were paid; and the present suit was brought on those that were not paid. The property was delivered to Phelan & Ferguson, on the execution of the notes, and subsequently they sold it to the defendant Harkness, in part payment of a debt due from them to him and one Langsdorf. The defendant, at the time of the sale to him, knew that the purchase price of the property had not been paid to the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff claimed title thereto until such payment was made. The unpaid notes given for each engine and mill exceeded in amount the value of such engine and mill when the action was commenced.

The Territory of Idaho has a law relating to chattel mortgages, requiring that every such mortgage shall set out certain particulars as to parties, time, amount, etc., with an affidavit attached, that it is bona fide, and made without [666] any design to defraud and delay creditors; and requiring the mortgage and affidavit to be recorded in the county where the mortgagor lives, and in that where the property is located; and it is declared that no chattel mortgage shall be valid (except as between the parties thereto) without compliance with these requisites, unless the mortgagee shall have actual possession of the property mortgaged. In the present case no affidavit was attached to the notes, nor were they recorded.

The court found that it was the intention of Phelan & Ferguson, and of Russell & Co., that the title to the said property should not pass from Russell & Co. until all the notes were paid.

Upon these facts the court found, as conclusions of law, that the transaction between Phelan & Ferguson and Russell & Co. was a conditional, or executory sale, and not an absolute sale with a lien reserved, and that the title did not pass to Phelan & Ferguson, or from them to the defendant; and gave judgment for the plaintiff. The Supreme Court of the Territory affirmed this judgment.

The first question to be considered is, whether the transaction in question was a conditional sale or a mortgage; that is, whether it was a mere agreement to sell upon a condition to be performed, or an absolute sale, with a reservation of a lien or mortgage to secure the purchase money. If it was the latter, it is conceded that the lien or mortgage was void as against third persons, because not verified by affidavit and not recorded as required by the law of Idaho. But so far as words and the express intent of the parties can go, it is perfectly evident that it was not an absolute sale, but only an [667 agreement to sell upon condition that the purchasers should pay their notes at maturity. The language is: "The express condition of this transaction is such that the title * * * does not pass * * * until this note and interest shall have been paid in full." If the vendees should fail in this, or if the vendors should deem themselves insecure before the maturity of the notes, the latter were authorized to repossess themselves of the machinery, and credit the then value of it, or the proceeds of it if they should sell it, upon the unpaid notes. If this did not pay the notes, the balance was still to be paid by the makers by way of "damages and rental for said machinery." This stipulation was strictly in accordance with the rule of damages in such cases. Upon an agreement to sell, if the purchaser fails to execute his contract, the true measure of damages for its breach is the difference between the price of the goods agreed on and their value at the time of the breach or trial, which may fairly be stipulated to be the price they bring on a resale. It cannot be said, therefore, that the stipulations of the contract were inconsistent with, or repugnant to, what the parties declared their intention to be; namely, to make an executory and conditional contract of sale. Such contracts are well known in the law and often recognized; and when free from any fraudulent intent are not repugnant to any principle of justice or equity, even though possession of the property be given to the proposed purchaser. The rule is formulated in the text books and in many adjudged cases. In Lord Blackburn's Treatise on the Contract of Sale, published forty years ago, two rules are laid down as established: 1. That where, by the agreement the vendor is to do anything to the goods before delivery, it is a condition precedent to the vesting of the property. 2. That where anything remains to be done to the goods for ascertaining the price, such as weighing, testing, etc., this is a condition precedent to the transfer of the property. Blackburn, Sales, 152. And it is subsequently added that "the parties may indicate an intention, by their agreement, to make any condition precedent to the vesting of the property, and, if they do so, their intention is fulfilled." Blackburn, Sales, 167. Mr. Benjamin, in his Treatise on Sales of Personal [668] Property, adds to the two formulated rules of Lord Blackburn, a third rule, which is supported by many authorities, to wit: 3. "Where the buyer is by the contract bound to do anything as a condition, either precedent or concurrent, on which the passing of the property depends, the property will not pass until the condition be fulfilled, even though the goods may have been actually delivered into the possession of the buyer." Benj. Sales, 2d ed. p. 286; 3d ed. § 320. The author cites for this proposition Bishop v. Shillito, 2 B. & Ald. 329, note a; Brandt v Bowlby, 2 Barn. & Ad. 932; Barrow v. Coles (Lord Ellenborough), 3 Camp. 92; Swain v. Shepherd (Baron Parke), 1 Mood. & Rob. 223; Mires v. Solebay, 2 Mod. 243. In the last case, decided in the time of Charles II., one Alston took sheep to pasture for a certain time, with an agreement that if at the end of that time he should pay the owner a certain sum, he should have the sheep. Before the time expired the owner sold them to another person; and it was held that the sale was valid, and that the agreement to sell the sheep to Alston, if he would pay for them at a certain day, did not amount to a sale, but only to an agreement. The other cases were instances of sales of goods to be paid for in cash or securities on delivery. It was held that the sales were conditional only, and that the vendors were entitled to retake the goods, even after delivery, if the condition was not performed, the delivery being considered as conditional. This often happens in cases of sales by auction, when certain terms of payment are prescribed, with a condition that if they are not complied with, the goods may be resold for account of the buyer, who is to account for any deficiency between the second sale and the first. Such was the case of Lamond v. Davall, 9 Q. B. 1030, and many more cases could be cited. In Crawcour v. Robertson, L. R. 9 Ch. Div. 419, certain furniture dealers let Robertson have a lot of furniture upon his paying £10 in cash and signing an agreement to pay £5 per month (for which notes were given) until the whole price of the furniture should be paid, and when all the installments were paid, and not before, the furniture was to be the property of Robertson; but [669] if he failed to pay any of the installments, the owners were authorized to take possession of the property, and all prior payments actually made were to be forfeited. The court of appeals held that the property did not pass by this agreement, and could not be taken as Robertson's property by his trustee under a liquidation proceeding. The same conclusion was reached in the subsequent case of Crawcour v. Salter, L. R. 18 Ch. Div. 30. In these cases, it is true, support of the transaction was sought from a custom which prevails in the places where the transactions took place, of hotel keepers holding their furniture on hire. But they show that the intent of the parties will be recognized and sanctioned where it is not contrary to the policy of the law. This policy, in England, is declared by statute. It has long been a provision of the English bankrupt laws, beginning with 21 James I., chap. 19, that if any person becoming bankrupt has in his possession, order, or disposition, by consent of the owner, any goods or chattels of which he is the reputed owner, or takes upon himself the sale, alteration, or disposition thereof as owner, such goods are to be sold for the benefit of his creditors. This law has had the effect of preventing or defeating conditional sales accompanied by voluntary delivery of possession, except in cases like those before referred to, so that very few decisions are to be found in the English books directly in point on the question under consideration. The following case presents a fair illustration of the English law as based upon the statutes of bankruptcy. In Horn v. Baker, 9 East, 215, the owner of a term in a distillery, and of the apparatus and utensils employed therein, demised the same to J. & S. in consideration of an annuity to be paid to the owner and his wife during their several lives, and upon their death the lessees to have the liberty of purchasing the residue of the term and the apparatus and utensils; with a proviso for re-entry if the annuity should at any time be two months in arrear. The annuity having become in arrear for that period, instead of making entry for condition broken, the wife and administrator of the owner brought suit to recover the arrears, which was stopped by the bankruptcy of J. & S. The question then arose whether the utensils passed to the assignees of J. & S. under the Bankrupt Act, as being [670] in their possession, order and disposition, as reputed owners; and the court held that they did; but that if there had been a usage in the trade of letting utensils with a distillery, the case would have admitted a different consideration, since such a custom might have rebutted the presumption of ownership arising from the possession and apparent order and disposition of the goods. This case was followed in Holroyd v. Gwynne, 2 Taunt. 176.

This presumption of property in a bankrupt arising from his possession and reputed ownership became so deeply imbedded in the English law that in process of time many persons in the profession, not adverting to its origin in the statute of bankruptcy, were led to regard it as a doctrine of the common law; and, hence, in some States in this country, where no such statute exists, the principles of the statute have been followed, and conditional sales of the kind now under consideration have been condemned, either as being fraudulent and void as against creditors, or as amounting, in effect, to absolute sales with a reserved lien or mortgage to secure the payment of the purchase money. This view is based on the notion that such sales are not allowed by law, and that the intent of the parties, however honestly formed, cannot legally be carried out. The insufficiency of this argument is demonstrated by the fact that conditional sales are admissible in several acknowledged cases, and, therefore, there cannot be any rule of law against them as such. They may sometimes be used as a cover for fraud; and when this is charged, all the circumstances of the case, this included, will be open for the consideration of a jury. Where no fraud is intended, but the honest purpose of the parties is that the vendee shall not have the ownership of the goods until he has paid for them, there is no general principle of law to prevent their purpose from having effect.

In this country, in States where no such statute as the English Act referred to is in force, many decisions have been rendered sustaining conditional sales accompanied by delivery of possession, both as between the parties themselves and as to third persons.

[671] In Hussey v. Thornton, 4 Mass. 405, decided in 1808, where goods were delivered on board of a vessel for the vendee upon an agreement for a sale, subject to the condition that the goods should remain the property of the vendors until they received security for payment, it was held, Chief Justice Parsons delivering the opinion, that the property did not pass, and that the goods could not be attached by the creditors of the vendee. This case was followed in 1822 by that of Marston v. Baldwin, 17 Mass. 606, which was replevin against a sheriff for taking goods which the plaintiff had agreed to sell to one Holt, the defendant in the attachment; but by the agreement the property was not to vest in Holt until he should pay $100 (part of the price), which condition was not performed, though the goods were delivered. Holt had paid $75, which the plaintiff did not tender back. The court held that it was sufficient for the plaintiff to be ready to repay the money when he should be requested, and a verdict for the plaintiff was sustained. In Barrett v. Pritchard, 2 Pick. 512, the court said: "It is impossible to raise a doubt as to the intention of the parties, for it is expressly stipulated that 'the wool before manufactured, after being manufactured, or in any stage of manufacturing, shall be the property of the plaintiff until the price be paid.' It is difficult to imagine any good reason why this agreement should not bind the parties. * * * The case from Taunton, Holroyd v. Gwynne, was a case of a conditional sale; but the condition was void as against the policy of the Statute 21 Jac. 1, chap. 19, § 11. It would not have changed the decision in that case if there had been no sale; for, by that statute, if the true owner of goods and chattels suffers another to exercise such control and management over them as to give him the appearance of being the real owner, and he becomes bankrupt, the goods and chattels shall be treated as his property, and shall be assigned by the commissioners for the benefit of his creditors. The case of Horn v. Baker [supra] also turned on the same point, and nothing in either of these cases has any bearing on the present question."

In Coggill v. Hartford & N. H. R. R. Co. 3 Gray, 545, the rights of a bona fide purchaser from one in possession under a conditional sale of goods were specifically discussed; and the court held, in an able opinion delivered by Mr. [672] Justice Bigelow, that a sale and delivery of goods on condition that the title shall not vest in the vendee until payment of the price, passes no title until the condition is performed; and the vendor, if guilty of no laches, may reclaim the property, even from one who has purchased from his vendee in good faith and without notice. The learned justice commenced his opinion in the following terms: "It has long been the settled rule of law in this Commonwealth that a sale and delivery of goods, on condition that the property is not to vest until the purchase money is paid or secured, does not pass the title to the vendee; and that the vendor, in case the condition is not fulfilled, has a right to repossess himself of the goods, both against the vendee and against his creditors claiming to hold them under attachments." He then addresses himself to a consideration of the rights of a bona fide purchaser from the vendee, purchasing without notice of the condition on which the latter holds the goods in his possession; and he concludes that they are no greater than those of a creditor. He says: "All the cases turn on the principle that the compliance with the conditions of sale and delivery is, by the terms of the contract, precedent to the transfer of the property from the vendor to the vendee. The vendee in such cases acquires no property in the goods. He is only a bailee for a specific purpose. The delivery which in ordinary cases passes the title to the vendee must take effect according to the agreement of the parties, and can operate to vest the property only when the contingency contemplated by the contract arises. The vendee, therefore, in such cases, having no title to the property, can pass none to others. He has only a bare right of possession, and those who claim under him, either as creditors or purchasers, can acquire no higher or better title. Such is the necessary result of carrying into effect the intention of the parties to a conditional sale and delivery. Any other rule would be equivalent to the denial of the validity of such contracts. But they certainly violate no rule of law, nor are they contrary to sound policy."

This case was followed in Sargent v. Metcalf, 5 Gray, 306; Deshon v. Bigelow, 8 Gray, 159; [673] Whitney v. Eaton, 15 Gray, 225; Hirschorn v. Canney, 98 Mass. 149; and Chase v. Ingalls, 122 Mass. 381, and is believed to express the settled law of Massachusetts.

The same doctrine prevails in Connecticut, and was sustained in an able and learned opinion of Chief Justice Williams, in the case of Forbes v. Marsh, 15 Conn. 384, decided in 1843, in which the principal authorities are reviewed. The decision in this case was followed in the subsequent case of Hart v. Carpenter, 24 Conn. 427, where the question arose upon the claim of a bona fide purchaser.

In New York the law is the same, at least so far as relates to the vendee in a conditional sale, and to his creditors; though there has been some diversity of opinion in its application to bona fide purchasers from such vendee. As early as 1822, in the case of Haggerty v. Palmer, 6 Johns. Ch. 437, where an auctioneer had delivered to the purchaser goods sold at auction, it being one of the conditions of sale that indorsed notes should be given in payment, which the purchaser failed to give, Chancellor Kent held that it was a conditional sale and delivery, and gave no title which the vendee could transfer to an assignee for the benefit of creditors; and he said that the cases under the English Bankrupt Act did not apply here. The chancellor remarked, however, that "If the goods had been fairly sold by P. (the conditional vendee), or if the proceeds had been actually appropriated by the assignees, before notice of this suit and of the injunction, the remedy would have been gone." In Strong v. Taylor, 2 Hill, 326, Nelson, Ch. J., pronouncing the opinion, it was held to be a conditional sale where the agreement was to sell a canal boat for a certain sum to be paid in freighting flour and wheat, as directed by the vendor, he to have half the freight until paid in full with interest. Before the money was all paid the boat was seized under an execution against the vendee; and, in a suit by the vendor against the sheriff, a verdict was found for the plaintiff, under the instruction of the court, and was sustained in banc, upon the authority of the Massachusetts case of Barrett v. Pritchard, [supra]. In Herring v. Hoppock, 15 N. Y. 409, the same doctrine was followed. In that case there was an agreement in writing for the sale of an iron safe, which was delivered to the vendee and a note at six months given therefor; but it was expressly understood that no title was to pass until the note was paid; and if not paid, Herring, the vendor, was authorized to retake the safe and collect all reasonable charges for its use. The sheriff levied on the safe as the property of the vendee, with notice of the plaintiff's claim. The court of appeals held that the title did not pass out of Herring. Paige, J., said: "Whenever there is a condition precedent attached to a contract of sale, which is not waived by an absolute and unconditional delivery, no title passes to the vendee until he performs the condition, or the seller waives it." Comstock, J., said that if the question were new, it might be more in accordance with the analogies of the law to regard the writing given on the sale as a mere security for the debt in the nature of a personal mortgage; but he considered the law as having been settled by the previous cases, and the court unanimously concurred in the decision.

In the cases of Smith v. Lynes, 5 N. Y. 41, and Wait v. Green, 35 Barb. 535; S. C. 36 N. Y. 556, it was held that a bona fide purchaser, without notice, from a vendee who is in possession under a conditional sale, will be protected as against the original vendor. These cases were reviewed and, we think, substantially overruled in the subsequent case of Ballard v. Burgett, 40 N. Y. 314, in which separate elaborate opinions were delivered by Judges Grover and Lott. This decision was concurred in by Chief Judge Hunt and Judges Woodruff, Mason and Daniels, Judges James and Murray dissenting. In that case Ballard agreed to sell to one France a yoke of oxen for a price agreed on, but the contract had the condition "that the oxen were to remain the property of Ballard until they should be paid for." The oxen were delivered to France, and he subsequently sold them to the defendant Burgett, who purchased and received them without notice that the plaintiff had any claim to them. The court sustained Ballard's claim; and subsequent cases in New York are in harmony with this decision. See Cole v. Mann, 62 N. Y. 1; Bean v. Edge, 84 N. Y. 510.

We do not perceive that the case of Dows v. Kidder, 84 N. Y. 121, is adverse to the ruling in Ballard v. Burgett. There, although the plaintiffs stipulated that the title to the corn should not pass until payment of the price (which was to be cash, the same day), yet they indorsed and delivered to the purchaser the evidence of title; namely, the weigher's return, to enable him to take out the bill of lading in his own name, and use it in raising funds to pay the plaintiff. The purchaser misappropriated the funds, and did not pay for the corn. Here the intent of both parties was that the purchaser might dispose of the corn, and he was merely the trustee of the plaintiff, invested by him with the legal title. Of course the innocent party who purchased the corn from the first purchaser was not bound by the equities between him and the plaintiff.

The later case of Parker v. Baxter, 86 N. Y. 586, was precisely similar to Dows v. Kidder; and the same principle was involved in Farwell v. Importers & Traders Bank, 90 N. Y. 483, where the plaintiff delivered his own note to a broker to get it discounted, and the latter pledged it as collateral for a loan made to himself; the legal title passed, and although, as between the plaintiff and the broker, the former was the owner of the note and its proceeds, yet that was an equity which was not binding on the innocent holder.

The decisions in Maine, New Hampshire and Vermont are understood to be substantially to the same effect as those of Massachusetts and New York; though by recent statutes in Maine and Vermont, as also in Iowa, where the same ruling prevailed, it is declared in effect that no agreements that personal property bargained and delivered to another shall remain the property of the vendor, shall be valid against third persons without notice. George v. Stubbs, 26 Me. 243; Sawyer v. Fisher, 32 Me. 28; Brown v. Haynes, 52 Me. 578; Boynton v. Libby, 62 Me. 253; Rogers v. Whitehouse, 71 Me. 222; Sargent v. Gile, 8 N. H. 325; McFarland v. Farmer, 42 N. H. 386; King v. Bates, 57 N. H. 446; Hefflin v. Bell, 30 Vt. 134; Armington v. Houston, 38 Vt. 448; Fales v. Roberts, 38 Vt. 503; Duncan v. Stone, 45 Vt. 123; Moseley v. Shattuck, 43 Iowa, 540; Thorpe v. Fowler, 57 Iowa, 541.

The same view of the law has been taken in several other States. In New Jersey, in the case of Cole v. Berry, 13 Vroom, 308, it was held that a contract for the sale of a sewing machine to be delivered and paid for by installments, and to remain the property of the vendor until paid for, was a conditional sale, and gave the vendee no title until the condition was performed; and the cases are very fully discussed and distinguished.

In Pennsylvania the law is understood to be somewhat different. It is thus summarized by Judge Depue, in the opinion delivered in Cole v. Berry, where he says: "In Pennsylvania a distinction is taken between delivery under a bailment, with an option in the bailee to purchase at a named price, and a delivery under a contract of sale containing a reservation of title in the vendor until the contract price be paid; it being held that in the former instance, property does not pass, as in favor of creditors and purchasers of the bailee, but that, in the latter instance, delivery to the vendee subjects the property to execution at the suit of his creditors, and makes it transferable to bona fide purchasers. Chamberlain v. Smith, 44 Pa. 431; Rose v. Story, 1 Pa. 190; Martin v. Mathiot, 14 S. & R. 214; Haak v. Linderman, 64 Pa.

499." But, as the learned judge adds: "This distinction is discredited by the great weight of authority, which puts possession under a conditional contract of sale, and possession under a bailment on the same footing—liable to be assailed by creditors and purchasers for actual fraud, but not fraudulent per se."

In this connection see the case of Copland v. Bosquet, 4 Wash. (C. C.) 588, where Mr. Justice Washington and Judge Peters, the former delivering the opinion of the court, sustained a conditional sale and delivery against a purchaser from the vendee, who claimed to be a bona fide purchaser without notice.

In Ohio the validity of conditional sales accompanied by delivery of possession is fully sustained. The latest reported case brought to our attention is that of Call v. Seymour, 40 Ohio St. 670, which arose upon a written contract contained in several promissory notes [677] given for installments of the purchase money of a machine, and resembling very much the contract in the case now under consideration. Following the note, and as a part of the same document, is this condition: "The express conditions of the sale and purchase of the Separator and Horse-Power for which this note is given, is such that the title, ownership, or possession does not pass from the said Seymour, Sabin & Co., until this note, with interest, is paid in full. The said Seymour, Sabin & Co. have full power to declare this note due and take possession of said Separator and Horse-Power at any time they may deem this note insecure, even before the maturity of the note, and to sell the said machine at public or private sale, the proceeds to be applied upon the unpaid balance of the purchase price." The machine was seized under an attachment issued against the vendee, and the action was brought by the vendor against the constable who served the attachment. The case was fully argued, and the authorities pro and con duly considered by the court, which sustained the condition expressed in the contract and affirmed the judgment for the plaintiff. See also Sanders v. Keber, 28 Ohio St. 630.

The same law prevails in Indiana: Shireman v. Jackson, 14 Ind. 459; Dunbar v. Rawles, 28 Ind. 225; Bradshaw v. Warner, 54 Ind. 58; Hodson v. Warner, 60 Ind. 214; McGirr v. Bell, 60 Ind. 249.

The same in Michigan: Whitney v. McConnell, 29 Mich. 12; Smith v. Loso, 42 Mich. 6; Marquette Mfg. Co. v. Jeffery, 49 Mich. 288.

The same in Missouri: Ridgeway v. Kennedy, 52 Mo. 24; Wangler v. Franklin, 70 Mo. 659; Sumner v. Cottey, 71 Mo. 121.

The same in Alabama: Fairbanks v. Eureka Co. 67 Ala. 109; Sumner v. Woods, 67 Ala. 139.

The same in several other States. For a very elaborate collection of cases on the subject, see Mr. Bennett's note to Benjamin on Sales, 4th ed., section 320, pp. 329-336, and Mr. Freeman's note to Kanaga v. Taylor, 70 Am. Dec. [678] 62; 7 Ohio St. 134. It is unnecessary to quote further from the decisions; the quotations already made show the grounds and reasons of the rule.

The law has been held differently in Illinois, and very nearly in conformity with the English decisions under the operation of the Bankrupt Law. The doctrine of the Supreme Court of that State is that if a person agrees to sell to another a chattel on condition that the price shall be paid within a certain time, retaining the title in himself in the meantime, and delivers the chattel to the vendee so as to clothe him with the apparent ownership, a bona fide purchaser or an execution creditor of the latter is entitled to protection as against the claim of the original vendor. Brundage v. Camp, 21 Ill. 330; McCormick v. Hadden, 37 Ill. 370; Murch v. Wright, 46 Ill. 488; Mich. Cent. R. R. Co. v. Phillips, 60 Ill. 190; Lucas v. Campbell, 88 Ill. 447; Van Duzor v. Allen, 90 Ill. 499. Perhaps the Statute of Illinois on the subject of chattel mortgages has influenced some of these decisions. The statute declares that "No mortgage, trust deed, or other conveyance of personal property, having the effect of a mortgage or lien upon such property, is valid as against the rights and interests of any third person, unless the possession thereof be delivered to and remain with the grantee, or the instrument provide that the possession of the property may remain with the grantor, and the instrument be acknowledged and recorded." It has been supposed that this statute indicates a rule of public policy condemning secret liens and reservations of title on the part of vendors, and making void all agreements for such liens or reservations unless registered in the manner required for chattel mortgages. At all events, the doctrine above referred to has become a rule of property in Illinois, and we have felt bound to observe it as such. In the case of Hervey v. R. I. Locomotive Works, 93 U. S. 664 [Bk. 23, L. ed. 1003], where a Rhode Island company leased to certain Illinois railroad contractors a locomotive engine and tender at a certain rent, payable at stated times during the ensuing year, with an agreement that if the rent was duly paid the engine and tender should become the property of the lessees, and possession was delivered to them, this court, being satisfied that the transaction was a conditional sale, and that, by the law of Illinois, the reservation [67 of title by the lessors was void as against third persons, unless the agreement was recorded (which it was not in proper time), decided that a levy and sale of the property in Illinois, under a judgment against the lessees, were valid, and that the locomotive works could not reclaim it. Mr. Justice Davis, delivering the opinion of the court, said: "It was decided by this court in Green v. Van Buskirk, 5 Wall. 307 [72 U. S. bk. 18, L. ed. 599], and 7 Wall. 139 [74 U. S. bk. 19, L. ed. 109], that the liability of property to be sold under legal process, issuing from the courts of the State where it is situated, must be determined by the law there, rather than that of the jurisdiction where the owner lives. These decisions rest on the ground that every State has the right to regulate the transfer of property within its limits, and that whoever sends property to it impliedly submits to the regulations concerning its transfer in force there, although a different rule of transfer prevails in the jurisdiction where he resides. * * * The policy of the law in Illinois will not permit the owner of personal property to sell it, either absolutely or conditionally, and still continue in possession of it. Possession is one of the strongest evidences of title to this class of property, and cannot be rightfully separated from the title, except in the manner pointed out by the statute. The courts of Illinois say that to suffer, without notice to the world, the real ownership to be in one person, and the ostensible ownership in another, gives a false credit to the latter, and, in this way, works an injury to third persons. Accordingly, the actual owner of personal property creating an interest in another to whom it is delivered, if desirous of preserving a lien on it, must comply with the provisions of the Chattel Mortgage Act. R. S. Ill. 1874, 711, 712." The Illinois cases are then referred to by the learned justice to show the precise condition of the law of that State on the subject under consideration.

The case of Hervey v. R. I. Locomotive Works is relied on by the appellants in the present case as a decision in their favor; but this is not a correct conclusion; for it is apparent that the [650] only points decided in that case were: first, that it was to be governed by the law of Illinois, the place where the property was situated; secondly, that by the law of Illinois the agreement for continuing the title of the property in the vendors, after its delivery to the vendees, whereby the latter became the ostensible owner, was void as against third persons. This is all that was decided, and it does not aid the appellants, unless they can show that the law as held in Illinois, contrary to the great weight of authority in England and this country, is that which should govern the present case. And this we think they cannot do. We do not mean to say that the Illinois doctrine is not supported by some decisions in other States. There are such decisions; but they are few in number compared with those in which it is held that conditional sales are valid and lawful, as well against third persons as against the parties to the contract.

The appellants, however, rely with much confidence on the decision of this court in Hereford v. Davis, 102 U. S. 235 [Bk. 26, L. ed. 160], a case coming from Missouri, where the law allows and sustains conditional sales. But we do not think that this case, any more than that of Hervey v. R. I. Locomotive Works, will be found to support their views. The whole question in Hereford v. Davis, was as to the construction of the contract. This was in the form of a lease; but it contained provisions so irreconcilable with the idea of its being really a lease, and so demonstrable that it was an absolute sale with a reservation of a mortgage lien, that the latter interpretation was given to it by the court. This interpretation rendered it obnoxious to the Statute of Missouri requiring mortgages of personal property to be recorded, in order to be valid as against third persons. It was conceded by the court, in the opinion delivered by Mr. Justice Strong, that if the agreement had really amounted to a lease, with an agreement for a conditional sale, the claim of the vendors would have been valid. The first two or three sentences of the opinion furnish a key to the whole effect of the decision. Mr. Justice Strong says: "The correct determination of this case depends altogether upon the construction that must be given to the contract between the Jackson & Sharp Company and the railroad company, against which the defendants below recovered their judgment and obtained their execution. If that contract was [651] a mere lease of the cars to the railroad company, or if it was only a conditional sale, which did not pass the ownership until the condition should be performed, the property was not subject to levy and sale under execution at the suit of the defendant against the company. But if, on the other hand, the title passed by the contract, and what was reserved by the Jackson & Sharp Company was a lien or security for the payment of the price, or what is called sometimes a mortgage back to the vendors, the cars were subject to levy and sale as the property of the railroad company."

The whole residue of the opinion is occupied with the discussion of the true construction of the contract; and, as we have stated, the conclusion was reached that it was not really a lease nor a conditional sale, but an absolute sale with the reservation of a lien or security for the payment of the price. This ended the case; for, thus interpreted, the instrument inured as a mortgage in favor of the vendors, and ought to have been recorded in order to protect them against third persons.

But whatever the law may be with regard to a bona fide purchaser from the vendee in a conditional sale, there is a circumstance in the present case which makes it clear of all difficulty. The appellant in the present case was not a bona fide purchaser without notice. The court below finds that at the time of and prior to the sale he knew the purchase price of the property had not been paid, and that Russell & Company claimed title thereto until such payment was made. Under such circumstances, it is almost the unanimous opinion of all the courts that he cannot hold the property as against the true owners. But as the rulings of this court have been, as we think, somewhat misunderstood, we have thought it proper to examine the subject with some care, and to state what we regard as the general rule of law, where it is not affected by local statutes or local decisions to the contrary.

It is only necessary to add that there is nothing either in the statute or adjudged law of Idaho to prevent, in this case, the operation of the general rule, which we consider to be established by overwhelming authority; namely, that, in the absence of fraud, an agreement for a conditional sale is good and valid, as well against third persons as against the parties to the transaction; and the further rule, that a bailee of personal property cannot convey the title, or subject it to execution for his own debts, until the condition on which the agreement to sell was made has been performed.

The judgment of the Supreme Court of the Territory of Utah is affirmed.

[99] VICKSBURG AND MERIDIAN RAILROAD COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,

v.

MARY E. O'BRIEN AND JOHN J. O'BRIEN.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 99-109.)

Action against railroad corporation for personal injuries—evidence.

1. In an action against a railroad corporation to recover damages for personal injuries, a written statement, made by a physician prior to the commencement of the suit, as to the condition of the injured party, and stated by the physician in his deposition to be a correct description of the patient's condition at the times mentioned, was inadmissible under the circumstances of the case as evidence of the facts therein alleged.

2. Where there is error in the record this court will direct a reversal, unless it appears beyond doubt that the error complained of did not and could not have prejudiced the rights of the party.

3. Evidence that the engineer having in charge defendant's train at the time of the accident stated, ten to thirty minutes after the accident, that the speed of the train was about eighteen miles an hour, was inadmissible to prove the rate at which the train was moving.

[No. 12.]

Argued Apr. 19, 20, 1886. Decided Nov. 1, 1886.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Mississippi. Reversed.

The case is stated by the court.

Messrs. Edgar M. Johnson, Geo. Hoadly, Edward Colston and Wm. L. Nugent, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. T. C. Catchings, for defendants in error.

[100] Mr. Justice Harlan delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought by Mary E. O'Brien and her husband, John J. O'Brien, to recover damages sustained in consequence of personal injuries received by the wife in September, 1881, while a passenger upon the Vicksburg and Meridian Railroad. The declaration alleges that the Company "so carelessly, negligently, and unskillfully constructed and maintained its railroad track, engine and cars, and so carelessly, negligently and unskillfully conducted itself in the management, control and running of the same," that the car in which Mrs. O'Brien was seated as a passenger was thrown from the railroad track and overturned, whereby she was seriously injured. There was a verdict and judgment for $9,000 in favor of the plaintiffs.

1. At the trial the plaintiffs offered to read to the jury the deposition of a physician, and did read the first, second and third interrogatories propounded to him, and the answers thereto. Responding to the first and second interrogatories, he stated, among other things, that his attendance upon Mrs. O'Brien commenced on the 16th of September, 1881; that he found her suffering extreme pain and in a very nervous condition, resulting a few hours before from a railroad accident on defendant's road; that such was the cause of her injuries he knew from her own answers, from the statement of her brother-in-law, and from attending others who were on the train with her. The third interrogatory and answer were as follows: [101]

"3. Look on the accompanying statement, dated November 26, 1881, and state if it was written by you at the date it bears, for what purpose it was written, and to whom it was delivered. Does the statement represent substantially and correctly Mrs. O'Brien's condition, as it appeared when you first saw her, and as it continued up to November 26, 1881?

"Answer: I have looked upon the statement referred to, which was written by myself, at Mr. O'Brien's request, at the date mentioned, when he was about to take his wife away from here to his home in New Orleans, and was intended to convey an idea of how she was when I was called to see her, and what her condition was when she left my charge; and in my opinion I correctly stated her condition at times referred to."

The written statement referred to in the interrogatory was signed by the witness, and attached to his deposition as an exhibit. It was addressed to Mr. O'Brien, and sets forth, with much detail, the nature of the injuries received by the wife, and their effect upon her bodily and mental condition. It also embodied an expression of the witness' opinion as to the probable length of time within which she might recover from her injuries. The plaintiff, before reading the remaining interrogatories and answers, offered to read this statement to the jury as evidence. The Company objected upon these grounds: that it was not made by the witness under oath, and in defendant's presence, or with its knowledge and consent; that it was hearsay evidence and, therefore, wholly incompetent; and that, in any event, it could only be referred to by the witness to refresh his recollection. The court overruled the objection and permitted the statement to be read in evidence, the defendant taking an exception thereto, which was allowed. The remainder of the deposition was then read to the jury.

[102] We are of opinion that this ruling cannot be sustained, upon any principle recognized in the law of evidence. The authorities are uniform in holding that a witness is at liberty to examine a memorandum prepared by him, under the circumstances in which this one was, for the purpose of refreshing or assisting his recollection as to the facts stated in it.

But there are adjudged cases which declare that, unless prepared in the discharge of some public duty, or of some duty arising out of the business relations of the witness with others, or in the regular course of his own business, or with the knowledge and concurrence of the party to be charged, and for the purpose of charging him, such a memorandum cannot, under any circumstances, be admitted as an instrument of evidence.* There are, however, other cases, to the effect that where the witness states, under oath, that the memorandum was made by him presently after the transaction to which it relates, for the purpose of perpetuating his recollection of the facts, and that he knows it was correct when prepared, although after reading it he cannot recall the circumstances so as to state them alone from memory, the paper may be received as the best evidence of which the case admits.†

The present case does not require us to enter upon an examination of the numerous authorities upon this general subject; for, it does not appear here but that at the time the witness testified he had, without even looking at his written statement, a clear, distinct recollection of every essential fact stated in it. If he had such present recollection, there was no necessity whatever for reading that paper to the jury. Applying, then, to the case the most liberal rule announced in any of the authorities, the ruling by which the plaintiffs were allowed to read the physician's written statement to the jury as evidence, in itself, of the facts therein recited, was erroneous.

[103] It is, however, claimed, in behalf of the plaintiffs, that in his answers to other interrogatories the physician testified, apart from the certificate, to the material facts embodied in it, and that therefore the reading of it to the jury could not have prejudiced the rights of the defendant, and, for that reason should not be a ground of reversal.

We are unable to say that the defendant was not injuriously affected by the reading of the physician's certificate in evidence. It is not easy to determine what weight was given to it by the jury. In estimating the damages to be awarded in view of the extent and character of the injuries received, the jury, for aught that the court can know, may have been largely controlled by its statements. The practice of admitting the unsworn statements of witnesses, prepared in advance of trial, at the request of one party and without the knowledge of the other party, should not be encouraged by further departures from the established rules of evidence.

While this court will not disturb a judgment for an error that did not operate to the substantial injury of the party against whom it was committed, it is well settled that a reversal will be directed unless it appears, beyond doubt, that the error complained of did not and could not have prejudiced the rights of the party. Smith v. Shoemaker, 17 Wall. 630, 639 [84 U. S. bk. 21, L. ed. 717, 719]; Deery v. Cray, 5 Wall. 795 [72 U. S. bk. 18, L. ed. 653]; Moores v. Nat. Bank, 104 U. S. 630 [Bk. 26, L. ed. 872]; Gilmer v. Higley, 110 U. S. 50 [Bk. 28, L. ed. 63].

2. At the trial below plaintiffs introduced one Roach as a witness, who, during his examination, was asked whether he did not, shortly after the accident, have a conversation with the engineer having charge of defendant's train at the time of the accident, about the rate of speed at which the train was moving at the time. To that question the defendant objected, but its objection was overruled, and the witness permitted to answer. The witness had previously stated that, on examination of the track after the accident, he found a cross-tie or cross-ties under the broken rail in a decayed condition. His answer to the above question was: "Between ten and thirty minutes after the accident occurred, I had such a conversation with Morgan Herbert, the engineer having charge of the locomotive attached to the train at the time of the accident, and he told me that the train was [104] moving at the rate of eighteen miles an hour." The defendant renewed its objection to this testimony by a motion to exclude it from the jury. This motion was denied, and an exception taken. As bearing upon the point here raised it may be stated that, under the evidence it became material—apart from the issue as to the condition of the track—to inquire whether, at the time of the accident (which occurred at a place on the line where the rails in the track were, according to some of the proof, materially defective) the train was being run at a speed exceeding fifteen miles an hour. In this view, the declaration of the engineer may have had a decisive influence upon the result of the trial.

There can be no dispute as to the general rules governing the admissibility of the declarations of an agent to affect the principal. The acts of an agent within the scope of the authority delegated to him, are deemed the acts of the principal. Whatever he does in the lawful exercise of that authority is imputable to the principal, and may be proven without calling the agent as a witness. So, in consequence of the relation between him and the principal, his statement or declaration is, under some circumstances, regarded as of the nature of original evidence, "being," says Phillips, "the ultimate fact to be proved, and not an admission of some other fact." 1 Phil. Ev. 381. "But it must be remembered," says Greenleaf, "that the admission of the agent cannot always be assimilated to the admission of the principal. The party's own admission, whenever made, may be given in evidence against him; but the admission or declaration of his agent binds him only when it is made during the continuance of the agency in regard to a transaction then depending, et dum fervet opus. It is because it is a verbal act and part of the res gestæ that it is admissible at all; and, therefore, it is not necessary to call the agent to prove it; but wherever what he did is admissible in evidence, there it is competent to prove what he said about the act while he was doing it." 1 Greenl. Ev. § 113. This court had occasion in Packet Co. v. Clough, 20 Wall. 540 [87 U. S. bk. 22, L. ed. 408], to consider this question. Referring to the rule [105] as stated by Mr. Justice Story in his treatise on Agency (§ 134), that "Where the acts of the agent will bind the principal, there his representations, declarations and admissions respecting the subject matter will also bind him, if made at the same time, and constituting part of the res gestæ," the court, speaking by Mr. Justice Strong, said: "A close attention to this rule, which is of universal acceptance, will solve almost every difficulty. But an act done by an agent cannot be varied, qualified or explained, either by his declarations, which amount to no more than a mere narrative of a past occurrence, or by an isolated conversation held, or an isolated act done, at a later period. The reason is that the agent to do the act is not authorized to narrate what he had done, or how he had done it, and his declaration is no part of the res gestæ."

*Lightner v. Wike, 4 S. & R. 208; Calvert v. Fitzgerald, Litt. Sel. Cas. 338; Lawrence v. Barker, 5 Wend. 305; Redden v. Spruance, 4 Harr. (Del.) 267-8; Field v. Thompson, 119 Mass. 151.

†Russell v. H. R. R. R. Co. 17 N. Y. 140; Guy v. Mead, 22 N. Y. 465; Merrill v. Ithaca & O. R. R. Co. 16 Wend. 586; Kelsea v. Fletcher, 48 N. H. 283; Haven v. Wendell, 11 N. H. 113; Mims v. Sturdevant, 26 Ala. 640; State v. Rawls, 2 Nott & McC. 331, 334.

We are of opinion that the declaration of the engineer Herbert to the witness Roach was not competent against the defendant for the purpose of proving the rate of speed at which the train was moving at the time of the accident. It is true that, in view of the engineer's experience and position, his statements under oath, as a witness, in respect to that matter, if credited, would have influence with the jury. Although the speed of the train was, in some degree, subject to his control, still his authority, in that respect, did not carry with it authority to make declarations or admissions at a subsequent time, as to the manner in which, on any particular trip, or at any designated point in his route, he had performed his duty. His declaration, after the accident had become a completed fact, and when he was not performing the duties of engineer, that the train, at the moment the plaintiff was injured, was being run at the rate of eighteen miles an hour, was not explanatory of anything in which he was then engaged. It did not accompany the act from which the injuries in question arose. It was, in its essence, the mere narration of a past occurrence, not a part of the res gestæ; simply an assertion or representation, in the course of conversation, as to a matter not then pending, and in respect to which his authority as engi- [106] neer had been fully exerted. It is not to be deemed part of the res gestæ, simply because of the brief period intervening between the accident and the making of the declaration. The fact remains that the occurrence had ended when the declaration in question was made, and the engineer was not in the act of doing anything that could possibly affect it. If his declaration had been made the next day after the accident, it would scarcely be claimed that it was admissible evidence against the Company. And yet the circumstance that it was made between ten and thirty minutes, an appreciable period of time, after the accident, cannot, upon principle, make this case an exception to the general rule. If the contrary view should be maintained, it would follow that the declarations of the engineer, if favorable to the Company, would have been admissible in its behalf as part of the res gestæ, without calling him as a witness; a proposition that will find no support in the law of evidence. The cases have gone far enough in the admission of the subsequent declarations of agents as evidence against their principals. These views are fully sustained by adjudications in the highest courts of the States.*

We deem it unnecessary to notice other exceptions taken to the action of the court below.

This case was decided at the last term of this court, and Mr. Justice Woods concurred in the order of reversal upon the grounds herein stated.

For the errors indicated the judgment is reversed, and the cause is remanded for a new trial, and for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

Reversed.

Mr. Justice Field dissenting: [107]

I am not able to give my assent to the judgment of the court in this case.

The statement by the physician as to the condition of the injured party, the admission of which is held to have been error, was proved by his deposition to have been correct. Every material fact also which it contained was established by his independent testimony. It would not be in accordance with the usual action of men, in the ordinary concerns of life to reject as incompetent evidence, a written statement thus made by a physician as to the condition of a patient under his charge, when it is subsequently proved by him to be true in all its details. And it should seem that evidence upon which everyone would act without hesitation in the common affairs of life ought not to be excluded from consideration, except for clear reasons of policy, or long established rules to the contrary, when those affairs are brought into litigation before the courts.

If the recollection of the condition of the patient had passed from the mind of the physician, and he could still have testified that the statement made by him when the patient was under his charge was true, it would have been admissible. It is difficult, therefore, to find any just reason for excluding it, from the fact that, in corroboration of its truth, the physician also testified to the facts therein stated.

The admission of the declaration of the engineer, as to the rate of speed of the train at the time of the accident, was, in my judgment, proper as part of the res gestæ. The rails and cross-ties of the road were in a bad condition. Some of the rails had been used for over forty years, and some of the cross-ties were decayed, and it appears that the accident was caused by a decayed cross-tie and a broken rail.

As the declaration was made between ten and thirty minutes after the accident, we may well conclude that it was made in sight of the wrecked train, and in presence of the injured parties, and whilst surrounded by excited passengers. The engineer was the only person from whom the Company could have learned of the exact speed of the train at the time; to him it would have been obliged to apply for information on that point. It would seem, therefore, that his declaration, as that of its agent or servant, should have been received. The modern doctrine has relaxed the ancient rule, that declarations, to be admissible as part of the res gestæ, must be strictly contemporaneous with the main transaction. It now allows evidence of them, when they appear to have been made under the immediate influence of the principal transaction, and are so connected with it as to characterize or explain it.

The case of the Hanover R. R. Co. v. Coyle, 55 Pa. 402, is in point. There it appeared that a peddler's wagon was struck by a locomotive and the peddler was injured; and the question was as to the admissibility of the declaration of the engineer that the train was behind time, to show carelessness and negligence. The Supreme Court of Pennsylvania held it admissible. "We cannot say," said the court, "that the declaration of the engineer was no part of the res gestæ. It was made at the time, in view of the goods strewn along the road by the breaking up of the boxes, and seems to have grown directly out of and immediately after the happening of the fact. The negligence complained of being that of the engineer himself, we cannot say that his declarations, made upon the spot, at the time, and in view of the effects of his conduct, are not evidence against the company as a part of the very transaction itself."

What time may elapse between the happening of the event in respect to which the declaration is made, and the time of the declaration, and yet the declaration be admissible, must depend upon the character of the transaction itself. An accident happening to a railway train, by which a car is wrecked, would naturally lead to a great deal of excitement among the passengers on the train, and the character and cause of the accident would be the subject of explanation for a considerable time afterwards by persons connected with the train. The admissibility of a declaration, in connection with evidence of the principal fact, as stated by Greenleaf, must be determined by the judge according to the degree of its relation to that [109] fact, and in the exercise of a sound discretion; it being extremely difficult, if not impossible, to bring this class of cases within the limits of a more particular description. The principal points of attention are, he adds, whether the declaration was contemporaneous with the main fact, and so connected with it as to illustrate its character.

But, independently of this consideration, there is another answer to the objection taken to the admissibility of the declaration of the engineer. It was immaterial in any view of the case. The engagement of a railroad company is to carry its passengers safely; and, for any injury arising from a defect in its road, or in the rails or ties, which could have been guarded against by the exercise of proper care, it is liable. Its liability does not depend upon the speed of the train, whether it was one mile or eighteen miles an hour. Though as a carrier of passengers it is not, like a carrier of property, an insurer against all accidents except those caused by the act of God or the public enemy, it is charged with the utmost care and skill in the performance of its duty; and this implies not merely the utmost attention in respect to the movement of the cars, but also to the condition of the road, and of its ties, rails and all other appliances essential to the safety of the train and passengers. For all injuries through negligence, to which the passenger does not contribute by his own acts, it is liable. So it matters not what the speed of the train was in the case at bar, nor what was the declaration of the engineer in that respect.

I am authorized to state that the Chief Justice, Mr. Justice Miller and Mr. Justice Blatchford concur in this dissent.

CONSOLIDATED SAFETY-VALVE COMPANY, Appt., [45]

v.

ERASTUS B. KUNKLE.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 45-48.)

Patent law—construction of claims—infringement.

In an action for the infringement of two patents for improvements in safety valves, held; that the defendant's valves did not infringe the complainant's patents as previously construed by this court. Bk. 28, 939.

[No. 19.]

Argued, Oct. 27, 28, 1886. Decided, Nov. 15, 1886.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois. Affirmed.

The case is stated by the court.

Mr. Thos. Wm. Clarke, for appellant.

Mr. James H. Raymond, for appellee.

Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court.

This is an appeal by the plaintiff in a suit in equity to recover for the infringement of two letters patent, from a decree dismissing the bill. The suit was brought in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois, by the Consolidated Safety-Valve Company, a Connecticut corporation, against Erastus B. Kunkle, on letters patent No. 58294, granted to George W. Richardson, September 25, 1866, for an improvement in safety valves.

and on other letters patent, No. 86963, granted to the same person, January 19, 1869, for an improvement in safety valves for steam boilers or generators. These are the same two patents which were the subject matter of the litigation involved in the case of Consolidated Safety-Valve Co. v. Crosby Steam-Gauge & Valve Co., decided by this court at October [46] Term, 1884 and reported in 118 U. S. 157 [Bk. 28, L. ed. 989]. The specifications and claims and drawings of the two patents are set forth fully in the report of that case. The patents were, both of them, held to be valid and to have been infringed.

The claim of the patent of 1866, "A safety valve, with the circular or annular flange or lip c c, constructed in the manner, or substantially in the manner, shown, so as to operate as and for the purpose herein described," was construed as covering "a valve in which are combined an initial area, an additional area, a huddling chamber beneath the additional area, and a strictured orifice leading from the huddling chamber to the open air, the orifice being proportioned to the strength of the spring as directed."

The claim of the patent of 1869, "The combination of the surface beyond the seat of the safety valve, with the means herein described for regulating or adjusting the area of the passage for the escape of steam, substantially as and for the purpose described," was construed as covering "the combination with the surface of the huddling chamber, and the strictured orifice, of a screw ring to be moved up or down to obstruct such orifice more or less, in the manner described."

The decree in the present case was made in January, 1885, and proceeded, as it states, on the ground that the defendant's valves did not infringe the patents. This also appears from the decision of the circuit court, reported in 14 Fed. Rep. 732. As the defendant's valves have no huddling chamber, and no strictured orifice leading from a huddling chamber to the open air, we are of opinion that they do not infringe either of the patents.

Decree affirmed.

v.

GEORGE H. DUNBAR, FRANCIS B. DUNBAR, AND CHARLOTTE Z. DUNBAR.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 47-52.)

Patent law—reissue, held invalid.

Where, in an original patent for a method of preserving shrimps, etc., the claim was for placing a textile fabric between the shrimps and the can in which they were preserved, and in the reissue the claim is for interposing between the metal can and the shrimps an enveloping material for the shrimps, the reissue is invalid; the latter claim being broader than that of the original.

[No. 21.]

Argued Oct. 29, Nov. 1, 1886. Decided Nov. 15, 1886.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Louisiana. Reversed.

The case is stated by the court.

Messrs. Wm. G. Henderson, Joseph P. Hornor, F. W. Baker and Joyce & Spear, for appellants.

Messrs. Melville Church and Joseph R. Church, for appellees.

Mr. Justice Bradley delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit on a reissued patent. The appellees obtained a patent dated June 20, 1876, for a method of preserving shrimps and other shell-fish by placing them in a bag or sack made of cotton, muslin or other textile fabric, and then sealing them up in a metallic can, and subjecting them to a boiling process. In their specification they declare that the object of placing the shrimps in the bag is to keep them from coming in direct contact with the can, and thus prevent their discoloration and loss of flavor. They describe the process as follows:

"The shell having been removed from the shrimp in the usual manner, the fish is thrown into salt water of about six degrees, and there remains for an hour, more or less, and from thence to kettles filled with water and brought to a boiling heat, after which they are placed on dippers, and cooled and thoroughly rinsed with fresh cold water, and from which, so soon as thoroughly dripped, in a moist condition, [48] they are placed in the sack B, the same having been previously arranged in the can A, and without the addition of any salted or otherwise prepared liquid. So soon as the sack is filled, the mouth thereof being properly secured, the lid or head a is placed in position on the can A and immediately sealed.

"The cans are then subjected to a steam bath, or placed in kettles containing boiling water, and boiled for two hours at the highest temperature attainable, and which completes the process."

The claim is then stated, as follows:

"What we claim as new, and desire to secure by letters patent, is:

"The herein described method of preserving shrimps, etc., preventing their discoloration, which consists in placing textile fabric between the can and its contents, and then sealing the can and subjecting the same to a boiling process, substantially as and for the purpose specified."

In April, 1880, Pecor, one of the appellants, together with one Bartlett, obtained a patent for another method of preserving shrimps, by first lining the inside of the can with a coating of asphaltum cement, and then with paper coated with a solution of paraffine, or kindred substance; the can is then filled with shrimp, sealed up, and subjected to the boiling or steaming process, in the usual manner of canning vegetables and meats.

In April, 1881, the appellees surrendered their original patent, and applied for a reissue thereof, which was granted in December, 1881. In the new specification they described their process to consist in, first, providing the can with a lining to prevent direct contact of the shrimps with the metal, and, second, placing them in the lined can while they are in a dry or moist condition and devoid of free liquid or gravy, sealing the can without adding any liquid to its contents, and cooking the contents of the can after sealing. They add that "there is nothing arbitrary about the peculiar form and construction of the textile fabric lining, as other forms and arrangements might be substituted therefor;" and again, "B is the lining, constructed preferably of cotton or muslin." The claim of the reissued patent is in the following words:

"What we claim as new, and desire to secure by letters patent, is:

"As an improvement in the art of preserving shrimps in metal cans, the mode of preventing the discoloration of the shrimps, which consists in interposing between the metal can and the shrimps an enveloping material for the shrimps, which is not itself capable of discoloring the shrimps, and then sealing the can and subjecting the same and its contents to a boiling process, substantially as described."

In March, 1882, the appellants commenced the canning of shrimps, and in their answer state that all the business of canning shrimps that they have ever done has been under the authority of the patent granted to Pecor and Bartlett. They further describe the process used by them as follows:

"The common tin cans being ready for packing, three pieces of paper, previously boiled in paraffine wax or coated with same, are cut and placed in the can, so that one piece covers the bottom, another piece the sides, and a third piece the top of the contents when the can is filled; the shrimps are then picked raw, then washed and thoroughly cooked for about twenty minutes, until fit to eat; they are then placed in the cans, which are soldered, and then put into a steam retort without water, which is heated to 240° Fahrenheit, where they remain from two and a half to three hours, which process has the effect of condensing the air and liquids in the can, and exterminating any animal or vegetable life that may remain in the contents of the can, after which they are ready to be labeled and sold."

The process thus used by the appellants is claimed by the appellees to be an infringement of their reissued patent; they also contend that the claim of the reissued patent is no broader than that of the original properly construed.

In the latter proposition we cannot concur. The claim in the original patent was for placing textile fabric between the can and its contents; whilst in the reissue it is for interposing between the metal can and the shrimps an enveloping material for the shrimps. This is certainly, on its face, a very important enlargement of the claim; and we see nothing in the context of the specification in the original patent which could possibly give the claim so broad a construction. The description of the invention, throughout, specifies a textile fabric as the material to be interposed between the shrimp and the metallic can. It is true that the object of the invention is stated to be "to prevent the article to be preserved from coming in direct contact with the surface of the can." But the object of an invention is a very different thing from the invention itself. The object may be accomplished in many ways; the invention shows one way. Again, in describing the nature of the improvement, the patentees say:

"Primarily, our improvement consists in so placing a suitable textile fabric between the fish or other article of food to be preserved as to cause it to intervene as to prevent, under all circumstances, any direct contact between the metallic surface of the can and its contents; and it is the employment of such textile fabric, in connection with the process hereinafter described of treating the fish or other article, both before and after the same is placed in the can and sealed, which constitutes the nature or subject matter of our present invention."

Then, in describing the apparatus used, referring to the figures annexed to the specification (which are not necessary to the understanding of the description), they say:

"In the accompanying drawing is illustrated, at figure 1, a metallic can, such as is ordinarily used for articles of food which are offered to the trade in a canned state. Figure 2 is a textile lining, which we propose usually to make (although there is nothing arbitrary about the form, as other forms may be used) in the form of a cylindrical bag or sack, the diameter of which, when filled, is to be such as will permit of its fitting snugly within the can.

"A is the metallic can; a, its lid or cover. B is the bag or sack, constructed of cotton, muslin, or any other suitable textile fabric Material of the cheapest and most inferior quality may be used, as the sole object of its use is to prevent the article to be preserved from coming in direct contact with the surface of the can, and which contact with the metal, in the case of the shrimp, causes, during the process of boiling, and all along thereafter until the can is opened, a profuse precipitation of a black substance, generally believed to be sulphur, and which supposition is based upon the fact that the shrimp is said to possess a much larger proportion of sulphur than other shell-fish. The substance thus precipitated not only discolors the fish (shrimp), but detracts much from the color, freshness, and richness of its flavor. Now, practical experience has fully demonstrated the fact that, by using a textile fabric as described, the precipitation of the substance alluded to is prevented, or at least does not appear either on the fabric or metal; hence, the value and importance of this feature of our invention; b, figure 3, is a circular piece cut out of material similar to that of which the bag B is made, and which is inserted within the mouth of the latter after the same is filled with the fish or other article to be preserved.

"Such a can and lining, as herein described, are admirably adapted for the purpose attained by our present invention; but, as before stated, there is nothing arbitrary about the peculiar form or construction of the textile fabric lining, as other forms and arrangements might be substituted therefor without in any manner altering the principle of the invention."

We see nothing in all this to raise the slightest implication that the patentees were the inventors of the process of interposing any and every kind of lining between the cans and their contents; and when their claim is confined to a lining of textile fabric, it is tantamount to a declaration that they claimed nothing else.

Some persons seem to suppose that a claim in a patent is like a nose of wax which may be turned and twisted in any direction, by merely referring to the specification, so as to make it include something more than, or something different from, what its words express. The context may undoubtedly be resorted to, and often is resorted to, for the purpose of better understanding the meaning of the claim; but not for the purpose of changing it and making it different from what it is. The claim is a statutory [51] requirement, prescribed for the very purpose of making the patentee define precisely what his invention is; and it is unjust to the public, as well as an evasion of the law, to construe it in a manner different from the plain import of its terms. This has been so often expressed in the opinions of this court that it is unnecessary to pursue the subject further. See Keystone Bridge Co. v. Phœnix Iron Co. 95 U. S. 274, 278 [Bk. 24, L. ed. 344, 345]; James v. Campbell, 104 U. S. 356, 370 [Bk. 26, L. ed. 786, 791].

We are clearly of opinion, therefore, that the original patent is not susceptible of the broad construction which the appellees would give to it; and that the reissued patent is a material expansion and enlargement of it. As such expansion appears to be the only object of the reissue, and as the application for the reissue was not made until nearly five years after the original was granted, the case comes within the ruling of Miller v. Brass Co. 104 U. S. 350 [Bk. 26, L. ed. 783], and subsequent cases to the same purport.

We attach no importance to the fact that between the date of the original patent and the application for the reissue, the patent to Pecor and Bartlett was granted. It is, indeed, quite apparent that the appellees applied for a reissue in consequence of that patent, and in order to prevent the canning of shrimps under it. The circumstance that other improvements and inventions, made after the issue of a patent, are often sought to be suppressed or appropriated by an unauthorized reissue, has sometimes been referred to for the purpose of illustrating the evil consequences of granting such reissues; but it adds nothing to their illegality. That is deduced from general principles of law as applied to the statutes authorizing reissues, and affecting the rights of the government and the public.

In our judgment the reissued patent in this case was unlawfully granted, and the bill should have been dismissed.

The decree of the Circuit Court is therefore reversed and the case remanded, with directions to dismiss the bill.

Appeal—what, final decree for purposes of.

A decree, to be final for the purposes of an appeal, must leave the case in such a condition that if there be an affirmance by this court, the court below will have nothing to do but to execute the decree it has already entered.

[No. 4.]

Argued Oct. 22, 1886. Decided Nov. 15, 1886.

APPEAL from the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia. Dismissed.

The case is stated by the court.

Messrs. J. W. Douglass and Geo. L. Douglass, for appellant.

Messrs. Job Barnard and James S. Edwards, for appellees.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

When this case was called for hearing, a motion was made to dismiss because the decree appealed from was not a final decree. The facts are these:

The bill was filed by Dainese, as the holder of one of three notes of Gordon, secured by a deed of trust from Gordon to McPherson, trustee, against the maker of the notes, the trustee, and John E. Kendall, the holder of the other notes, praying:

1. That a sale which had been made of the trust property by McPherson, the trustee acting under the deed of trust, to Kendall, be set aside and a new sale ordered.

2. That Kendall be required to account for rents of the trust property which had been collected by him, while in possession, under a power of attorney from Gordon authorizing him to receive the rents, and, after paying expenses and certain specified demands, apply the [54] proceeds upon the debt secured by the trust; and

3. For an account of what was due to himself and to Kendall upon the notes they severally held, and that the proceeds of the sale which had been made, or if that should be set aside, of any that might thereafter be made, be divided between them in proportion to the amounts due them respectively.

Afterwards, and before any decree, McPherson filed a cross bill praying an account between Dainese and Kendall, and an apportionment of the proceeds of the sale among them, and also an allowance to himself of commissions and counsel fees.

The court at special term set aside the sale, but before anything further was done Kendall appealed to the general term. At the general term the order of the special term was reversed, NOTE—What is final judgment or decree for purpose of appeal on writ of error. See Gibbons v. Ogden, 19 U. S. bk. 5, p. 302, note.

the sale ratified and confirmed, and the cause remanded to the special term "for further proceedings." When the case got back to the special term Kendall moved a reference to an auditor to make distribution of the proceeds of the sale; but while this motion was pending, and before anything else was done, Dainese took this appeal.

From this statement it is apparent that the decree appealed from is not a final decree within the meaning of that term as used in the statute allowing appeals to this court. The litigation of the parties on the merits of the case has not been terminated. An account of the rents collected by Kendall while in possession has not been taken; and the amounts due Dainese and Kendall respectively on the notes which they severally hold have not been ascertained. All this is necessary for the purposes of the relief asked for in the bill, and the cause was sent back from the general term for further proceedings on that account. The authorities are uniform to the effect that a decree to be final for the purposes of an appeal must leave the case in such a condition that if there be an affirmance here, the court below [55] will have nothing to do but to execute the decree it has already entered. Bostwick v. Brinkerhoff, 106 U. CHOCTAW NATION, Appt.
UNITED STATES.

UNITED STATES, Appt.,
v.
CHOCTAW NATION.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 1-44.)

Settlement of all questions of difference between the Choctaw Nation and the United States—construction of treaties and statutes—Senate award under Treaty of 1855.

1. The award made by the Senate of the United States under the Treaty of 1855, between the United States and the Choctaw Nation, was within the submission, and was not invalid for uncertainty or want of proper notice.

2. Under the Act of 1881, conferring jurisdiction upon the court below to review the entire question of differences between the Choctaw Nation and the United States de novo, said award, though not conclusive, may be given effect as prima facie establishing the validity of the claim so far adjudged in favor of the Choctaw Nation.

3. In view of the peculiar relations of the parties, and without regard to technical rules, this court holds, upon a review of the questions of difference between them de novo, that the principle of settlement adjudged by the Senate in its said award, allowing said Choctaw Nation the net proceeds of its lands in Mississippi ceded by the Treaty of 1830 to the United States, furnishes the nearest approximation to the justice and right of the case that, after this lapse of [illegible], it is practicable for a judicial tribunal to reach.

4. In addition to the amount of said award, less the payment under the Act of March 2, 1861, said Choctaw Nation is entitled to the amount of certain unpaid annuities, and to the value of certain of its lands taken by mistake in fixing the boundary of the State of Arkansas by the Act of March 8, 1875.

[Nos. 848, 850.]

Argued Oct. 19, 20, 21, 1886. Decided Nov. 15, 1886.

APPEALS from the Court of Claims. Reversed.

Statement of the case by Mr. Justice Matthews: [2]

There are two appeals in this case, one by the Choctaw Nation, and the other by the United States, from a judgment rendered by the court of claims in favor of the former for the sum of $408,120.32. Jurisdiction of the cause was conferred upon that court by the provisions of an Act of Congress approved March 3, 1881, 21 Stat. at L. 504, entitled "An Act for the Ascertainment of the Amount Due the Choctaw Nation," as follows:

"That the court of claims is hereby authorized to take jurisdiction of and try all questions of difference arising out of treaty stipulations with the Choctaw Nation, and to render judgment thereon; power is hereby granted the said court to review the entire question of differences de novo, and it shall not be estopped by any action had or award made by the Senate of the United States in pursuance of the Treaty of eighteen hundred and fifty-five; and the At- [3] torney-General is hereby directed to appear in behalf of the Government; and if said court shall decide against the United States, the Attorney-General shall, within thirty days from the rendition of judgment, appeal the cause to the Supreme Court of the United States; and from any judgment that may be rendered the said Choctaw Nation may also appeal to said supreme court: Provided, The appeal of said Choctaw Nation shall be taken within sixty days after the rendition of said judgment, and the said courts shall give such cause precedence.

"Sec. 2. Said action shall be commenced by a petition stating the facts on which said Nation claims to recover, and the amount of its claim; and said petition may be verified by either of the authorized delegates of said Nation as to the existence of such facts, and no other statements need be contained in said petition or verification."

In pursuance of this Act, the Choctaw Nation filed its original petition on the 13th of June, 1881, which was subsequently amended by new pleadings filed February 26, 1884. The questions of difference between the United States and the petitioner, it was alleged, resulted from the nonperformance and nonfulfillment by the United States of the obligations assumed by it under various treaties between the United States and the Choctaw Nation, including those of the following dates, to wit: the 18th day of October, 1820, the 20th day of January, 1825, the 27th day of September, 1830, the 22d day of June 1855, and the 28th day of April, 1866.

By the terms of the Treaty of October 18, 1820, 7 Stat. at L. 210, it was provided, amongst other things, that the Choctaw Nation did cede to the United States all that part of its lands situated in the State of Mississippi described in the first article of the Treaty; in consideration whereof the United States stipulated that in part satisfaction for the said cession the United States ceded to the Choctaw Nation a tract of country west of the Mississippi River, situated between the Arkansas and Red Rivers, the boundaries of which were therein described; and also that the boundaries thereby established [4] between the Choctaw Indians and the United States, east of the Mississippi River, should remain without alteration until the period at which the Nation should become so civilized and enlightened as to be made citizens of the United States. It was agreed that Congress should lay off a limited parcel of land for the benefit of each family or individual in the Nation; that all those who had separate settlements falling within the limits of the land ceded by the Choctaw Nation to the United States, and who desired to remain there, should be secured in a tract or parcel of land one mile square, to include their improvements; and that those preferring to remove within one year from the date of the Treaty should be paid their full value, including the value of any improvements.

It is alleged in the petition that, by the Treaties of January 20, 1825, of September 27, 1830, and of June 22, 1855, the boundary line between the lands of the United States and the Choctaws west of the Mississippi River was established; but that the United States, in fixing and causing to be surveyed the said boundary line, did not pursue the line in accordance with the provisions of the said Treaties, but encroached upon and took from the lands ceded to the Choctaw Nation a quantity of land amounting to 186,204.02 acres, which by the legislation of the United States, in violation of these provisions of the Treaties, became a part of the public domain of the United States, for which the Choctaw Nation are entitled to recover their value, estimated at $167,896.57.

The petition further states that, in the Treaty concluded on the 27th of September, 1830, called the Treaty of Dancing Rabbit Creek, it was provided, among other things, by the third article thereof, 7 Stat. at L. 333, that the Choctaw Nation should and did thereby cede to the United States the entire country they then owned and possessed east of the Mississippi River, and agreed to remove beyond the Mississippi River as early as practicable; and that, in pursuance of this Treaty the Choctaw Nation surrendered to the United States all the remaining lands at that time owned by them in the State of Mississippi, amounting, as is alleged, to 10,423,139 acres, and, in compliance with the [5] Treaty on their part, commenced to remove, and did remove, within the time stipulated therein, or within a reasonable time thereafter, from the said lands to the lands purchased and acquired by them under the terms of the Treaty of October 18, 1820.

By the 14th article of the Treaty of September 27, 1830, it was provided that each Choctaw head of a family, being desirous to remain and become a citizen of the States, should be permitted to do so by signifying his intention to the agent within six months of the ratification of the Treaty, and thereupon should be entitled to a reservation of one section of 640 acres of land, to be bounded by sectional lines of survey; and in like manner should be entitled to one half that quantity for each unmarried child living with him over ten years of age, and a quarter section for each child that might be under ten years of age, to adjoin the location of the parent. If they resided upon such lands, intending to become citizens of the States, for five years after the ratification of the Treaty, a grant in fee simple should issue. Such reservation should include the present improvement of the head of the family, or a portion of it, and the persons who claimed under the article were not to lose the privilege of Choctaw citizenship.

It is alleged in the petition that 1,585 heads of Choctaw families signified their intention to remain on their lands in Mississippi and become citizens under this article of the Treaty; and that, although they substantially complied with all its requirements and conditions, and thereby became entitled to grants of land in fee simple, as specified in the article, yet but 143 such families ever received from the United States their title to the lands guaranteed them by the article, leaving 1,442 of the said Choctaw heads of families entitled to a grant of their lands in fee simple, under the provisions of said article 14, whose claims had not been satisfied.

It is alleged in the petition that the lands to which these families were entitled amounted to 1,672,760 acres, which were reasonably worth, with the improvements, $5.50 an acre, and that the value of the whole was $9,200,180.

It is further alleged in the petition that the United States, having failed to secure to each [6] Choctaw head of a family the reservation secured under article 14 of the Treaty of 1830, subsequently, by an Act of Congress approved August 23, 1842, 5 Stat. at L. 513, attempted to provide compensation for the same by the issue and delivery of certificates or scrip, which authorized those entitled to such reservations, or their assignees, to enter any of the public lands subject to entry at private sale in the States of Mississippi, Alabama, Louisiana, or Arkansas, which certificates or scrip they were required by said Act to receive and accept in full satisfaction of all their claims or demands against the United States under said article 14.

It is further alleged in the petition that 292 of the 1,442 Choctaw heads of families, entitled to grants in fee simple under article 14 of the Treaty of 1830, have never received any such grants in fee simple, or any allowance or compensation whatever for the same. The claims of 1,150 of said 1,442 heads of families were adjudicated and allowed under the Act of August 23, 1842, and certificates or scrip awarded to them under the provisions of said Act, authorizing the entry of 1,399,920 acres of land, of which there were paid and delivered to the persons entitled to receive the same 3,833 certificates or pieces of scrip, authorizing the entry of 700,080 acres of land. The certificates for the residue of said 1,399,920 acres; to wit, for 699,840 acres, were not issued, but were withheld under an Act of Congress approved March 3, 1845, 5 Stat. at L. 777, which provided that they should carry an interest of 5 per cent, payable to the claimants or their representatives to be estimated upon $1.25 for each acre of land to which they were entitled. The aggregate amount, or principal sum, thus funded, amounting to $872,000, was afterwards, under an Act of Congress approved July 21, 1852, 10 Stat. at L. 19, paid in money to the claimants; which sum of $872,000 was included in the sum of $1,749,900 subsequently charged to the claimants in an account referred to hereafter, being for 1,899,920 acres of scrip, in lieu of reservations, at $1.25 per acre; of which sum of $1,749,900, $872,000 was paid as aforesaid in money, the residue, $877,900, being charged in said account for the certificates or scrip authorizing the entry of 700,080 acres of land, delivered as aforesaid to the said claimants; for which 700,080 acres in scrip the said claimants were charged at the rate of $1.25 per acre, although, by reason of the acts of the United States and its agents in delivering said scrip at places where it could not be used, the whole amount realized by the claimants was $118,400, and no more. So that the amount chargeable against the Choctaw Nation should have been the sum of $980,400, and is all that should be deducted from the $9,200,180, the estimated value of the lands for which they claim the right to recover in this proceeding.

It is further alleged that, by the sixteenth article of said Treaty, the United States agreed to remove the Choctaws to their new homes; to furnish them with ample corn, beef and pork for twelve months after reaching there; to take all of their cattle at an appraised value, and pay for the same in money; but it is alleged that, between 1834 and 1846, 960 members of the Choctaw Nation emigrated and subsisted for one year without assistance from the United States, for each of which 960 the Choctaw Nation is entitled to recover $54.16⅔ from the United States, making the total amount claimed $51,998.40.

It is further alleged that, under the provisions of article 19 of said Treaty of 1830, four sections of land were reserved to Col. David Folsom, two of which should include his present improvement; two sections each were reserved to eight persons therein named, to include their improvements, and to be bounded by sectional lines, which might be sold with the consent of the President; and for others not otherwise provided for, there was reserved (1) one section to each head of a family, not exceeding forty, who had in actual cultivation fifty acres or more, with a dwelling house thereon; (2) three quarter sections, after the manner aforesaid, to each head of a family, not exceeding 460, who had cultivated between thirty and fifty acres; (3) one half section, as aforesaid, to those, not to exceed 400, who had cultivated from twenty to thirty acres; (4) a quarter section to such, not to exceed 350, as had cultivated from twelve to twenty acres; and half that quantity to such as had cultivated from two to twelve acres, limited [8] to the same number; each class to be so located as to include the improvement containing the dwelling house. These reservations might be sold with the consent of the President of the United States, but should any prefer it, or omit to take such reservation as he might be entitled to, the United States would, upon his removal and arrival at his new home, pay him fifty cents an acre therefor, provided proof of his claim be made before the first of January following.

It is further alleged that said article 19 intended to provide 458,400 acres for 1,600 cultivators, yet in carrying out the Treaty, land was assigned to but 731, amounting in all to 123,680 acres; that the actual number of cultivators of from two to twelve acres at the date of the Treaty was 1,763, instead of 350; that 1,413, therefore, failed to get any land at all, owing to the limitations of said article 19; that while the Treaty intended to provide reservations for 1,600 cultivators, such reservations were assigned to only 731, although the number of actual cultivators was 2,144; that the 1,413 cultivators thus excluded contended that they were justly entitled to the same measure of compensation for their improvements as was allowed to other cultivators of equal grade; to wit, 80 acres to each, amounting to 113,040 acres, worth at that time $339,120; that of the 731 to whom were assigned lands as aforesaid, 143 had never received any land or other benefit intended to be secured by said article 19; 45 of whom relinquished to the United States 6,400 acres of land and never received compensation therefor, and the remaining 98, to whom 15,520 acres of land were assigned, never had any land set apart for them; that the said 143 cultivators were entitled to 21,920 acres, worth the sum of $65,760.

It is further alleged that article 20 of said Treaty of 1830 provided for each warrior who emigrated, a rifle, molds, and ammunition; that 1,458 warriors became entitled to the benefits of article 20, but they were never received by a large number who emigrated; that such articles were worth at that time $13.50 to each warrior, and that the whole amount claimed, by the failure of the United States to carry out the provision of said article 20, was $19,278.

It is further alleged that the Act of Congress [9] making appropriation for the expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with the various Indian Tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1846, approved March 3, 1845, 5 Stat. at L. 776, provided as follows:

"That of the scrip which has been awarded, or which shall be awarded, to Choctaw Indians under the provisions of the law of 23d August, 1842, that portion thereof not deliverable East, by the third section of said law, in these words, 'not more than one half of which shall be delivered to said Indian until after his removal to the Choctaw territory west of the Mississippi,' shall not be issued or delivered in the West, but the amounts awarded for land on which they resided, but which it is impossible for the United States now to give them, shall carry an interest of 5 per cent, which the United States will pay annually to the reservees under the Treaty of 1830, respectively, or to their heirs and legal representatives, forever, estimating the land to which they may be entitled at one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre."

That the Choctaw heads of families and their children became entitled to receive scrip for 697,600 acres of land, valued at $872,000; that said Choctaw heads of families, their heirs and legal representatives, became entitled to interest thereon from March 3, 1845; but the United States refused to pay such interest unless the person entitled to receive it was at the date of the passage of said Act settled in the Choctaw territory west of the Mississippi River, and also refused to pay such interest on scrip issued subsequent to March 3, 1845, until the beneficiary had removed to the Choctaw territory; that those persons for whose benefit the scrip was funded were entitled to interest on such funded scrip from March 3, 1845, until July 21, 1852, but the United States did not pay the interest on such funded scrip between those dates; and that the amount of such interest due from the United States was $305,551, but only $171,400.34 of interest was paid on such scrip, leaving due thereon $134,150.66.

[10] It is further alleged that the Choctaw Nation, by the fourth article of the Treaty of October 18, 1820, was secured in the right to occupy and enjoy forever the lands retained east of the Mississippi River, which were by the provisions of said article to be set apart to each family or member of the Choctaw Nation, when that Nation should become so civilized and enlightened as to be made citizens of the United States; that the United States agreed, by the seventh article of the Treaty of 1825, not to apportion said lands for the benefit of the Choctaw Nation, but with the consent of that Nation; that the legal effect of said article 4 of the Treaty of 1820, and of article 7 of the Treaty of 1825, was to secure to the heads of families and individual members of the Choctaw Nation a title in fee simple to all lands belonging to that Nation not included in the cession made by the Treaty of 1820, but that the United States having, by the Treaty of 1830, disregarded the obligations of said articles 4 and 7, and having paid for said lands ceded by the Choctaw Nation, under the Treaty of 1830, an inadequate consideration, the Choctaw Nation was entitled to be paid by the United States the whole amount of the proceeds resulting from the sale of said lands so ceded.

It is further alleged that the Choctaw Nation, by its Legislative Assembly, on November 9, 1853, created a delegation to settle all unsettled business with the United States; that on the 22d of June, 1855, the United States entered into a Treaty with the Choctaw Nation to settle and adjudicate all matters of difference, claims or demands of that Nation, or individual members thereof; that subsequent to the ratification of said Treaty by the United States, the Senate of the United States entered upon the examination and adjudication of the questions submitted to it by article 11 of that Treaty; whereupon a statement of the claims and demands of the Choctaw Nation upon the United States, with supporting evidence, was presented to the Senate to enable it to give such claims a just, fair and liberal consideration; that after consideration of such claims, the Senate, on the 9th of March, 1859, passed a resolution to allow the Choctaws the proceeds [11] of the sale of such lands as had been sold by the United States on January 1, 1859, deducting therefrom the cost of survey and sale, and all proper expenditures and payments under the Treaty of 1830, excluding the reservations allowed and secured, and estimating the scrip issued in lieu thereof at $1.25 per acre, and that they be allowed 12½ cents per acre for the residue of said lands.

It is further alleged that, in pursuance of said resolution, the Secretary of the Interior caused an account to be stated between the United States and the Choctaw Nation, showing that the United States were indebted to said Nation, on account of the net proceeds of the lands ceded by the Treaty of September, 1830, in the sum of $2,981,247.30.

It is also alleged that, under the Treaty of June 22, 1855, in consideration of the claims heretofore stated, and of the cession and lease of 15,000,000 acres of land, valued at $2,225,000, the United States agreed that all the rights and claims of the Choctaw Nation, and the individuals thereof, and all matters in dispute, should receive a just, fair and liberal consideration and settlement; that by virtue thereof the Choctaw Nation became entitled to a settlement of and payment for all their pending rights and claims, individual and national, free from all waivers or estoppels which might in equity have been interposed against them; and that, by virtue of article 11 of the Treaty of June, 1855, and of the consideration paid to the United States therefor, the Choctaw Nation became entitled, by virtue of article 18 of the Treaty of 1830, whenever well founded doubts should arise, to have said Treaty construed most favorably toward the Choctaws.

In said petition the Choctaw Nation prays that the award of the Senate of the United States be made final, and that the account stated by the Secretary of the Interior may be restated, in order that the balance due may be determined and the following errors corrected; that the proceeds of the lands sold up to January 1, 1859, and the residue then remaining unsold, at 12½ cents per acre, amounted to $8,418,418.61, instead of $8,078,614.80; that the actual cost of survey and sale was $256,387.74, instead of $1,042,313.96; that the sum of $120,826.76 for reservations to orphans was not deducted, included in or connected with the aggregate fund against which it is charged in said account; that there should not [12] have been deducted from said aggregate fund the payments made to meet contingent expenses of the commissioners appointed to adjust claims under the 14th article of the Treaty of September, 1830, amounting to $51,320.79, nor the expenses growing out of the location and sale of Choctaw reservations, and perfecting titles to the same, amounting to $21,408.36; that the correction of the foregoing errors would show a balance payable to the Choctaw Nation, under the award of the Senate, of $4,295,533.24, instead of $2,981,247.30; for which sum the Choctaw Nation prays judgment, after deducting $250,000 paid on account of said award under the Act of March 2, 1861, and the further sum of $250,000 in bonds appropriated by said Act; and also prays that interest be allowed on this latter sum at 6 per centum per annum from March 2, 1861, until paid.

It is further alleged that, under the Act of Congress approved March 2, 1861, the Choctaw Nation became entitled to receive from the United States $250,000 in bonds bearing interest at 6 per centum per annum, as a payment on account of said award of the Senate of the United States; that the issue and delivery of said bonds was demanded by the Choctaw Nation in April, 1861, but said bonds were not and never have been issued and delivered to it, nor has it received from the United States any payment of money in lieu of said bonds; that said Choctaw Nation claims from the United States on account of said award the said sum of $250,000, with interest at 6 per centum per annum from the date when demand for said bonds was made until paid; that the claims of the Choctaw Nation against the United States, but for the adjudication thereof by the Senate, would amount to $8,432,849.78, for which the Choctaw Nation would be entitled to recover judgment, with interest at 5 per centum, from September 27, 1830; and that there remains due and payable to the Choctaw Nation from the United States on account of the award of the Senate, after deducting therefrom the said sum of $500,000, the sum of $8,795,533.24, on which the Choctaw Nation claims interest at 5 per centum per annum.

It is also alleged that between July 1, 1861, [13] and July 1, 1866, there became due from the United States to the Choctaw Nation, under various treaty stipulations made prior to July 1, 1861, the sum of $406,284.93, of which amount it is admitted the United States may legally retain $346,835.61, leaving a balance due of $59,449.32.

It is further alleged that the questions of difference existing between the Choctaw Nation and the United States result from the non-fulfillment of treaty stipulations, and relate exclusively to claims which can now only be satisfied by the payment of such sums as the United States ought under its treaties to pay to said Choctaw Nation, which are as follows: (1) claims upon the basis of the Senate award, and of the correctness of the account stated by the Secretary of the Interior May 8, 1860, amounting to $2,958,593.19, with interest on the balance due on the award of the Senate at 5 per cent, and on the bonds authorized by Congress at 6 per cent, until paid; (2) amount due under the award, after correcting errors in the account stated by the Secretary of the Interior $4,272,879.13, to which add interest on balance due under the award of the Senate from March 9, 1859, at 5 per cent, and on bonds authorized by Congress from March 2, 1861, at 6 per cent, until paid; (3) amount claimed in case the award of the Senate, under article 11 of the Treaty of June 22, 1855, should be set aside, $8,659,695.67, with interest on the fourteenth article claims of $7,808,668.80, from August 24, 1836, until paid; (4) claims of the Choctaw Nation against the United States, stated upon the principle that the United States retain the lands acquired by the Treaty of September 27, 1830, in trust for the benefit of the Choctaw Nation, and, as trustee, are bound to account for the value of said lands, after deducting therefrom the amounts paid to the Choctaw Nation on account of said lands.

The petition further prays that if none of the above methods of stating its claims against the United States are such as can be approved and sanctioned, and if the court may rightfully ignore the Senate award and examine the matter de novo, then the Choctaw Nation may be considered as having been required, in violation of the Treaties of October, 1820 and January, 1825, to cede to the United States the lands [14] described in the Treaty of September, 1830, and that the court will declare that the United States, from and after the Treaty of September, 1830, held such lands as the trustee for the benefit of the Choctaw Nation, and were bound to account for the proceeds resulting from the sale thereof; that the court will ascertain the amount realized by the United States from the sale of such lands, and cause an account to be stated in respect thereto, and charge against the same the value of all payments on account of said lands by the United States: that upon such accounting a judgment may be rendered for the balance found due, with interest thereon; and that the Choctaw Nation have judgment for the amount of the annuities due to it from July 1, 1861, to July 1, 1866, amounting to $59,449.32, and also for the sum of $167,896.57, being the value of the lands taken from the Choctaw Nation by the United States in locating the western boundary of the State of Arkansas.

The United States, in addition to a general denial, filed a special plea, alleging that by the 14th article of the Treaty of 1830 each Choctaw head of a family who desired to remain in Mississippi and become a citizen of the State was to be permitted to do so upon signifying his intention to the agent of the United States within six months from the ratification of the Treaty, whereupon he should be entitled to a reservation of land including his improvement, and should he live upon the land for five years thereafter, a grant in fee simple should issue to him. That within the six months 100 heads of Choctaw families signified their intention to remain and become citizens of the States and their names were registered. That on August 12, 1833, the ceded lands were directed to be sold, and an agent was appointed to locate the reservations of those intending to remain. That many who were not registered applied for reservations, but were not recognized; yet, it appearing that they had signified their intention in due time and been refused registry, the agent was directed to receive evidence and make provisional locations of lands the sale of which was suspended to await the action of Congress. That commissioners were appointed to adjust [15] the claims to reservations, and filed a report on June 16, 1845. That 143 heads of Choctaw families obtained reservations in the ceded territory, and 1,155 other Choctaw heads of families were found to be entitled to the benefits of article 14 of the Treaty, but the United States had disposed of the lands to which they would have been entitled so that it was impossible to give said Indians the quantity to which they were severally entitled. Said commissioners thereupon estimated the quantity of land to which each of said Indians would be entitled and allowed him for the same quantity, to be taken out of any public lands in the States of Mississippi, Louisiana, Alabama, or Arkansas, subject to entry at private sale. That 1,155 pieces of scrip, each representing one half the allowance of land were issued to those entitled thereto, and were accepted in part payment for the lands aforesaid; that the remaining 1,155 half pieces of scrip were reserved, and interest paid thereon valued at $1.25 per acre to those entitled thereto, until the principal of $872,000 was paid upon the execution of a final release of all claims of such parties under the 14th article of the Treaty. That thereby the claims of the 1,155 Choctaw heads of families were fully satisfied and discharged, and any further claim by or on behalf of them was forever barred. The plea prays that so much of the amended petition as sets forth a cause of action in behalf of said 1,155 Choctaw heads of families for the value of lands alleged to be due them be dismissed.

To this special plea the Choctaw Nation filed a replication on April 22, 1884, which in substance denied the validity of the alleged release mentioned in the plea, on the ground that the same was wrongfully exacted under circumstances that made it inequitable for the United States to insist upon it as a bar to the claims of the Choctaw Nation covered by it.

The case having been heard before the court of claims, the court, upon the evidence, found the facts, which are set out in much detail. It is only necessary here to state the following:

The War Department, then having charge of Indian affairs, on May 21, 1831, instructed Colonel Ward, the Indian agent in Mississippi, [16] on the subject of carrying into effect the Treaty of September 27, 1830. The correspondence between the departments and its agents is set out fully. On June 26, 1833, Mr. G. W. Martin was appointed by the War Department to make selections of the locations of land granted to the Choctaws under the 14th, 15th and 19th articles of the Treaty, and was instructed to call on Ward and Major Armstrong, also an agent of the United States, appointed under the Treaty, for the registry of the different classes so entitled. In pursuance of his instructions, Mr. Martin located claims and received evidence of claimants, and transmitted reports to the Secretary of War, with a list of 580 claims for reservations under the 14th article, and with affidavits as to forty claimants, showing imperfections in Ward's register, and that persons who sought to be registered were refused, and not permitted to do so.

It was found as a fact by the court of claims that Ward was unfit for the duties of the situation; that his conduct was marked by acts calculated to deter the Indians from making application; that he was abusive and insulting to them, preventing them thereby from making application under the 14th article of the Treaty, in order to necessitate their going west of the Mississippi. He insisted that the Indians had sold their land; that he had been instructed to induce as many as possible to go West; and that more had been registered than had been anticipated. After the 24th of August, 1831, the agents of the United States insisted that those whose names were not registered should go West, and that if they did not go soldiers would be sent to drive them out; that they would take their children from them; and many other threats were made by them.

On the 31st of July, 1838, about 5,000 of the Choctaw Indians still remained in Mississippi; notwithstanding the efforts of the removing agent of the Government to remove them, they remained, asserting their intention to do so, and claiming the benefit of the 14th article of the Treaty of 1830. It was the intention of those remaining east of the Mississippi to take the benefit of the 14th article of the Treaty.

It was also found by the court that the whole number of heads of families receiving land under the 14th article was 143; the number who [17] established their rights under the Act of Congress approved August 23, 1842, was 1,150; and the number disallowed by the commissioner was 292. The commissioner rejected the claims of 191 heads of families under that Act because they had no improvement on their reservations on the 27th of September, 1830, and did not reside on the same for five years continuously after said date. These 191 families complied, or attempted to comply, with the requirements of the 14th article within the time required by it, but were deprived of their rights under it by the agents of the United States. They were entitled to reservations amounting to 225,760 acres.

It was also found by the court that, under the provisions of the Act of Congress approved August 23, 1842, the United States, having failed to grant to said Choctaw heads of families the lands which they and their children claimed under said Treaty, and having disposed of the said lands, so that it was impossible to give said Choctaw heads of families the lands whereon they resided on the date of the Treaty of 1830, did, between June, 1843, and November, 1851, issue and deliver to the said 1,155 Choctaw heads of families, and to their children, the certificates or scrip provided for in said Act, for 1,404,640 acres of land, which certificates or scrip the said Choctaw heads of families and their children were required by the United States to receive and accept in lieu of the reservations of land which, under the said 14th article of the Treaty, they claimed. The United States refused to deliver to the said Choctaw heads of families and their children that one half of the scrip which might have been delivered to them under the provisions of the said Act of Congress, east of the Mississippi River, until the said Choctaw heads of families and their children had either started for, or actually arrived in, the Choctaw territory west of the Mississippi River.

Under the Act of Congress approved March 3, 1845, 607,600 acres in the said certificates or scrip, so directed to be delivered to the 1,155 Choctaw heads of families and their children, were funded at the value of $1.25 per acre, with interest payable thereon annually forever at the rate of 5 per centum per annum; which specified number of acres in certificates funded under said Act, was that part of said certificates which was not deliverable east to the said Choctaw heads of families and their children, and not until their arrival in the Choctaw territory west of the Mississippi River. This scrip, which was funded for the benefit of said Choctaw heads of families and their children, under the Act of Congress of March 3, 1845, was funded by the United States at the rate of $1.25 an acre, amounting to the sum of $872,000, which sum was paid to the said heads of families and their children, or their legal representatives, under the provisions of an Act of Congress approved July 21, 1852.

It was further found by the court of claims that the said Choctaw heads of families and their children, claimants under the 14th article of the Treaty of September, 1830, were reduced to a helpless condition of want, which rendered it practically impossible for them to contend with the United States in their requirement that the said Choctaw heads of families should accept and receive the scrip provided to be issued to them, in lieu of the reservations, by the Act of 1842; and the said scrip and the money paid to redeem the same were taken and accepted because they were powerless to enforce any demands against, or impose any conditions upon, the United States.

The Choctaw Nation, by its proper authorities, on November 6, 1852, executed and delivered to the United States the following instrument, for the purposes therein specified:

"Whereas, by an Act of Congress entitled 'An Act to Supply Deficiencies in the Appropriations for the Service of the Fiscal Year Ending the 30th Day of June, 1852,' all payments of interest on the amount awarded Choctaw claimants under the 14th article of the Treaty of Dancing Rabbit Creek for lands on which they resided, but which it is impossible to give them, shall cease, and that the Secretary of the Interior be directed to pay said claimants the amount of the principal awards in each case respectively, and that an amount necessary for this purpose be appropriated, not exceeding the sum of $872,000; and that final payment and satisfaction of said awards shall be first ratified and approved as a final release of all claims of such parties under the 14th [19] article of said Treaty, by the proper national authority of the Choctaws, in such form as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior: Now be it known, That the said general council of the Choctaw Nation do hereby ratify and approve the final payment and satisfaction of said awards, agreeably to the provisions of the Act aforesaid, as a final release of the claims of such parties under the 14th article of said Treaty."

On the 9th day of November, 1853, the Legislative Council of the Choctaw Nation provided for the appointment of a delegation which should represent said Nation in the settlement of all the unsettled claims and demands of said Nation or individual members thereof against the United States. The preamble to the joint resolution appointing that delegation recites that "The Choctaws were, and ever have been, dissatisfied with the manner in which the Treaty of Dancing Rabbit Creek was made, owing to the many circumstances which were created to force them into it, and owing to the exceeding small and inadequate amount which was given as payment for their country;" and that "a large number of claims on the United States, arising under the 14th and 19th and other articles of the Treaty of 1830, are still remaining unpaid;" and the said delegates were "clothed with full power to settle and dispose of, by treaty or otherwise, all and every claim and interest of the Choctaw People against the Government of the United States, and to adjust and bring to a final close all unsettled business" between said people and the Government of the United States.

This delegation opened negotiations with the United States, through the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, for a new treaty, by means of a communication in writing, dated on the 5th of April, 1854, which contained a general statement or survey of the condition of the relations then existing between the Choctaw Nation and the United States, and set out seriatim complaints against the Government, especially for causes of dissatisfaction arising under the Treaty of September 27, 1830, claiming that scarcely one of the stipulations of that Treaty had been carried out by the Government, so as to do justice according to the intent of the Treaty. They especially alleged that the laws [20] passed for the examination of their claims under said Treaty, and the 14th article thereof, prescribed a course of adjudication of so rigid and technical a character as necessarily to exclude many just claims; that many were compelled to remove because of the failure of the Government to give them their rights under the said article, and that the law unjustly cut off such persons from the benefits of it; that the scrip issued under the law was paid in such a manner as to make it of but little value to the Indian; and that those who received anything received but a mere pittance. They contended that many claims existed unadjusted and unpaid under the 19th article; and proposed to make arrangement for final adjustment of all matters, national and individual, in a new treaty, by which the Nation proposed to pay all individual claims under the 14th and 19th articles, and release the Government of the United States from all responsibility on that account, because such claims were not susceptible of proof against the United States, but could be adjusted by the authorities of the Nation, provided the Nation could effect such a settlement with the United States as the Choctaw People desire. They claimed that under the Treaty of September 27, 1830, the Choctaw Nation was entitled to the funds arising from the sale of lands ceded, after deducting the expenses of sale, and the debt mentioned in said Treaty; that the Government of the United States was a trustee for the Choctaw Nation in the sale of the lands ceded by that Treaty, so that, after the payment of the expenses incident to the execution of the trust, the Indians were entitled to the remainder; and they proposed that the payment to the Nation of such remainder should operate in law as a satisfaction of the individual claims under a new treaty.

Upon the basis of this communication, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs instructed the agent of the United States for the Choctaws to make the requisite inquiry and investigation to ascertain the character and extent of their claims, and what arrangement was necessary to accomplish the object in view. The agent of the United States for the Choctaws submitted [21] to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in answer to this reference, a paper containing a comparative estimate or approximate statement of the claims then asserted by the Choctaw commissioners, which statement had been furnished by the Choctaw delegation to said agent. The aggregate amount of these claims so stated was $6,599,230, which it was proposed to settle on the principle of allowing the net proceeds of the sales of the lands ceded to the United States by the Choctaw Nation under the Treaty of September 27, 1830; the whole showing the balance claimed to be due to the Choctaws to be $2,880,701. The agent of the United States, in his communication to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, referring to said statement, said: "I have examined this statement carefully, and from the most reliable information I am possessed of, obtained in the Choctaw country and here, I am inclined to think that part of it embracing the extent of the obligations under the Treaty is as nearly correct as it could be made at this date."

The amount of the obligations under the Treaty, thus referred to, was placed in said statement at $6,599,230. These negotiations between the Choctaw delegation and the executive authorities of the United States were conducted with reference to the accomplishment of the following objects:

1. That the United States should provide, in a new treaty, for an examination and settlement of all the claims of the Choctaws, whether national or individual, under the Treaty of 1830, as specified in the letter of the Choctaw delegation to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, dated April 5, 1854.

2. That the Choctaws should adjust their disputes with the Chickasaws; should lease to the United States all that portion of their common territory between the 98th and 100th degree of west longitude, for the permanent settlement of the Wichita and such other bands of Indians as the United States might desire to locate therein; and should absolutely and forever quitclaim and relinquish to the United States all their right, title, and interest in and to any and all lands west of the 100th degree of west longitude. [22]

These negotiations resulted in the Treaty of 1855, which was ratified by the Senate of the United States on the 21st of February, 1856, and proclaimed by the President on March 4 of the same year. 11 Stat. at L. 611. The preamble to that Treaty recites that "The Choctaws contend that by a just and fair construction of the Treaty of September 27, 1830, they are, of right, entitled to the net proceeds of the lands ceded by them to the United States under said Treaty, and have proposed that the question of their right to the same, together with the whole subject matter of their unsettled claims, whether national or individual, against the United States, arising under the various provisions of said Treaty, shall be referred to the Senate of the United States for final adjudication and adjustment."

By the terms of that Treaty, a division of their common lands was made between the Choctaws and the Chickasaws, and the Choctaws relinquished to the United States all their lands west of the 100th degree of west longitude, and the Choctaws and the Chickasaws together leased to the United States all that portion of their common territory west of the 98th degree of west longitude, for the permanent settlement of the Wichita and such other tribes or bands of Indians as the Government of the United States might desire to locate therein. The 11th and 12th articles of said Treaty are as follows:

"Article 11. The Government of the United States, not being prepared to assent to the claim set up under the Treaty of September the twenty-seventh, eighteen hundred and thirty, and so earnestly contended for by the Choctaws as a rule of settlement, but justly appreciating the sacrifices, faithful services, and general good conduct of the Choctaw People, and being desirous that their rights and claims against the United States shall receive a just, fair, and liberal consideration, it is therefore stipulated that the following questions be submitted for adjudication to the Senate of the United States:

"First. Whether the Choctaws are entitled to, or shall be allowed, the proceeds of the sale of the lands ceded by them to the United States by the Treaty of September the twenty-seventh, eighteen hundred and thirty, deducting therefrom the cost of their survey and sale, and all just and proper expenditures and payments under the provisions of said Treaty; and, if so, what price per acre shall be allowed to the Choctaws for the lands remaining unsold, in order that a final settlement with them may be promptly effected. Or, [23]

"Second. Whether the Choctaws shall be allowed a gross sum in further and full satisfaction of all their claims, national and individual, against the United States; and, if so, how much.

"Article 12. In case the Senate shall award to the Choctaws the net proceeds of the lands ceded as aforesaid, the same shall be received by them in full satisfaction of all their claims against the United States, whether national or individual, arising under any former treaty; and the Choctaws shall thereupon become liable and bound to pay all such individual claims as may be adjudged by the proper authorities of the Tribe to be equitable and just—the settlement and payment to be made with the advice and under the direction of the United States agent for the Tribe; and so much of the fund awarded by the Senate to the Choctaws, as the proper authorities thereof shall ascertain and determine to be necessary for the payment of the just liabilities of the Tribe, shall, on their requisition, be paid over to them by the United States. But should the Senate allow a gross sum, in further and full satisfaction of all their claims, whether national or individual, against the United States, the same shall be accepted by the Choctaws, and they shall thereupon become liable for, and bound to pay, all the individual claims as aforesaid, it being expressly understood that the adjudication and decision of the Senate shall be final."

In pursuance of the eleventh article of the Treaty, the questions submitted to the Senate of the United States were answered by a Resolution of the Senate passed on the 9th of March, 1859, as follows:

"Resolved, That the Choctaws be allowed the proceeds of the sale of such lands as have been sold by the United States on the first day of January last, deducting therefrom the costs of their survey and sale, and all proper expend- [24] itures and payments under said Treaty excluding the reservations allowed and secured, and estimating the scrip issued in lieu of reservations at the rate of $1.25 per acre; and further, that they be also allowed twelve and a half cents per acre for the residue of said lands."

In reference to this award of the Senate, the court of claims, in the finding of fact, says: "The consideration which was given by the Senate to the subject matter so submitted to it by the said eleventh article of the said Treaty, and to the evidence which was so presented to,

and taken and considered by, the Senate, was full, fair and impartial, and its adjudication, as made under the said article, was not influenced or affected by, and was in no way or degree the result of, any fraud, corruption, partiality, and there is no evidence tending to show that it was the result of surprise or mistake on the part of the Senate, or any member thereof."

On the 9th of March, 1859, the Senate of the United States also adopted a Resolution for the purpose of ascertaining the amount due the Choctaw Nation under their award, as follows: "Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior cause an account to be stated with the Choctaws showing what amount is due them according to the above prescribed principles of settlement, and report the same to Congress." And the Secretary of the Interior, in compliance with the mandate of said Resolution, did, on the 8th of May, 1860, transmit to Congress a statement of account with the Choctaw Nation. The account shows, as the proceeds of the sales of the Choctaw lands up to January 1, 1859, together with the residue of said lands unsold at that date, at 12½ cents per acre, an amount in all of $8,078,614.80, from which was to be deducted the whole amount of charges, equal to $5,097,367.50, leaving a balance due to the Choctaws of $2,981,247.30.

On the 9th day of January, 1861, the Choctaw Nation, by its memorial addressed to Congress, demanded payment from the United States of the amount claimed to be due to it under said award. By the provisions of the Act of March 2, 1861, the Indian Appropriation Act, 12 Stat. at L. 238, there was paid to the Choctaw Nation the sum of $250,000 on account of their claim. The bonds for the additional sum of $250,000, which were by that Act directed to be issued and delivered to said [25] Choctaw Nation on account of said claim, were never issued or delivered to it, although demand for the same was made upon the Secretary of the Treasury by them on the 4th of April, 1861.

Upon the findings of fact, the court of claims found a balance due the Choctaw Nation from the United States of $408,120.32, made up of various claims arising under the Treaty of 1830, and for the value of land taken in fixing the boundary between the State of Arkansas and the Choctaw Nation, deducting the payment made, under the Act of 1861, of $250,000. In reaching this conclusion the court of claims rejected the award of the Senate, under the Treaty of 1855, as having no effect in law, and excluded the consideration of all claims covered by the release executed by the Choctaw Nation on November 6, 1852.

Mr. Justice Matthews delivered the opinion of the court:

The general purpose of this suit is a judicial settlement of all existing controversies between the Choctaw Nation and the United States. The specific claims of the Choctaw Nation are stated in the petition in the alternative. It is claimed, in the first instance, that the award of the Senate, and the amount found due as a balance upon the account between the parties, stated upon the principles of that award, should either be enforced as a finality by the judgment of the court in the present case, or that if not technically enforceable as an award, it still furnishes a rule for an equitable settlement of the differences between the parties. But, in the second place, it is claimed that if the award cannot be considered in either of these lights, then the whole controversy and all questions involved in it, from the beginning, under any of [26] the treaties between the parties, are open for investigation and decision upon their original merits. And under this head the Choctaw Nation claim compensation for various breaches on the part of the United States of the Treaty of September 27, 1830; and, in general, such a failure on its part to comply with its provisions as in substance deprived the Choctaw Nation of all the benefits intended to be conferred by it, for which it is claimed they are entitled to an equitable equivalent as compensation.

In respect to so much of the petitioner's case as rests upon specific failures to comply with the provisions of article 14 of that Treaty, as to those Choctaw heads of families who claimed reservations within its terms and did not receive them, the Government of the United States relies upon the release executed by the Choctaw Nation in pursuance of the requirements of the Act of July 21, 1852, under which a payment of $872,000 was made in satisfaction of the amounts awarded the Choctaw claimants under that article of the Treaty of 1830.

The court of claims, as it appears, declined to give any legal effect whatever to the award made by the Senate under the Treaty of 1855, feeling constrained to that conclusion by the terms of the Act of March 3, 1881, conferring jurisdiction upon it in this suit, and on the other hand, it gave all the effect claimed by the United States for the release under the Act of 1852. Its judgment in favor of the Choctaw Nation was made up as follows:

For claims under the 14th article of the Treaty of 1830, not covered by the release of 1852.....	$417,656.00
For claims under the 19th article of the Treaty of 1830.....	42,920.00
For land taken in fixing the boundary of the State of Arkansas and the Choctaw Nation.....	68,103.00
For transportation and subsistence under the Treaty of 1830.....	51,993.00
For unpaid annuities.....	59,449.32
For guns, ammunition, etc.....	18,000.00
Total.....	$658,120.32 [27]

And credited the balance thus found due with a payment made under the Act of March 2, 1861, of $250,000.

In reviewing the controversy between the parties presented by this record, it is important and necessary to consider and dispose of some preliminary questions. The first relates to the character of the parties, and the nature of the relation they sustain to each other. The United States is a sovereign Nation, not suable in any court except by its own consent, and upon such terms and conditions as may accompany that consent, and is not subject to any municipal law. Its Government is limited only by its own Constitution, and the Nation is subject to no law but the law of nations. On the other hand, the Choctaw Nation falls within the description in the terms of our Constitution, not of an independent State or sovereign Nation, but of an Indian Tribe. As such, it stands in a peculiar relation to the United States. It was capable under the terms of the Constitution of entering into treaty relations with the Government of the United States, although, from the nature of the case, subject to the power and authority of the laws of the United States when Congress should choose, as it did determine in the Act of March 3, 1871, embodied in section 2079 of the Revised Statutes, to exert its legislative power.

As was said by this court recently in the case of the United States against Kagama, 118 U. S. 375, 383 [ante, 228]: "These Indian Tribes are the wards of the Nation; they are communities dependent on the United States; dependent largely for their daily food; dependent for their political rights. They owe no allegiance to the States and receive from them no protection; because of the local ill feeling, the people of the States where they are found are often their deadliest enemies. From their very weakness and helplessness, so largely due to the course of dealing of the Federal Government with them, and the treaties in which it has been promised, there arises the duty of protection, and with it the power. This has always been recognized by the Executive, by Congress, and by this court, whenever the question has arisen."

It had accordingly been said in the case of Worcester v. Georgia, 6 Peters, 582 [31 U. S. bk. 8, L. ed. 508]: "The language used in [28] treaties with the Indians should never be construed to their prejudice. If words be made use of which are susceptible of a more extended meaning than their plain import as connected with the tenor of the treaty, they should be considered as used only in the latter sense. * * * How the words of the treaty were understood by this unlettered people, rather than their critical meaning, should form the rule of construction."

The recognized relation between the parties to this controversy, therefore, is that between a superior and an inferior, whereby the latter is placed under the care and control of the former, and which, while it authorizes the adoption on the part of the United States of such policy as their own public interests may dictate, recognizes, on the other hand, such an interpretation of their acts and promises as justice and reason demand in all cases where power is exerted by the strong over those to whom they owe care and protection. The parties are not on an equal footing, and that inequality is to be made good by the superior justice which looks only to the substance of the right, without regard to technical rules framed under a system of municipal jurisprudence, formulating the rights and obligations of private persons, equally subject to the same laws.

The rules to be applied in the present case are those which govern public treaties, which, even in case of controversies between nations equally independent, are not to be read as rigidly as documents between private persons governed by a system of technical law, but in the light of that larger reason which constitutes the spirit of the law of nations. And it is the treaties made between the United States and the Choctaw Nation, holding such a relation, the assumptions of fact and of right which they presuppose, the acts and conduct of the parties under them, which constitute the material for settling the controversies which have arisen under them. The rule of interpretation already stated, as arising out of the nature and relation of the parties, is sanctioned and adopted by the express terms of the treaties themselves. In the eleventh article of the Treaty of 1855, the Government of the United States expresses itself as being desirous that the rights and claims of the Choctaw People against the United States "shall receive a just, fair and liberal consideration."

The language of the Act of March 3, 1881, [29] conferring jurisdiction in the present case, also requires construction. It confers jurisdiction upon the court of claims to try all questions of difference arising out of treaty stipulations with the Choctaw Nation, and to render judgment thereon. How far the settlement of these differences is to be affected by the various Acts of Congress referred to in the pleadings and findings of fact made by the court of claims, and which were passed professedly in execution of treaty obligations on the part of the United States, must be determined. These Acts of Congress, in one aspect, have the force of law, because Congress has full power of legislation over the subject; but, in so far as they may have proceeded upon insufficient or incorrect interpretations of the treaty rights of the Choctaw Nation, or in so far as they may have attempted to modify or disregard those rights, they form the very subjects of complaint on the part of the Choctaw Nation, whose allegation is that the United States, by these very statutes, as in other particulars, have broken their treaty obligations. Where, in professed pursuance of treaties, these statutes have conferred valuable benefits upon the Choctaw Nation, which the latter have accepted, they partake of the nature of agreements—the acceptance of the benefit, coupled with the condition, implying an assent, on the part of the recipient to the condition, unless that implication is rebutted by other and sufficient circumstance. Under the terms of the Act of March 3, 1881, in exercising the jurisdiction thereby conferred, the court of claims is empowered to review the entire question of differences de novo, which may be interpreted to imply that the whole matter was opened from the beginning, with the view of determining what the original treaty rights of the Choctaw Nation were, and how far they have been performed by the United States in its various transactions with them, including the acts done under the authority of the statutes referred to. The meaning of this clause becomes most important, however, in connection with the question, how the court is authorized to deal with the award made by the Senate of the United States in pursuance of the Treaty of 1855.

It is contended on the part of the Choctaw Nation that that award is final and conclusive; [30] and in support of that contention reference is made to the express provisions of the Treaty of 1855. It is recited in the preamble of that Treaty that the Choctaws have proposed that their claims against the United States, arising under the various provisions of the Treaty of September 27, 1830, shall be referred to the Senate of the United States for final adjudication and adjustment; and by the terms of the twelfth article of the Treaty it is declared to be "expressly understood that the adjudication and decision of the Senate shall be final;" and the right to insist upon the conclusive nature of this award, it is said, is a treaty right in favor of the Choctaw Nation.

On the other hand, it is declared by the Act of March 3, 1881, that, in the exercise of its jurisdiction to try this case, the court of claims "shall not be estopped by any action had or award made by the Senate of the United States in pursuance of the Treaty of 1855;" and it is insisted, on behalf of the United States, that this language is inconsistent with the idea that the court should give to that award any legal effect whatever. And this construction is supposed to be rendered necessary by the previous clause, which grants power to the court to review the entire question of differences de novo; for it is said that the court cannot review the question of differences de novo, that is, from the beginning, and as if they were new and had freshly arisen, if it gives any effect to a determination of the Senate, which it is claimed operates as res judicata, foreclosing further inquiry into the merits of the very questions to be reviewed.

If the words conferring the power to review the question of differences de novo are permitted to have that force, it is difficult to understand how the release made by the Choctaw Nation in pursuance of the Act of Congress of July 21, 1852, should stand in the way of a reconsideration of the claims covered by it. That Act of Congress, it is true, declares that the final payment and satisfaction of the sum thereby appropriated and paid, should, when ratified and approved by the proper national authority of the Choctaws, operate as a final release of all
[31] claims of those to whom such payments are made, under the fourteenth article of the Treaty of September 27, 1830. But whether that payment was a just and fair extinguishment of those claims, according to the terms of that Treaty was one of the very questions in dispute. And it is not unreasonable to contend, as it is contended on behalf of the Choctaw Nation, that the effect of that release should be considered in view of the circumstances under which it was executed, and in reference to which the court of claims has found, in the sixteenth finding, that "The claimants under the fourteenth article, the said Choctaw heads of families and their children, were reduced to a helpless condition of want, which rendered it practically impossible for them to contend with the United States in their requirement that the said Choctaw heads of families should accept and receive the scrip provided to be issued to them in lieu of the reservations by the Act of 1842; and the said scrip and the money paid to redeem the same were taken and accepted because they were powerless to enforce any demands against, or impose any conditions upon, the United States."

However this may be, the language of the Act of March 3, 1881, in reference to the award made by the Senate under the Treaty of 1855, does not abrogate it, and does not require, as a condition of the exercise of the jurisdiction conferred by the Act, that the court should entirely disregard it, giving it no effect whatever. It merely says that the court shall not be estopped by any action had or award made by the Senate in pursuance of that Treaty. The plain and literal meaning of this language is fully satisfied by holding that the award, considered as such, shall not, upon its face, be taken to be final and conclusive. There is nothing in the language to prevent the court from giving to that award effect as prima facie establishing the validity of the claim so far adjudged in favor of the Choctaw Nation, leaving to the representatives of the Government in this litigation the right not only to question the validity of the award, as such, upon any such grounds as might or should invalidate awards ordinarily, either at law or in equity, but also to attack it upon the merits, as a finding unsupported by proof, or unjust and unfair in view [32] of all the circumstances, and on that account not to be enforced. In that view, so much effect only would be given to it as to cast the burden of disproving its justice and fairness upon the United States in this suit. In that light and with that view it has been attacked in argument by the counsel for the United States, upon the proof contained in the case.

In the first place, it is objected that the award did not agree with the submission, and under that head it is argued that the first question submitted for adjudication to the Senate was whether the Choctaws were entitled to the proceeds of the sale of the lands ceded by them to the United States by the Treaty of September 27, 1830, and that there was no authority to allow to them such proceeds, unless the Senate should first find that they were entitled to them. And it is said that the Senate not only did not find that, as matter of law, the Choctaws were so entitled under the terms of the Treaty of September 27, 1830, but that, according to the report of the Committee on Indian Affairs, which was adopted by the Senate in the passage of the resolutions which contain the award itself, their title to those proceeds, considered as matter of law, was denied. We do not, however, think that the words of the question submitted to the Senate by the Treaty of 1855 are to be confined to a consideration of the question of a strict title to the proceeds of the sale of the lands, but that they plainly mean, whether the Choctaws, under all the circumstances, as a matter of justice and fair dealing, ought to receive such proceeds, whether as deducible from the terms of the Treaty or as merely a fair compensation to be awarded to them for its breaches by the United States. The language of the question is in the alternative; it is whether the Choctaws are entitled to or shall be allowed; and it was sufficient, in our judgment, to satisfy the terms of the submission, for the Senate to declare, as it did, that the Choctaws should be allowed the proceeds of the sale of the lands sold by the United States which had been ceded by the Choctaws under the Treaty of 1830; and we are, therefore, of opinion that the award cannot be avoided on this ground.

Second. It is next insisted that the award is [33] invalid because it is uncertain, inasmuch as while it determines that the Choctaws shall be allowed the proceeds of the sale of the lands ceded by the Treaty of 1830, and at the rate of 12½ cents an acre for the residue, it does not ascertain what those proceeds and the value of the residue amount to in the aggregate. But the award itself provided the means of reducing this uncertainty by a reference to the Secretary of the Interior, who was directed to cause the account to be stated with the Choctaws, showing what amount was due them according to the principle of settlement embraced in the award. It is not disputed but that the Secretary of the Interior was enabled by the records of his office to state such an account, and that in fact he has stated it. This reference to the Secretary of the Interior for the mere purpose of an account cannot be considered as a delegation of authority by the Senate to adjudicate any of the questions which had been submitted to it by the agreement of the parties. The stating of the account was merely in execution of the judgment; the principle on which it should proceed was fully, clearly and finally adjudged. Whatever exception might be taken to the account when rendered would not be different from such as in the usual course of equity practice might be taken to the report of a master to whom was referred the statement of an account, the principles of which had been previously settled by a decree of the court fixing and establishing the rights of the parties.

Third. It is also said that the award is invalid for lack of proper notice to the United States of the intended action of the arbitrator before proceeding to the adjudication. When it is considered that the Senate of the United States was the arbitrator, constituting, as it does, a branch of the legislative as well as of the treaty-making power of the Government of the United States, it can hardly be contended that the United States had no notice of proceedings taken by the Senate in pursuance of laws or treaties made by the United States.

Whatever force might otherwise be supposed to reside in these objections to the validity of the award are further answered by a reference to the terms of the Indian Appropriation Act [34] of March 2, 1861, 12 Stat. at L. 238, which enacts as follows: "For payment to the Choctaw Nation or Tribe of Indians, on account of their claim under the eleventh and twelfth articles of the Treaty with said Nation or Tribe made the twenty-second of June, 1855, the sum of five hundred thousand dollars; two hundred and fifty thousand dollars of which sum shall be paid in money; and for the residue the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause to be issued to the proper authorities of the Nation or Tribe, on their requisition, bonds of the United States, authorized by law at the present session of Congress: Provided, that in the future adjustment of the claim of the Choctaws, under the Treaty aforesaid, the said sum shall be charged against the said Indians."

This appropriation, and the payment which was made under it, would seem to have the effect of confirming the award of the Senate, for it makes an appropriation in part payment of it, and provides for the future adjustment of the claim of the Choctaws under it. It is true, as is insisted in argument, that no express mention is made in this Act of the award, and the claim of the Choctaw Nation is described as one arising under the eleventh and twelfth articles of the Treaty of 1855, but no possible claim could arise under those articles of that Treaty in behalf of the Choctaw Nation, except one to insist upon the arbitration and to enforce the award made, in pursuance of their terms. The whole object and scope of those articles of the Treaty is to provide for the submission to the arbitration of the Senate, and the execution of the award made under it. The future adjustment of the claims of the Choctaws mentioned in the proviso evidently refers to the division of the fund, ascertained by the report of the Secretary of the Interior, by which a portion was to be paid over to the Nation for the satisfaction of individual claimants, and the remainder retained by the United States as a trust fund, according to the 13th article of the Treaty of 1855.

It does not, therefore, give too much effect to the Act of March 2, 1861, to treat it as an Act of Congress confirming the validity of the Senate award. This view is very much strengthened by the terms of the Act of June 23, 1874, from which it appears that at that recent date Congress intended to treat the award of the Senate as valid and binding, and the report of the Secretary of the Interior as to the balance due to be final. The provision of that Act, 18 Stat. at L. 230, is as follows: "That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to inquire into the amounts of liabilities due from the Choctaw Tribe of Indians to individuals, as referred to in articles 12 and 13 of the [35] Treaty of June 22, 1855, between the United States and the Choctaw and Chickasaw Tribes of Indians, and to report the same to the next session of Congress, with a view of ascertaining what amounts, if any, should be deducted from the sum due from the United States to said Choctaw Tribe, for the purpose of enabling the said Tribe to pay its liabilities, and thereby to enable Congress to provide a fund to be held for educational and other purposes for said Tribe, as provided for in article 18 of the Treaty aforesaid."

The only further question, then, which can be claimed to be left open for adjudication in this suit by the terms of the Act of March 3, 1881, is, on the supposition that the award is prima facie evidence of the correctness of the claim thereby reduced to judgment, whether upon its merits it was fair, just and equitable, as a settlement between the parties of the matters in controversy, having regard to all the circumstances of the case. As already declared, it is the right of the United States to question its validity by questioning its justice; at the same time, the burden of proof is upon them to establish, by affirmative proof, the considerations which ought to constrain this court, as a matter of justice, altogether to disregard it.

Proceeding, then, to review the whole questions of difference between the parties de novo for this purpose, we are led to the conclusion that the principle of settlement adjudged by the Senate in its award, in pursuance of the 11th article of the Treaty of 1855, furnishes the nearest approximation to the justice and right of the case that, after this lapse of time, it is practicable for a judicial tribunal to reach. Our judgment to this effect is based upon the following considerations:

The situation and circumstances in which the parties were found at the time the Treaty [36] of September 27, 1830, was entered into, were these: By the previous Treaty of 1820, the policy of the United States therein declared, and the agreement between the parties, was "To promote the civilization of the Choctaw Indians, by the establishment of schools amongst them, and to perpetuate them as a Nation by exchanging for a small part of their land here," that is, in Mississippi, "a country beyond the Mississippi River, where all who live by hunting and will not work may be collected and settled together." It was also recited that it was "desirable to the State of Mississippi to obtain a small part of the land belonging to said Nation for the mutual accommodation of the parties." Accordingly, the Choctaws, by the Treaty of 1820, ceded to the United States a portion only of their lands in Mississippi.

By the 2d article of the Treaty it was declared that, "For and in consideration of the foregoing cession on the part of the Choctaw Nation, and in part satisfaction for the same, the commissioners of the United States, in behalf of said States," thereby ceded to said Nation a tract of country west of the Mississippi River, the boundaries of which were described. It was also declared by article 4 of that Treaty, that "The boundaries hereby established between the Choctaw Indians and the United States on this side of the Mississippi River shall remain without alteration until the period at which said Nation shall become so civilized and enlightened as to be made citizens of the United States, and Congress shall lay off a limited parcel of land for the benefit of each family or individual in the Nation."

By the Treaty of January 20, 1825, it was further stipulated that the 4th article of the Treaty of October 18, 1820, should be so modified as that Congress should not exercise the power of apportioning the lands for the benefit of each family or individual of the Choctaw Nation, and of bringing them under the laws of the United States, but with the consent of the Choctaw Nation. In the meantime, however, under the pressure of the demand for the settlement of the unoccupied lands of the State of Mississippi by emigrants from other States, the policy of the United States in respect to the Indian Tribes still dwelling within its borders underwent a change, and it became desirable by a new treaty to effect so far as practi- [37] cable the removal of the whole body of the Choctaw Nation, as a tribe, from the limits of the State to the lands which had been ceded to them west of the Mississippi River. To carry out that policy the Treaty of 1830 was negotiated.

By the 3d article of that Treaty the Choctaw Nation of Indians ceded to the United States the entire country they owned and possessed east of the Mississippi River, and agreed to remove beyond the Mississippi River as early as practicable, so that as many as possible of their people, not exceeding one half of the whole number, should depart during the falls of 1831 and 1832, and the residue follow during the succeeding fall of 1833. But, in order to induce the consent of the Choctaw Nation, as such, to the provisions of that Treaty, the United States entered into the obligations already specified and contained in its subsequent articles, particularly articles 14, 15 and 19, by which large reservations of land were made, so that under article 14 the head of every Choctaw family who desired to remain and become a citizen of the United States was entitled to do so, and thereupon became entitled to a reservation of a section of 640 acres of land for himself, and an additional half section for each unmarried child living with him over ten years of age, and an additional quarter section for each child under ten years of age, to adjoin his own location; with the further provision that if they resided upon said lands, intending to become citizens of the States, for five years after the ratification of the Treaty, a grant in fee simple should issue to them. The Choctaws, it appears, were very reluctant to emigrate from their old homes to their new ones, and a very much larger number than was expected manifested an intention to avail themselves of those provisions of the Treaty which entitled them to remain.

It is notorious as a historical fact, as it abundantly appears from the record in this case, that great pressure had to be brought to bear upon the Indians to effect their removal, and the whole Treaty was evidently and purposely executed, not so much to secure to the Indians the rights for which they had stipulated, as to effectuate the policy of the United States in re- [38] gard to their removal. The most noticeable thing, upon a careful consideration of the terms of this Treaty, is that no money consideration is promised or paid for a cession of lands, the beneficial ownership of which is assumed to reside in the Choctaw Nation, and computed to amount to over ten millions of acres. It was not an exchange of lands east of the Mississippi River for lands west of that river. The latter tract had already been secured to them by its cession under the Treaty of 1820.

It is true that by the 18th article of the Treaty of 1830 it is provided that, "For the payment of the several amounts secured in this Treaty, the lands hereby ceded are to remain a fund pledged to that purpose, until the debt shall be provided for and arranged. And, further, it is agreed that, in the construction of this Treaty, wherever well founded doubt should arise, it shall be construed most favorably towards the Choctaws." The only money payments secured by the Treaty, over and above the necessary expenditures in removing the Indians, in providing for their subsistence for twelve months after reaching their new homes, and paying for their cattle and their improvements, are: first, an annuity of $20,000 for twenty years, commencing after their removal to the west; and, second, the amount to be expended in the education of forty Choctaw youths for twenty years, and for the support of three teachers of schools for twenty years, together with the cost of erecting some public buildings, and furnishing blacksmiths, weapons and agricultural implements in addition to the several annuities and sums secured under former treaties to the Choctaw Nation and People. It is nowhere expressed in the Treaty that these payments are to be made as the price of the lands ceded; and they are all only such expenditures as the Government of the United States could well afford to incur for the mere purpose of executing its policy in reference to the removal of the Indians to their new homes. As a consideration for the value of the lands ceded by the Treaty, they must be regarded as a meager pittance.

It is, perhaps, impossible to interpret the language of this instrument, considered as a contract between parties standing upon an equal [39] footing and dealing at arm's length, as a conveyance of the legal title by the Choctaw Nation to the United States, to hold as trustee for the pecuniary benefit of the Choctaw People; and yet it is quite apparent that the only consideration for the transfer of the lands that can be considered as inuring to them is the general advantage which they may be supposed to have derived from the faithful execution of the Treaty on the part of the United States; and when, in that connection, it is considered that the Treaty was not executed on the part of the United States according to its just intent and spirit, with a view to securing to the Choctaw People the very advantages which they had a right to expect would accrue to them under it, it would seem as though it were a case where they had lost their lands without receiving the promised equivalent. In such a case, there is a plain equity to enforce compensation, by requiring the party in default to account for all the pecuniary benefits it has actually derived from the lands themselves. This is the solid ground on which the justice of the award of the Senate of the United States, under the Treaty of 1855 seems to us fairly to stand.

The committee of the Senate which reported the resolutions adopted by that body as the award under the Treaty of 1855 reached their conclusion upon the same premises. Their report discusses at length the various grounds on which the Choctaw Nation rightfully complained of the injurious character of the dealings of the United States with them under the Treaty, and concludes as follows:

"It being thus impossible to ascertain to how much the Choctaws would be entitled, on a fair and liberal settlement, for the damage and loss sustained by them, it seems to the committee that the only practical mode of adjustment is to give them the net proceeds of their lands, not on the ground that the letter of the Treaty entitles them to it, but that it is the only course by which justice can now be done them.

"And while, on the one hand, to award to the Tribe the net proceeds of their lands would surely be no more than just to them, because practically no regard is paid to actual value by [40] the United States in the sales of public lands; and undeniably the real market value of these lands which the Indians might have realized, if protected in their possession, was far greater than the price for which they actually sold; on the other hand, the United States would neither have lost, paid, nor expended anything whatever, but would only have refunded to the Choctaws the surplus remaining on hand of the proceeds of their own lands, after having repaid themselves every dollar expended for the benefit of the Choctaws; and that, after having had the use of this surplus for many years without interest, and when, according to the estimates of the General Land-Office, it would really amount to little more than half of what might be recovered in a court of equity, if the case were one between individuals, as will appear by the comparative statement hereto appended.

"The committee accordingly report the following resolutions, and recommend that they be adopted and made the award and judgment of the Senate upon the questions submitted by the Treaty of 1855."

The Secretary of the Interior found to be due to the Choctaw Nation, in his statement of account in conformity with the resolutions and decision of the Senate under the Treaty of 1855, the sum of $2,981,247.80. This balance was reached by crediting them with the proceeds of the sales of the lands ceded by them under the Treaty of September 27, 1830, made up to January 1, 1859, adding for the unsold residue of said lands their estimated value at 12½ cents per acre, amounting to $8,078,614.80 in the aggregate. Against this, deductions were charged, as follows: First, the cost of the survey and sale of the lands at 10 cents an acre; and, second, payments and expenditures under the Treaty; the whole amounting to, $5,097,367.50, resulting in the balance above stated. Some of the items charged as payments and expenditures in this account are objected to on the part of the Choctaw Nation in this suit, and we are asked to restate the account. If, however, we felt at liberty to enter into such an examination of this account, we see nothing in the evidence presented by the record to show that the items objected to were not properly chargeable. The result therefore, is to establish the balance found by the Secretary of the Interior as the true amount due, ascertained according to the principle adjudged by the Senate in its award, and which we have declared to be the equitable rule of settlement between the parties. From this is to be deducted the payment of $250,000 made under the Act of March 2, 1861.

This disposes of all questions of difference involved in this suit arising under treaties prior to that of 1855, except for unpaid annuities, ascertained by the court of claims to amount to the sum of $59,449.32, which is to be included in the judgment.

There is, however, another controversy arising under the Treaty of 1855. The first article of that Treaty fixed definitely the boundary of the territory ceded to the Choctaw Nation by the Treaty of 1820. It is found as a fact by the court of claims, that, in the location of the line which was surveyed under the authority of the United States, and fixed as the permanent boundary between the State of Arkansas and the Indian country by the Act of Congress of March 3, 1875, 18 Stat. at L. 476, the Government made a mistake, whereby they embraced in the territory appropriated by the United States as part of the public lands, $136{,}204\frac{94}{100}$ acres of Indian lands, the value of which, as ascertained by the court of claims, is $68,102. This is a just and valid claim, for which the petitioner is entitled to recover.

The final result is that the Choctaw Nation is entitled to a judgment against the United States for the following sums: First, $2,981,247.80, subject to the deduction of $250,000 paid under the Act of 1861; second, for unpaid annuities, $59,449.32; third, for lands taken in fixing the boundary between the State of Arkansas and the Choctaw Nation, $68,102.

The judgment of the Court of Claims is therefore reversed and the cause is remanded to that court, with instructions to enter a judgment in conformity with this opinion; and it is so ordered.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite dissenting:

I regret to find myself unable to agree to this judgment. If the United States had authorized suit to be brought against them on the [42] Senate award, I should not have hesitated about giving judgment in favor of the Choctaw Nation, upon the facts now found by the court below, for the full amount due according to the statement of the Secretary of the Interior That award has not, in my opinion, been abrogated by the bringing of this suit. It remains, so far as anything appears in this record, as valid and as binding to-day as it was when made. The United States have neglected to pay the amount awarded, but the Choctaw People have never, so far as this record shows, released them from their obligation to pay. On the contrary, it seems always to have been insisted upon.

This suit is not brought upon the award, but upon the Treaties, and it is to be determined, in my opinion, according to the legal rights of the parties now existing as fixed by the Treaties, without regard to anything that was done by the Senate under the Treaty of 1855. The language of the jurisdictional statute is this: "The court of claims is hereby authorized to take jurisdiction of and try all questions of difference arising out of treaty stipulations with the Choctaw Nation, and render judgment thereon; power is hereby granted the said court to review the entire question of differences de novo, and it shall not be estopped by any action or award made by the Senate of the United States in pursuance of the Treaty of 1855." This, as it seems to me, means no more than that the questions of difference are to be tried de novo, as far as the award is concerned. A judgment is to be rendered. This implies that the proceeding is to be judicial in its character, and that the judgment is to be in accordance with the principles governing the rights of parties in the administration of justice by a court. The Senate, however, were, by the Treaty of 1855, made arbitrators, and they were invested with power to determine whether the Choctaws were "entitled" legally to the proceeds of their lands, and, if not, whether they ought, under all the circumstances of the case, to be "allowed" such proceeds. The Senate could consider and act upon the moral obligations of the United States; but neither we nor the court of claims can do more than enforce their legal liabilities.

[43] What, then, are the legal obligations of the United States under the Treaties at this time, leaving the Senate award entirely out of view? The jurisdictional statute neither waives nor abrogates the release which was executed under the Act of July 21, 1852. The same is true of the Treaty of 1855. By the Act of 1852 payments were to be made in cash to claimants under the fourteenth article of the Treaty of 1830, for the amount of the scrip which had been awarded under the Act of August 23, 1842, but not delivered, provided "that the final payment and satisfaction of said awards shall be first ratified and approved as a final release of all claims of such parties under the fourteenth article." That release was executed on the 6th of November, 1852. The Treaty of 1855 recites that "The Choctaws contend that, by a just and fair construction of the Treaty of September 27, 1830, they are of right entitled to the net proceeds of the lands ceded by them to the United States under said Treaty, and have proposed that the question of their right to the same, together with the whole subject matter of their unsettled claims, whether national or individual, against the United States, arising under the various provisions of said Treaty, shall be referred to the Senate of the United States for final adjudication and adjustment." In view of this recital, we are to construe Article XI, of the Treaty, which is in these words:

"The Government of the United States not being prepared to assent to the claim set up under the Treaty of September the twenty-seventh, eighteen hundred and thirty, and so earnestly contended for by the Choctaws as a rule of settlement, but justly appreciating the sacrifices, faithful services, and general good conduct of the Choctaw People, and being desirous that their rights and claims against the United States shall receive just, fair, and liberal con- [44] sideration, it is therefore stipulated that the following questions be submitted for adjudication to the Senate of the United States:

"First. Whether the Choctaws are entitled to, or shall be allowed, the proceeds of the sale of the lands ceded by them to the United States, etc.," or

"Second. Whether the Choctaws shall be allowed a gross sum in further and full satisfaction of their claims, national and individual, against the United States; and, if so, how much."

Thus the whole matter was referred to the Senate to determine (1) whether the Choctaws were in law entitled to the proceeds of the sale of their lands, and, if not, then, (2) what, under the circumstances, would be a fair and liberal settlement of all the matters of difference, with the right under this branch of the submission to "allow" the Choctaws the proceeds, or a "gross sum" to be ascertained in some other way. The Senate decided that they were not entitled to the proceeds as a matter of right, but that, under all the circumstances, it would be fair and just to settle on that basis. Had the same power been granted to the court of claims, I should not hesitate to affirm a judgment to the full amount of the award if placed on that ground. But, as has been seen, the jurisdictional statute confines the jurisdiction of the courts in this suit to a determination of the legal rights of the parties. Under the Treaty the Senate could do what was fair and just, but we can only adjudge according to law.

This court agrees with the Senate committee in deciding that the Choctaws were not legally entitled to the proceeds of the land. In that I concur. The only inquiry, then, is, how much must be paid for the violation of the Treaty of 1830 by the United States. If the release stands, then there can only be a recovery for the unsettled claims of the Choctaws, national and individual. In my opinion, the release has not been invalidated as an instrument binding in law by the findings in the case. The United States may have taken advantage of the necessities of the Indians and exacted a hard bargain, but the bargain was made and both parties promptly carried it out. The Senate, under its powers, might take the hardship of this bargain into account and go behind the release, but, in my judgment, we cannot. All that remains, then, is to ascertain what is legally due from the United States on account of the national and individual claims not included in that settlement; and upon this I am entirely satisfied with what was done by the court of claims. I think the judgment should be affirmed.

v.

E. M. COBB.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 286-295.)

Place for sale of intoxicating liquors as a beverage, a nuisance—bill to abate—constitutionality of Statute of Iowa—conflict with Civil Rights Statutes, and Fourteenth Amendment to Constitution of United States.

Where a complaint in equity was filed in the District Court of the State of Iowa, under section 1543, Code of that State, as amended by the Twentieth General Assembly, alleging that the defendants (the appellants here), were keeping a place for the sale of intoxicating liquors as a beverage, and sold such liquors for such purpose, contrary to the law of the State, and asking that such place be declared a nuisance and abated, and that a preliminary injunction be issued, and the defendants filed their petition for removal of the cause to the Circuit Court of the United States, upon the ground that the statutes under which the proceedings were had and which the Supreme Court of Iowa had declared valid were in violation of the Civil Rights Law and the Constitution of the United States, especially the Fourteenth Amendment thereof, and such petition was granted, and upon motion of plaintiff in the circuit court, the case was remanded, upon the ground that no federal question was involved; upon appeal from that decree, this court being equally divided in opinion upon a motion made here by appellee, complainant below, to dismiss the appeal, and affirm the decree of the circuit court remanding the cause, such decree stands affirmed.

Submitted Oct. 12, 1886. Decided Oct. 25, 1886.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Iowa.

Affirmed.

On motion to dismiss.

On the 4th day of September, 1883, complainant, a citizen of Iowa, filed in the District Court of the State of Iowa, in and for Dubuque County, his complaint in equity, alleging that the defendants, who were and are citizens of Iowa, at their place of business in the City of Dubuque, Iowa, have established a saloon and place for the keeping and sale of intoxicating liquors; to wit, whisky, wine, gin and beer, and are keeping said liquors in said saloon, with the intent to sell the same therein as a beverage, contrary to the provisions of section 1542 of the Code of Iowa as amended and substituted by the Act of the Twentieth General Assembly of the State of Iowa, approved April 3, 1884; and further, that in the month of August, 1884, said defendants in their said saloon sold to divers and sundry persons intoxicating liquors, contrary to the provision of section 1540 of the Code of Iowa, as amended by said Twentieth General Assembly; and further, that said defendants at said saloon, have since the 15th day of July, 1884, by themselves, their agents and servants sold and continue from day to day to sell said liquors therein, to be drank as a beverage, contrary to law.

Complainant therefore prays that said saloon may be adjudged and decreed to be a nuisance, and that the same be abated, and said defendant be enjoined by preliminary injunction from further keeping or maintaining said saloon for the illegal sale of intoxicating liquors, and also from selling the same in said saloon, contrary to law; and that upon final hearing said injunction be made perpetual.

This action is brought under the provisions of section 1543 of said Code of Iowa, as amended by said Twentieth General Assembly, which enacts that in cases of the violation of the provision of section 1540, or section 1542 of said Code, prohibiting the selling or keeping for sale intoxicating liquors, contrary to law, the building in which such unlawful selling or keeping with intent to sell, is carried on, is a nuisance; and further provides that any citizen of the county in which such nuisance exists, or is kept or maintained, may maintain an action in equity to abate and enjoin the same.

On the twenty-first day of September, defendants filed in the state court their petition for removal to the Circuit Court of the United States, upon the ground that the statutes aforesaid were in violation of the Civil Rights Law, and the Constitution of the United States, especially the Fourteenth Amendment thereof.

Which petition was allowed and the case removed.

In the circuit court, defendants amended their petition for removal, and averred therein:

1. That they were, and for five years past have been, citizens of Iowa.

2. That long prior to July 4, 1884, they had been engaged in brewing beer and selling the same at wholesale, and have kept upon their premises a room and bar where said beer so manufactured is kept for sale at retail; which is the keeping of a saloon charged in the petition herein.

3. That they invested in said business of brewing and selling beer a large sum of money; to wit, the sum of ten thousand dollars, exclusive of costs, which will be rendered entirely worthless if plaintiff succeeds in this action.

4. That there has been no trial or final hearing of this case.

5. That plaintiff has filed his motion for a temporary injunction to restrain defendants from prosecuting their said business, which if allowed will work an irreparable injury to defendants.

6. That the Twentieth General Assembly of Iowa passed an Act which went into effect July 4, 1884, which renders highly penal the prosecution by defendants of their said business.

7. That under provisions of said Act defendants can be deprived of their property and punished with heavy penalties for being engaged in said business, without the right of a jury trial.

8. That the Supreme Court of Iowa has adjudged said Act valid and in full force.

9. That under said Act and said decision plaintiff is prosecuting this action.

10. That under said law, and especially under section 1526 of said Code as amended, defendants are denied the right to manufacture or sell beer for any purpose whatever, on account of their occupation.

11. That said law and said decision are in derogation of defendants' rights as guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States, and especially by the Fourteenth Amendment thereof, as they are thereby denied the equal protection of the law, and are deprived of liberty and property without due process of law.

13. That by said decision they are denied the equal protection of the laws of Iowa.

14. That said laws are null and void, as contrary to said Amendment, but the Supreme Court of Iowa has refused so to declare.

The plaintiff thereupon moved to remand said cause to the District Court of the State of Iowa.

1. Because the petition for removal fails to state facts showing that defendants were entitled to remove said action from the state court under the provisions of section 641 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

2. Because said petition fails to state facts sufficient to give the court jurisdiction of said action.

3. Because said petition fails to state facts showing that defendants are denied or cannot enforce in the judicial tribunals of the State of Iowa any rights secured to them by any law providing for the equal, civil rights of citizens of the United States, or of all persons within the jurisdiction of the United States, within the provisions and purview of section 641 of the Revised Statutes of the United States

4. Because said action was improperly removed from said state court, as it involves no dispute or controversy within the jurisdiction of this court.

The following order was thereupon entered:

"This day this cause coming on to be heard, upon the motion of complainant to remand the same to the state court, the complainant having by leave of court heretofore made, filed his amendment to his bill of complaint and the defendant, by leave of court heretofore given, having filed his amended petition for removal of said cause into this court, and the court, having read as well the amended pleadings of plaintiff, and the amended petition for removal, of defendant, and having considered the same, and having heard the said parties by their respective counsel, and being fully advised, grants said motion to remand made by said plaintiff, upon the ground that there is no federal question involved in said cause. It is therefore ordered, adjudged and decreed that said cause be remanded to the District Court in and for Dubuque County, Iowa, from which it came, and that the plaintiff recover his costs in this court against defendants; to all of which the defendants, by their counsel, then and there excepted.

And thereupon the defendants in open court filed their petition for appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States from said decree, and present for approval their supersedeas bond. The court, after argument by counsel for the respective parties, being fully advised, allows said appeal to the supreme court and approves said supersedeas bond, which is done accordingly.

Upon the cause being docketed in this court the appellee moved to dismiss said appeal for the reason that the circuit court had no jurisdiction of the cause; and to affirm the order, judgment and decree of said circuit court, for the reason that the record fails to show that any federal question is involved in said cause; and further, that it is manifest from the record that said appeal was taken for delay only, even in case it be held that this court has jurisdiction, as will appear from the brief statement herewith submitted.

Messrs. Fouke & Lyon and McCeney & O'Donnell, for appellants:

The only keeping of a saloon, of which the complainant complains, is the selling within the limits and upon the brewery premises, of the beer manufactured in the brewery erected long prior to the passage of the present law, and that the right to manufacture includes a right to dispose of the product of such manufacture; for the petition for removal states that the sale of the beer manufactured upon said premises is the keeping of a saloon alleged in the bill of complaint, and not other or different.

The difference between the facts in the Kansas case and this is simply that the Kansas man was refused a permit after application, while under the Iowa law he is in effect prevented from making application. He belongs to a class of persons to whom permits are absolutely denied.

State v. Walruff, 26 Fed. Rep. 178; Bartemeyer's Case, 18 Wall. 129 (85 U. S. bk. 21, L. ed. 929); Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 141 (24: 89); State v. Mugler, 29 Kan. 252; Lake View v. Rose Hill Cem. Co. 70 Ill. 192; Sinnickson v. Johnson, 17 N. J. L. 129; Gardner v. Newburgh, 2 Johns. The proposition ought not to be successfully challenged that the Fourteenth Amendment has extended federal jurisdiction, without limitation, over all classes of legislation by the State in which any attempt is made to take from a citizen his life, liberty, or property without due process of law, or which denies to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the law; and even the police power, when it attempts to deprive particular persons and classes of privileges enjoyed by other inhabitants, and inflicts burdens upon them which the public at large does not have to bear, it becomes obnoxious to the amendments of the Federal Constitution.

Matter of Jacobs, 98 N. Y. 98; People v. Otis, 90 N. Y. 48; Wynehamer v. People, 13 N. Y. 401; County of Santa Clara v. Southern Pac. R. Co. 18 Fed. Rep. 385; Kessinger v. Heickhouse, 27 Fed. Rep. 888; Mahin v. Pfeiffer, Id. 892.

In the decision of nearly all of the questions arising under this Fourteenth Amendment, the court itself has almost always been divided. Commencing with the Slaughter House Cases (Bk. 21, L. ed. 394), the opinion was delivered by five of the judges, the other four dissenting; and but one concurring judge is left upon the bench.

In Tennessee v. Davis, Strauder v. West Va., Virginia v. Rives, Ex parte Virginia, all reported in 100 U. S. (Bk. 25, L. ed. 648 et seq.), there has not been unanimity in the opinions pronounced. It cannot therefore be claimed that there is a fixed and unerring rule of decision upon the construction of this Amendment.

A federal question does not depend upon the validity of the claim set up under the Constitution or laws. It is enough if the claim involves a real and substantial dispute or controversy in the suit.

Cohens v. Va. 6 Wheat. 264 (19 U.S. bk. 5, L. ed. 257); Tennessee v. Davis, 100 U. S. 264 (25: 650); Ames v. Kansas, 111 U. S. 462 (28: 487); Starin v. New York, 115 U. S. 257 (29: 390); Southern Pac. R. R. Co. v. Cal. 118 U. S. (ante, 103); Yick Wo v. Hopkins, Id. 220.

Were these cases properly removable under section 641, Rev. Stat.? The facts of the petition must be taken as true, and they show that these petitioners, by the enactments complained of, are denied certain rights as citizens and inhabitants of the United States, residing in Iowa, that they can only maintain in a court of justice.

Yick Wo v. Hopkins and Tennessee v. Davis, supra; Strauder v. West Va. 100 U. S. 310 (25: 666).

Messrs. S. P. Adams, Jed Lake and M. H. Beach, for appellee:

All that is sought to be done in this proceeding is to compel defendants to close up their saloon, and cease to maintain the nuisance complained of. No punishment or penalty is sought to be inflicted, no property is taken, no liberty is restrained, except the liberty to maintain a nuisance, and that restraint is sought to be accomplished according to the forms of long established judicial proceedings. The only question properly raised by this record is whether the State has the right, under the Constitution of the United States, to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors at retail as a beverage. This has been affirmatively decided by this court.

TOWN OF OREGON, Plff. in Err.,

ELIZA JENNINGS. [74]

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 74-95.)

Municipal bonds—Illinois Statute—fraud and circumvention in execution of instruments—no application to fraud in consideration—recitals in bonds—town estopped by, when—filling vacancies in town board—election.

1. Under the Illinois Statute providing that fraud or circumvention used in obtaining the execution of certain instruments may be pleaded in bar to actions brought on such instruments by the guilty party or by an assignee, there must be a trick or device by which one kind of instrument is signed in the belief that it is of another kind, or the amount or nature or terms of the instrument must be misrepresented to the signer. Fraud affecting the consideration is insufficient.

2. Under the Statute of Illinois relating to the appointment of supervisors to fill vacancies, it is competent for the town clerk and one justice to fill a vacancy caused by the resignation of the supervisor, although there had been another justice of the town, such justice having resigned and no successor having been elected.

3. If the supervisor and town clerk, they being named in the statute under which the bonds were issued as the officers to sign the bonds and the "corporate authorities" to act for the town in issuing the bonds, decided, and so certified in the bonds, that the conditions prescribed by the popular vote had been complied with, such compliance being required by the constitutional and statutory provisions of the State, the town is estopped, as against a bona fide holder, from asserting that such conditions were not complied with.

4. An election conducted in the manner required for the election of town officers was an election within the meaning of the Illinois Act of March 30, 1869, providing that the election should be "held and conducted and return thereof made as is provided by law, and, in any village or city as is provided by the law under which the same is incorporated."

Submitted Oct. 19, 1886. Decided Nov. 15, 1886.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois.

Affirmed.

The case is stated by the court.

Mr. James K. Edsall, for plaintiff in error:

Amended second plea averred facts which show that the making and execution of the bonds and coupons in question was obtained by fraud and circumvention. This defense is based upon section 11, chap. 73, Rev. Stat. Ill., in force in 1870. The plea shows that the railroad company (knowing that it was not entitled to the bonds), through its attorney, president and directors, entered into a fraudulent conspiracy to confer color of authority as supervisor of the Town on their director Potter, in order to procure him to sign the bonds in behalf of the Town; and that the pretended appointment of Potter as supervisor and the execution of the bonds by him took place at the same time, and as parts of the same transaction it appears that aside from the question of fraud, Potter's appointment as supervisor was invalid. The statute then in force provided that, in case of a vacancy in any town office, "It shall be lawful for the justice of the peace" of the town, together with the supervisor and the town clerk, "to fill the vacancy by appointment under their hands and seals." William Schultz was one of the justices of the peace of the Town. He had tendered his resignation, but his successor had not been elected and qualified. Under the Constitution and laws of Illinois, a justice of the peace continues in office until his successor is elected and qualified, notwithstanding an attempted resignation.

People v. Barnett, 100 Ill. 332; Badger v. U. S. exrel. Bolles, 93 U. S. 599 (Bk. 23, L. ed. 991); Const. of 1848, art. IV, § 27; Const. of 1870, art. VI, § 32.

Schultz was therefore still in office, and one of the officers whom the people of the Town had the right to have consulted in respect to the filling of any supposed vacancy in the office of supervisor.

Crocker v. Crane, 21 Wend. 211, 218; Babcock v. Lamb and Doty, 1 Cow. 238; Louk v. Woods, 15 Ill. 262; Ex parte Rogers, 7 Cow. 526 and note; Williams v. School Dist. 21 Pick. 82; McCoy v. Curtice, 9 Wend. 17.

The third plea shows that the bonds and coupons in question were issued in violation of section 12, article IX of the State Constitution adopted in 1870, which prohibits municipal corporations from creating indebtedness to exceed 5 per cent on the assessed value of the taxable property therein. It is shown that when the bonds were issued the Town was already indebted in excess of the constitutional limitations, and that the bonds were not issued "in compliance with any vote of the people" of the Town, had prior to the adoption of the Constitution, within the purview of the saving clause of that section. The adoption of the State Constitution containing this section deprives the Town of all power to create any further indebtedness in excess of the constitutional limit, except so far as such power was reserved by the last paragraph of the section.

Buchanan v. Litchfield, 102 U. S. 278 (Bk. 26, L. ed. 138); School Dist. v. Stone, 106 U. S. 183 (Bk. 27, L. ed. 90); Litchfield v. Ballou, 114 U. S. 190 (Bk. 29, L. ed. 132); Prince v. City of Quincy, 105 Ill. 138, 215.

By the express terms of the vote the bonds were not to be issued, dated, or delivered, and "said vote and donation of $40,000 to be null and void unless said first division of said railroad shall be completed and equipped as aforesaid on or before the first day of January, A. D. 1871." It appears that the railroad company wholly failed to comply with the terms of the vote. The question as to whether power exists in a municipality to issue bonds and create indebtedness, may depend on extrinsic facts, not appearing on the face of the law.

Northern Bank v. Porter Tp. 110 U. S. 608 (Bk. 28, L. ed. 258); Dixon Co. v. Field, 111 U. S. 96 (Bk. 28, L. ed. 365); Merchants Bank v. Bergen Co. 115 U. S. 390 (Bk. 29, L. ed. 431); Daviess Co. v. Dickinson, 117 U. S. 657 (Bk. 29, L. ed. 1026).

The purchaser was bound to know from the terms of the Constitution itself that there was no power or authority to issue the bonds unless it could be done in compliance with the vote. He was bound to take notice of the terms of the vote which appeard of record.

Daviess Co. v. Dickinson, supra; Buchanan v. Litchfield, 102 U. S. 289 (Bk. 26, L. ed. 139); Dixon Co. v. Field, supra.

It was held by the Supreme Court of Illinois at its September Term, 1870, and before the bonds in question were issued, that a railroad corporation was not entitled to bonds of a town voted on conditions, without compliance with the vote.

People v. Dutcher, 56 Ill. 149.

This ruling has been constantly adhered to.

People v. Glann, 70 Ill. 232; People v. Holden, 91 Ill. 446; Middleport v. Ætna Life Ins. Co. 82 Ill. 562; People v Jackson, 92 Ill. 451; Town of Prairie v. Lloyd, 97 Ill. 191; Wade v. La Moille, 112 Ill. 79.

The supervisor and town clerk had no implied authority to waive compliance with the conditions prescribed by the vote of the people.

Rev. Stat. Ill. chap. 113, 17; Town of Eagle v. Kohn, 84 Ill. 292.

As to questions arising under the fourth plea the only vote taken was at a special town meeting, presided over by a moderator, and not at an election presided over by the three judges of election. The established construction of the statutes bearing on the question, in the state court is, that a vote taken at such town meeting is not a vote taken at an election within the meaning of such statutes; and consequently where the statute requires the vote to be taken at an election such vote taken at a town meeting is not a vote "under existing laws" as required by the saving clause to said section.

Chicago & I. R. Co. v. Mallory, 101 Ill. 583; Lippincott v. Pana, 92 Ill. 24.

The Town is not estopped by the recitals contained in the bonds from making the defenses now interposed. The recitals do not purport to show compliance with the vote of the people nor with the constitutional requirement in any respect, and cannot be so enlarged by construction as to embrace the same.

Buchanan v. Litchfield, 102 U. S. 292 (Bk. 26, L. ed. 141); School Dist. v. Stone and Northern Bank v. Porter Township, supra; Dixon Co. v. Field, 111 U. S. 83 (Bk. 28, L. ed. 360); Bates v. Ind. School Dist. 25 Fed. Rep. 192; Liebman v. San Francisco, 24 Fed. Rep. 711.

The supervisor and town clerk issuing the bonds were not authorized to decide, conclusively, the question as to whether these constitutional requirements had been complied with. The vote under which it is claimed the bonds were issued was taken June 23, 1870. If that vote was properly taken at a town meeting, then the moderator who presided at that meeting canvassed the vote and decided all questions pertaining thereto, and the clerk made a record thereof in the town records. If the vote should have been taken at an election, then the election returns, made by the judges thereof, constitute the records of such election. In no contingency was the supervisor or town clerk in office April 3, 1871 (when it is conceded the bonds in question were signed), authorized by law to make any decision as to the result or validity of an election held prior to July 2, 1870.

Mr. S. W. Packard, for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action at law brought in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern [75] District of Illinois, by Eliza Jennings, against the Town of Oregon, a municipal corporation in the County of Ogle and State of Illinois, to recover $13,510, the amount payable by 193 coupons of $70 each, cut from 24 bonds for $1,000 each, purporting to have been issued by that Town. The following is a copy of one of the bonds, all being alike except as to the number and the time when due.

"UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

No. 29. $1,000.

State of Illinois, County of Ogle

OREGON TOWN BOND.

Know all men by these presents, That the Town of Oregon, in the County of Ogle and State of Illinois, is indebted to the Ogle and Carroll County Railroad Company in the full and just sum of one thousand dollars, which sum of money said Town agrees and promises to pay on or before the first day of July, 1883, to the said Ogle and Carroll County Railroad Company, or bearer, with interest at the rate of seven per cent per annum, payable annually, on the first day of July, at the office of the Farmers' Loan and Trust Company of New York, in the City of New York, upon the delivery of the coupons severally hereto annexed, for which payment of principal and interest, [76] well and truly to be made, the faith, credit and property of said Town of Oregon are hereby solemnly pledged, under authority of an Act of the General Assembly of the State of Illinois, entitled 'An Act to Amend an Act Entitled An Act to Incorporate the Ogle and Carroll County Railroad Company,' which said Act was approved March 30, 1869.

This bond is one of a series, numbering from 21 to 60, inclusive, for $1,000 each, which bonds, so numbered, together with another series numbered from 1 to 20, inclusive, for $500 each, are the only bonds issued by said Town of Oregon, under and by virtue of said Act.

In witness whereof, the supervisor and town clerk of the said Town of Oregon have hereunto set their hands, this thirty-first day of December, A. D. 1870.

FRED. H. MARSH, Town Clerk.

E. S. POTTER, Supervisor."

The date in each bond. "thirty-first day of December, A. D., 1870," is lithographed, like the body of the bond.

On the back of each bond is the following certificate:

"AUDITOR'S OFFICE, Illinois.

SPRINGFIELD, June 5, 1871.

I, Charles E. Lippincott, Auditor of Public Accounts of the State of Illinois, do hereby certify that the within bond has been registered in this office this day, pursuant to the provisions of an Act entitled 'An Act to Fund and Provide for Paying the Railroad Debts of Counties, Townships, Cities and Towns,' in force April 16, 1869.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto subscribed my name, and affixed the seal of my office the day and year aforesaid.

[SEAL.] C. E. LIPPINCOTT, Auditor, P. A."

The coupons are in the following form, varying as to number of bond and date of payment:

"State of Illinois, County of Ogle. The Town of Oregon will pay to the Ogle and Carroll County Railroad Company, or bearer, Seventy Dollars at the office of the Farmers' Loan & Trust Company of New York, in the City of New York, on the first day of July, 1873, on presentation, being one year's interest on bond No. 29.

F. H. MARSH, Clerk.

E. S. POTTER, Supervisor."

The action was tried by a jury, which, under the instruction of the court to do so, found a verdict for the plaintiff, for $20,823.68, and a judgment in her favor was rendered for that amount, with costs. The defendant has sued out a writ of error.

On the 30th of March, 1869, the Legislature of Illinois passed an Act (Private L. Ill. 1869, Vol. 8, p. 324), with the title set forth in the bonds, and providing as follows:

"Section 1. Be it enacted by the People of the State of Illinois, represented in the General Assembly, That the several Acts entitled 'An Act to Incorporate the Ogle and Carroll County Railroad Company,' approved February 18, 1857, and the Act entitled 'An Act to Amend an Act Entitled an Act to Incorporate the Ogle and Carroll County Railroad Company,' approved February 24, 1859, be and they are hereby so amended that the said railroad company shall be authorized and empowered to construct, maintain and operate their said railroad, with such appendages as may be deemed necessary by the directors, in accordance with the following provisions.

Sec. 2. That the first division of said road shall commence on the east bank of Rock River, opposite the Town of Oregon, in said County of Ogle; from thence, on the most eligible route, to a connection with the Chicago and Northwestern Railway, or with any other railroad leading to the City of Chicago; and the second division commencing at said point, opposite the said Town of Oregon and running thence, in a westerly direction, on the most eligible route, to the Mississippi River."

"Sec. 5. That the several towns, villages and cities, organized or incorporated under any laws of this State, along or near the route of said railroad, as authorized to be constructed under the original Act and amendment thereto or under this Act, or that are in anywise interested in having said road or any branch or [78] division thereof constructed, may, in their corporate capacities, subscribe to the stock of said company, or may make donations thereto, or may lend its or their credit to said company, to aid in constructing and equipping said road, or any division or branch thereof; Provided, That no such subscription, donation, or loan shall be made until the same shall be voted for as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 6. That whenever twenty legal voters of any such towns, villages or city shall present to the clerk thereof a written application, requesting that an election shall be held to determine whether such town, village or city shall subscribe to the capital stock of said company, or make a donation thereto, or loan money or bonds or its credit, to aid in the construction of said road, or any branch or division thereof, stating the amount, and whether subscribed, donated, or loaned, and the rate of interest, and the time of payment, such clerk shall receive and file such application, and immediately proceed to post written notices of an election to be held by the legal voters of such town, village or city, which notices shall be posted in ten of the most public places in such town, village or city, for thirty days preceding such election, and shall state fully the object of such election; and such election shall be held and conducted and return thereof made as is provided by law, and, in any village or city, as is provided by the law under which the same is incorporated, and an additional return shall be made to one of the directors of said company. Each elector at such election shall deposit a ballot for said subscription, donation, or loan; and if a majority of the legal voters of such town, village or city, voting at such election, shall vote for such subscription, donation or loan, then such town, village or city shall, by its proper corporate authorities, subscribe to the stock of said company, or donate or loan thereto, as shall be determined at said election; and shall issue to the said railroad company its bonds, in such denominations as said company may designate, not less than one hundred dollars, and bearing interest as may be determined at such election, not to exceed ten per cent per annum, payable annually at such place as such company may designate; which bonds shall be signed by the supervisor and countersigned by the clerk in towns organized under the township organization law, and in incorporated villages or cities, [79] signed by the president of the board of trustees and countersigned by the clerk or by the officers having similar powers and duties in any such village or city, and any such town, village or city, so subscribing, donating, or loaning, as aforesaid, shall by its proper corporate authority, annually thereafter, assess and levy a tax upon the taxable property of said town, village or city, sufficient to pay and liquidate the annually accruing interest on such bonds, and so much of the principal thereof as, from time to time, shall become due, which taxes shall be levied and collected in the same manner as other corporation taxes in such town, village or city; Provided, That for the payment of the principal thereof such tax shall not exceed two per cent per annum."

The Town of Oregon was and is an incorporated town or township situated on both sides east and west of Rock River, and embracing within its limits a village called Oregon, on the west bank of the river, which village was and is what is called "the Town of Oregon" in the second section of the above Act. The town was such a town as is described in the fifth section of the Act.

On the 24th of May, 1870, more than twenty legal voters of the Town presented to the clerk of the Town the following written application, signed by them in conformity with section 6 of the Act:

"To the Town Clerk of the Town of Oregon, in the County of Ogle, and State of Illinois:

The undersigned, legal voters of the said Town of Oregon, in the County and State aforesaid, do hereby make application to you, and request that an election shall be held in said Town, under the provisions of an Act of the General Assembly of the State of Illinois, entitled 'An Act to Amend an Act Entitled An Act to Incorporate the Ogle and Carroll County Railroad Company,' approved March 30, A.D. 1869, to determine whether said Town shall, in its corporate capacity, make a donation to the said Ogle and Carroll County Railroad Company of the sum of forty thousand dollars in the bonds of said Town, in such denominations as said company may designate, not less than one hundred dollars each, payable, at the option of [80] said Town, within twenty years from the date of their issue, bearing interest from date at the rate of seven per cent per annum, payable annually, and principal and interest payable at such place as said company may designate, to aid in the construction of the first division of said Ogle and Carroll County Railroad; said bonds not to be issued, dated or delivered until said company shall have completed said first division of said railroad, with a T rail weighing not less than forty-five pounds to the yard, in condition to run trains thereon from a connection or intersection with the Chicago and Northwestern Railway to a point at and within said Town of Oregon, within one half mile of the east bank of Rock River, and shall have equipped the same with rolling stock sufficient to operate a daily train to and from said Town for the accommodation of passengers and freight, nor until said company shall have released said Town from all liabilities on account of donations heretofore voted, except a donation of ten thousand dollars voted by said Town on the ninth day of December, A. D. 1869, said vote and donation of forty thousand dollars to be null and void, unless said first division of said railroad shall be completed and equipped as aforesaid on or before the first day of January, A. D. 1871; but in case the same shall be so completed and equipped within the time aforesaid, and said company shall execute and deliver said release, then the said bonds to be deliverable upon the demand of said company, and to bear date of the day of delivery.

And we request that immediate notice be given of such election, and that the same be held on the 23d day of June, A. D. 1870."

Dated this 24th day of May, A. D. 1870."

The clerk received and filed the application and gave the notice required by section 6 of the Act, of an election to be held June 23, 1870, the notice being as follows:

"Election Notice.

"Whereas, more than twenty legal voters of the Town of Oregon, in the County of Ogle, [8 and State of Illinois, have presented to me, clerk of said Town, a written application requesting that an election be held in said Town under the provisions of an Act of the General Assembly of the State of Illinois, entitled 'An Act to Amend an Act Entitled an Act to Incorporate the Ogle and Carroll County Railroad Company," approved March 30, A. D. 1869, to determine whether said Town shall, in its corporate capacity, make a donation to the said Ogle and Carroll County Railroad Company, of the sum of forty thousand dollars in the bonds of said Town, in such denominations as said company may designate, not less than one hundred dollars each, payable at the option of said Town, within twenty years from the date of issue, bearing interest from date at the rate of seven per cent per annum, payable annually, and principal and interest payable at such place as said company may designate, to aid in the construction of the first division of said Ogle and Carroll County Railroad; said bonds not to be issued, dated or delivered until said company shall have completed said first division of said railroad, with a T rail weighing not less than forty-five pounds to the yard, in condition to run trains thereon from a connection or intersection with the Chicago and Northwestern Railway, to a point at and within said Town of Oregon, within one half mile of the east bank of Rock River, and shall have equipped the same with rolling stock sufficient to operate a daily train to and from said Town for the accommodation of passengers and freight; nor until said company shall have released said Town from all liability on account of donations heretofore voted, except a donation of ten thousand dollars voted by said Town on the 9th day of December, A. D. 1869; said vote of forty thousand dollars to be null and void unless said first division of said railroad shall be completed and equipped as aforesaid, on or before the first day of January, A. D. 1871; but in case the same shall be so completed and equipped within the time aforesaid, and said company shall execute and deliver said release, then the said bonds to be deliverable upon demand of said company, and to bear date of the day of delivery.

[82] The inhabitants, legal voters of the said Town of Oregon, are therefore hereby notified that an election will be held by the legal voters of said Town, at the court house in said Town of Oregon, on Thursday, the 23d day of June, A. D. 1870, at 9 o'clock in the forenoon of said day, for the object and purpose of voting upon and determining the matters and questions hereinbefore and in said written application set forth and contained.

Given under my hand, at my office in said Town of Oregon, this 24th day of May, A. D. 1870.

F. H. MARSH, Town Clerk of said Town."

The election was held on the day, in the manner and with the result stated in the following record on file in the office of the town clerk:

"Pursuant to notice given according to law, the voters of the Town of Oregon, County of Ogle, and State of Illinois, assembled at the court house in Oregon, at 9 o'clock, A. M., on Thursday, the 23d day of June, A. D. 1870. The meeting was called to order by the town clerk and, on motion of W. J. Mix, E. J. Reiman was chosen moderator of said meeting, and was duly sworn by the town clerk. Proclamation was then made of the opening of the polls, which were kept open until 12 o'clock M., when, on motion of O. Wilson, they were closed for one hour, until 1 o'clock, for dinner, by proclamation of the town clerk. At 1 o'clock the polls were again proclaimed open, and were kept open until 6 o'clock, P. M., proclamation being made half hour before the closing of the polls. At the hour of 6, P. M. the moderator proceeded to count out the ballots, until they were all counted, which number equalled the numbers on the poll list. The ballots were then read by the moderator, and resulted as follows: there being for donation, as stated in the notice, one hundred and sixty-three votes; against donation, as stated in the notice, twelve votes. The result being publicly read, the meeting was then closed.

E. J. REIMAN, Moderator.

Attest: F. H. MARSH, Town Clerk." [83]

A defense set up to the validity of the bonds, in the amended second plea, is that their execution was obtained by fraud and circumvention. This is founded on the following facts: the first division of the road was not completed or equipped in accordance with the application, and the notice of election, and the vote, on or before the first of January, 1871, but was completed by the first of April, 1871. On the 30th of December, 1870, Mortimer W. Smith, supervisor of the Town, gave to the town clerk of the Town his written resignation of the office of supervisor and it was placed among the records of the town clerk's office. He never afterwards acted as supervisor. The Town had by law one supervisor and two justices of the peace and one town clerk. They were all of them, by statute, town officers. William Schultz was elected one of the justices of the Town April 5, 1870, and duly qualified as such April 9, 1870. He continued to reside in the Town until after April 3, 1871, and during the year 1871, but was absent from the Town, and in the City of New York, from December 26, 1870, until about January 6, 1871. He resigned his office on March 2, 1871, by filing his resignation in the office of the clerk of the county, who entered it of record according to law. After that he did not act as a justice. A successor to Schultz as a justice was elected by the people at the annual town meeting held April 4, 1871, and not before, and such successor qualified April 8, 1871, and was commissioned April 15, 1871. James H. Cartwright was the other justice of the peace. Frederick H. Marsh was the town clerk.

The following statutory provisions were in force in Illinois in 1870 and 1871: "§ 16. Resignations of the office of justice of the peace and constable shall be made to the clerk of the court of the proper county, who shall immediately enter the date of every such resignation in the book above provided for" (that is, a book to be kept by the clerk of the county, in which he was required to enter the name of every justice of the peace and constable sworn into office, together with the date of his commission or certificate, and the time of his being sworn into office); "which book, or a certified copy of an entry in the same, shall be received [84] in evidence in all courts within this State." Gross, Stat. 1869, Vol. 1, 3d ed. chap. 59, p. 394. "1. Whenever any town shall fail to elect the proper number of town officers to which such town may be entitled by law, or when any person elected to any town office shall fail to qualify as such, or whenever any vacancy shall happen in any town office from death, resignation, removal from the town, or other cause, it shall be lawful for the justices of the peace of the town, together with the supervisor and town clerk, to fill the vacancy or vacancies occasioned or occurring in consequence of either or any of the causes above specified, by appointment by warrant under their hands and seals; and the persons so appointed shall hold their respective offices during the unexpired term of the persons in whose stead they have been appointed, and until others are chosen or appointed in their places, and shall have the same powers and be subject to the same duties and penalties as if they had been duly chosen by the electors. 2. Whenever a vacancy shall occur, from any cause, in any or either of the offices enumerated in the foregoing section, as composing the board of appointment for the appointment of town officers, in case of vacancy, it shall be lawful for the remaining officers of such appointing board to fill any vacancy or vacancies thus occurring, except in cases of vacancy in the office of justice of the peace, which shall be filled only by election. 3. When any appointment shall be made, as provided in the two preceding sections, the officers making the same shall cause the warrant of appointment to be forthwith filed in the office of the town clerk, who shall forthwith give notice to each person appointed." Gross, Stat. 1869, Vol. 1, 3d ed. chap. 103 d, art. 7, pp. 750, 751.

On the 3d of April, 1871, Cartwright (the remaining justice) and Marsh (the town clerk met at the office of the town clerk, and, by a paper then signed by each of them, appointed Elias S. Potter to fill the vacancy in the office of supervisor caused by the resignation of Smith, and ordered the clerk to give the certificate of appointment to Potter. The paper bore date the 31st of December, 1870, and was filed in the office of the town clerk on the 3d of April, 1871. On the same 3d of April, a proper official bond, executed on that day by Potter and two sureties, but bearing date the 31st of December, 1870, was filed in the office of the town clerk, with an oath of office signed and sworn to by Potter before Cartwright on the same 3d of April, but purporting to have been subscribed and sworn to on the 31st of December, 1870. On the same 3d of April Potter, as supervisor, and Marsh, as town clerk, signed the bonds and the coupons, and delivered them to the president of the railroad company. One Dwight was elected supervisor of the Town at the regular annual town meeting, held on April 4, 1871, and assumed the office April 10, 1871, and held it for the ensuing year. It was known to all parties that this town meeting was to be held, and it is alleged that the officers of the railroad company conspired with Cartwright and Marsh to procure the appointment of Potter as supervisor, so that the bonds might be issued before the election by the people of a new supervisor on April 4, 1871.

The Statute of Illinois as to fraud and circumvention, set up and relied on, is as follows: "11. If any fraud or circumvention be used in obtaining the making or executing of any of the instruments aforesaid" (that is, any note, bond, bill or other instrument in writing, for the payment of money or property, or the performance of covenants or conditions) "such fraud or circumvention may be pleaded in bar to any action to be brought on any such instrument so obtained, whether such action be brought by the party committing such fraud or circumvention, or any assignee or assignees of such instrument." Gross, Stat. 1869, Vol. 1, 3d ed. chap. 73, p. 462.

The court refused to submit to the jury, and we think properly, any question as to whether the making or execution of the bonds and coupons was obtained by fraud or circumvention.

[89] Even if the statute applies to town bonds and their coupons, no fraud or imposition was practiced on Potter or Marsh to induce them to sign these bonds and coupons. They knew what they were signing and signed intentionally. The fraud or circumvention intended by the statute, which only embodies a rule of the common law, is not that which goes merely to the consideration of the instrument, but it must go to the execution or making; and there must be a trick or device by which one kind of instrument is signed in the belief that it is of another kind, or the amount or nature or terms of the instrument must be misrepresented to the signer. No different ruling as to the statute has ever been made by the Supreme Court of Illinois, especially in a case where, as here, the holder of the instrument is a bona fide holder of it, before maturity, for a valuable consideration, without notice. In Latham v. Smith, 45 Ill. 25, decided in 1867, in construing this statute, the court said: "A fraud in obtaining a note may consist of any artifice practiced upon a person to induce him to execute it, when he did not intend to do such an act. Circumvention seems to be nearly if not quite synonymous with fraud. It is any fraud whereby a person is induced by deceit to make a deed or other instrument. It must be borne in mind that the fraud or covin must relate to the obtaining of the instrument itself, and not to the consideration upon which it is based. It is no fraud which relates to the quality, quantity, value or character of the consideration that moves the contract, but it is such a trick or device as induces the giving of one character of instrument under the belief that it is another of a different character; such as giving a note or other agreement for one sum or thing, when it is for another sum or thing; or as giving a note under the belief that is a receipt." This ruling was followed in Shipley v. Carroll, 45 Ill. 285; Elliott v. Levings, 54 Ill. 213; and Maxcy v. Williamson Co. 72 Ill. 207.

It is also contended that the appointment of Potter as supervisor was invalid, because Schultz, though he had resigned as justice, legally continued in office till his successor was elected, and yet took no part in the appointment. But it is plain, we think, that, within the language and meaning of the statute, as respects the four members of the appointing board designated by statute, two of them were out of office so far as their acting as such members was concerned. The supervisor and Schultz had resigned, and their offices were vacant, and it was lawful for the remaining two officers to fill the vacancy in the office of supervisor. No authority to which we are referred holds to the contrary. Where a town is trying to escape the enforcement of its liability to creditors through the resignation of an officer on whom process is to be served, and the failure to supply his place, the resigning officer is rightly held, quoad creditors, to continue in office, subject to the service of process, till his successor qualifies. In the present case there was not only a "vacancy" in the office of supervisor, for the purpose of filling it, under section 1, but there was a vacancy in the office which Schultz had held, for the purpose of the action of Cartwright and Marsh alone, as the remaining officers of the appointing board, to appoint a supervisor, under section 2. On any other construction, as, by section 2, a vacancy in the office of justice can be filled only by election, a town would, in case of a vacancy in the office of justice, have to go without a supervisor, in case of a vacancy in his office, till a justice could be elected.

Another defense is set up, under the amended third plea, founded on section 12 of article 9 of the Constitution of Illinois, which went into effect August 8, 1870, and provides as follows: "Sec. 12. No county, city, township, school district or other municipal corporation shall be allowed to become indebted in any manner or for any purpose, to an amount, including existing [91] indebtedness, in the aggregate exceeding five per centum on the value of the taxable property therein, to be ascertained by the last assessment for the state and county taxes previous to the incurring of such indebtedness. Any county, city, school district or other municipal corporation, incurring any indebtedness as aforesaid, shall, before or at the time of doing so, provide for the collection of a direct annual tax sufficient to pay the interest on such debt as it falls due, and also to pay and discharge the principal thereof within twenty years from the time of contracting the same. This section shall not be construed to prevent any county, city, township, school district or other municipal corporation from issuing their bonds in compliance with any vote of the people which may have been had prior to the adoption of this Constitution, in pursuance of any law providing therefor."

It appearing that, when the bonds in question in this suit were issued, the debt of the Town was already greater than five per centum on the value of its taxable property, as ascertained by the assessment for 1870, it is contended that the bonds could not be lawfully issued, except in compliance with the vote of June 23, 1870, and in conformity with the conditions imposed by that vote, one of which was the completion and equipment of the first division of the road on or before January 1, 1871, and that that condition was not observed. The question is sought to be made one of power or authority to issue the bonds within the rules laid down by this court as applicable even in the case of bonds in the hands of a bona fide holder.

At the time the bonds in question were issued, a statute enacted April 16, 1869, was in force in Illinois, section 7 of which (Gross, Stat. 1869, Vol. 1, 3d ed. p. 556) provided that any town should have the right, "upon making any subscription or donation to any railroad company, to prescribe the conditions upon which such bonds, subscriptions or donations shall be made, and such bonds, subscriptions or donations shall not be valid and binding until such conditions precedent shall have been complied with."

The language of this statute was as imperative as is that of the Constitution of 1870 in re- [92]
gard to complying with the conditions contained in any vote of the people; and section 6 of the Act of March 30, 1869, before cited, prescribes that the proper corporate authorities of the town shall make the donation or subscription, "as shall be determined at said election."

In respect to this compliance with the conditions imposed by the vote of the people, whether the question is to be regarded as arising under the provision of the Constitution or that of a statute, it must equally be regarded as concluded by the recital in the bonds, made by the supervisor and the town clerk. Section 6 of the Act of March 30, 1869, provides that if a majority of the legal voters of the town, voting at the election, vote for the donation, the town shall, by its "corporate authorities," make the donation to the company, "as shall be determined at said election," and shall issue its bonds to the company, "which bonds shall be signed by the supervisor and countersigned by the clerk, in towns organized under the township law." Within the numerous decisions by this court on the subject, the supervisor and the town clerk, they being named in the statute as the officers to sign the bonds, and the "corporate authorities" to act for the town in issuing them to the company, were the persons intrusted with the duty of deciding, before issuing the bonds, whether the conditions determined at the election existed. If they have certified to that effect in the bond, the Town is estopped from asserting, as against a bona fide holder, that the conditions prescribed by the popular vote were not complied with. They state, in each bond, that the faith, credit and property of the Town are, by the bond, solemnly pledged for the payment of the principal and interest named in it "under authority of" the Act of March 30, 1869, reciting its title, and that the 60 bonds, amounting to $50,000, "are the only bonds issued by said Town of Oregon under and by virtue of said Act." The provision in section 6 of the Act, that the Town shall, by its proper corporate authority, annually assess and levy a tax to pay the interest and principal of the bonds, is a warrant for the pledge made, in the bonds, of the faith, credit and property of the Town. The recitals are within the adjudged cases in this court, as to the effect of recitals in bonds, that they are issued "under authority of" a specified statute, and "under and by virtue of" that statute; and they estop the Town from taking the defense that the first division of the road was not completed by the time specified, as against the plaintiff, as a bona fide holder of the bonds.

In Pana v. Bowler, 107 U. S. 529, 539 [Bk. 27, L. ed. 424, 428], this court upheld the effectiveness of a recital in bonds, in favor of a bona fide holder, as against an alleged defect in the mode of conducting an election, held prior to the adoption of this same Constitution of Illinois, the bonds being issued after its adoption, although that instrument forbade the issuing of the bonds, unless their issue should have been authorized under then existing laws, by a vote of the people prior to the adoption of the Constitution.

The present case is directly within the decision of this court in Ins. Co. v. Bruce, 105 U. S. 328 [Bk. 26, L. ed. 1121], where it was held that recitals in bonds estopped a town in Illinois, as against a bona fide holder, from showing that conditions imposed on its liability by the vote of the people had not been complied with, although the statute declared that the bonds should not be valid and binding until such conditions precedent had been complied with. There are numerous other cases in this court to the same effect.

The provision of section 12 of article 9 of the Constitution of Illinois did not introduce any new rule of evidence in regard to the mode of proving, in favor of a bona fide holder, the compliance with the vote of the people, but left the compliance to be conclusively established in such a case by the recital in the bonds, made by the designated official authorities.

We are not referred to any decision of the Supreme Court of Illinois, made prior to the issuing of the bonds in question, which holds to the contrary of the views we have announced. The case of People v. Dutcher, 56 Ill. 144, decided at September Term, 1870, was a mandamus applied for by a railroad company to compel a supervisor to subscribe for stock, where conditions imposed by the vote of the town had [94] not been complied with, and its bonds had not been issued. The mandamus was refused. This direct proceeding is, as this court has uniformly held, a very different thing from a suit on the bonds by a bona fide holder, the cases not being analogous or governed by the same rules.

A defense is also set up, under the amended fourth plea, founded on the second additional section or article to the Constitution of Illinois, of 1870, which took effect July 2, 1870, and is in these words: "No county, city, town, township or other municipality shall ever become subscriber to the capital stock of any railroad or private corporation, or make donation to or loan its credit in aid of such corporation; Provided, however, That the adoption of this article shall not be construed as affecting the right of any such municipality to make such subscriptions where the same have been authorized under existing laws, by a vote of the people of such municipalities prior to such adoption."

The bonds in question having been issued after July 2, 1870, and the requirement, to make them valid, being that they must have been authorized, under laws in force before July 2, 1870, by a vote of the people of the Town given before that date, it is contended that they were not so authorized, because the vote of June 28, 1870, was taken at a town meeting held and presided over by a moderator, and not by judges of election. The argument made is, that section 6 of the Act of March 30, 1869, provided that the election should "be held and conducted and return thereof made as is provided by law, and, in any village or city, as is provided by the law under which the same is incorporated;" and that a town meeting, presided over by a moderator, and not held by the supervisor, assessor and collector, as judges of election, was not an "election," within the meaning of the statute, and so was not an election "under existing laws," within the meaning of the Constitution.

The election was in fact conducted in the manner required for the election of town officers, and not in the manner required for general elections. We are of opinion that, under the Act of 1869, the election in a town could properly be conducted in the manner prescribed by law for the election in towns of town officers; namely, by a moderator and the town clerk—the town clerk having given, as required by the Act, the prior notice of the election, and the return [95] of the election being filed in the office of the town clerk, and the two officers being paid by the town The voting for town officers at annual town meetings in the manner prescribed therefor by the Statutes of Illinois, is called in those statutes an "election," and this special voting in the same manner for this town object was an "election," within the meaning of the Act of 1869. The requirement of the Act is that the "election shall be held and conducted and return thereof made as is provided by law," and not "as is provided by law for general elections." If a town, it is the law provided for town elections. If a village or city, and the law of its incorporation has special provisions, those are to be followed; otherwise, any general law as to village or city elections is to be observed. As the proceeding was to originate by an application filed in the town clerk's office, so the same officers who would conduct an ordinary town election were to be concerned with this election, and the town clerk's office was to be the place of deposit of all the papers and of the return of the vote, and two town officers were to issue the bonds. None of the proceedings were to be connected with the county clerk's office, as in the case of a general election. This was the ruling of the Supreme Court of Illinois, in a case decided after June 23, 1870, though before these bonds were issued (People v. Dutcher, 56 Ill. 144); and it was followed in other cases, in that court, after the bonds were issued, though somewhat modified more recently. We think it was the correct ruling.

The questions above considered cover substantially all the assignments of error. The direction to find a verdict for the plaintiff was proper.

Judgment affirmed.

v.

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 55-73.)

Grant of Indian lands to railroad company—extinguishment of Indian title, exclusively for the government—relinquishment of title, when took place—upon definite location, when rights of company attached—location of route withdrew from sale or preemption the odd sections for forty miles on each side—when general route considered fixed—construction of section 3 of Act of July 2, 1864.

*1. The grant by the Act of Congress of July 2, 1864, to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, of lands to which the Indian title had not been extinguished, operated to convey the fee to the Company, subject to the right of occupancy by the Indians.

2. The manner, time and conditions of extinguishing such right of occupancy were exclusively matters for the consideration of the government, and could not be interfered with nor put in contest by private parties.

3. The agreement of the Sisseton and Wahpeton bands of Dakota or Sioux Indians for the relinquishment of their title was accepted on the part of the United States when it was approved by the Secretary of the Interior, on the 19th of June, 1873. That agreement stipulating to be binding from its date, May 19, 1873, and the Indians having retired from the lands to their Reservations, the relinquishment of their title, so far as the United States is concerned, held to have then taken place.

4. Upon the definite location of the line of the railroad, on the 26th of May, 1873, the right of the Company, freed from any incumbrance of the Indian title, immediately attached to the alternate sections; and no preemptive right could be initiated to the land, so long as the Indian title was unextinguished.

5. When the general route of the road provided for in section 3 of the Act of July 2, 1864, was fixed, and information thereof was given to the Land Department by the filing of a map thereof with the Secretary of the Interior, the statute withdrew from sale or preemption the odd sections to the extent of forty miles on each side thereof; and, by way of precautionary notice to the public, an executive withdrawal was a wise exercise of authority.

6. The general route may be considered as fixed, when its general course and direction are determined, after an actual examination of the country or from a knowledge of it, and it is designated by a line on a map, showing the general features of the adjacent country and the places through or by which it will pass.

7. That part of section 3 of said Act, which excepts from the grant lands reserved, sold, granted or otherwise appropriated, and to which a preemption and other rights and claims have not attached, when a map of definite location has been filed, does not include the Indian right of occupancy within such "other rights and claims;" nor does it include preemptions where the sixth section declares that the land shall not be subject to preemption.

Argued Oct. 26, 27, 1886. Decided Nov. 15, 1886.

APPEAL from the Supreme Court of the Territory of Dakota. Affirmed.

[56] Statement of the case by Mr. Justice Field:

This was an action for the possession of a tract of land in the Territory of Dakota. The plaintiff below, the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, asserted title to the premises under a grant made by the Act of Congress of July 2, 1864. The defendant, Peronto, asserted a right to preempt the premises by virtue of his settlement upon them under the preemption law of September 4, 1841, and that his right thereto was superior to that of the Railroad Company.

The action was brought in the District Court of the Territory. The complaint was in the usual form in such cases, alleging the incorporation of the plaintiff, its ownership in fee of the premises (which are described), and its right to their immediate possession, and that they are withheld by the defendant; with a prayer for judgment for their possession, and damages for the withholding.

The answer of the defendant admits the incorporation of the plaintiff, and that he is in possession of the premises, but denies the other allegations of the complaint. It then sets up as a further defense that he settled upon the premises on October 5, 1871, and resided thereon, and the several steps taken by him to perfect a right of preemption to them, and that he possessed the qualifications of a preemptor under the laws of the United States. It concludes with a prayer that the title of the plaintiff be declared void, and that the plaintiff be enjoined from enforcing or attempting to enforce it; that the title be declared to be in the defendant, and that such other and further relief be granted as may be necessary to protect and preserve his rights.

The plaintiff replied, traversing the allegations of the answer; and the issues, by consent [57] of the parties, were tried by the court, without a jury. The court found for the plaintiff, and gave judgment in its favor for the possession of the premises, with costs. On appeal to the Supreme Court of the Territory the judgment was affirmed and, by appeal from the latter judgment, the case was brought to this court. Since it was docketed here, the defendant, who was the appellant, died, and by leave of the court his executor, the devisee of his estate, has been substituted as appellant in his place.

The Act of Congress of July 2, 1864, is entitled "An Act Granting Lands to Aid in the Construction of a Railroad and Telegraph Line from Lake Superior to Puget Sound, on the Pacific Coast, by the Northern Route." 13 Stat. at L. 365.

By the first section, the Northern Pacific Railroad Company was incorporated and authorized to equip and maintain the railroad and telegraph line mentioned, and was vested with all the powers and privileges necessary to carry into effect the purposes of the Act.

By the third section, a grant of land was made to the Company. Its language is: "That there be, and hereby is, granted to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, its successors and assigns, for the purpose of aiding in the construction of said railroad and telegraph line to the Pacific coast, and to secure the safe and speedy transportation of the mails, troops, munitions of war, and public stores, over the route of said line of railway, every alternate section of public land, not mineral, designated by odd numbers, to the amount of twenty alternate sections per mile, on each side of said railroad line, as said Company may adopt, through the Territories of the United States, and ten alternate sections of land per mile on each side of said railroad whenever it passes through any State, and whenever on the line thereof the United States have full title, not reserved, sold, granted or otherwise appropriated, and free from preemption, or other claims or rights, at the time the line of said road is definitely fixed, and a plat thereof filed in the office of the Commissioner of the General Land-Office."

By the sixth section, it was enacted "That the President of the United States shall cause the lands to be surveyed for forty miles in [58] width on both sides of the entire line of said road after the general route shall be fixed, and as fast as may be required by the construction of said railroad; and the odd sections of land hereby granted shall not be liable to sale or entry or preemption before or after they are surveyed except by said Company, as provided in this Act; but the provisions of the Act of September, 1841, granting preemption rights, and the Acts amendatory thereof, and of the Act entitled 'An Act to Secure Homesteads to Actual Settlers on the Public Domain,' approved May 20, 1862, shall be, and the same are hereby, extended to all other lands on the line of said road when surveyed, excepting those hereby granted to said Company. And the reserved alternate sections shall not be sold by the government at a price less than two dollars and fifty cents per acre when offered for sale."

At the time this Act was passed, the land in controversy, and other lands covered by the grant were in the occupation of the Sisseton and Wahpeton Bands of Dakota or Sioux Indians; and the second section provided that the United States should extinguish, as rapidly as might be consistent with public policy and the welfare of the Indians, their title to all lands "falling under the operation of this Act and acquired in the donation to the road."

On the 19th of February, 1867, a Treaty was concluded between the United States and these Bands, which was ratified on the 15th of April and proclaimed on the second of May of that year (15 Stat. at L. 505), in the second article of which the Bands ceded "to the United States the right to construct wagon roads, railroads, mail stations, telegraph lines, and such other public improvements as the interest of the government may require, over and across the lands claimed by said Bands (including their Reservation as hereinafter designated), any route or routes that may be selected by authority of the government, said lands so claimed being bounded on the south and east by the treaty line of 1851 and the Red River of the North to the mouth of Goose River; on the north by the Goose River [59] and a line running from the source thereof by the most westerly point of Devil's Lake to the Chief's Bluff at the head of James River; and on the west by the James River to the mouth of the Mocasin River, and thence to Kampeska Lake." By articles III and IV certain lands were set apart as permanent reservations for the Indians—one of which was known as Lake Travers Reservation, and the other as Devil's Lake Reservation, so called because their boundary lines commenced respectively at those lakes.

On the 7th of June, 1872, Congress passed an Act "to quiet the title to certain lands in Dakota Territory," which provided that it should be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to examine and report to Congress what title or interest the Sisseton and Wahpeton Bands of Sioux Indians had to any portion of the land mentioned and described in the second article of that Treaty, except the Reservations named; and whether any and if any what, compensation ought, in justice and equity, to be made to said Bands for the extinguishment of whatever title they might have to said lands. 17 Stat. at L. 281.

Under this Act, the Secretary of the Interior appointed three persons as commissioners to treat with the Indians for the relinquishment of their title to the land. On the 20th of September, 1872, they made an agreement or treaty with the Bands for such relinquishment. This agreement recited the conclusion of the Treaty of 1867, and the cession by it to the United States, of certain privileges and rights supposed to belong to said Bands in the territory described in the second article of the Treaty; and that it was desirable that all the Territory, except that portion comprised in certain Reservations described in articles III and IV of the Treaty, should be ceded absolutely to the United States, upon such considerations as in justice and equity should be paid therefor; and that the lands were no longer available to the Indians for the [60] purposes of the chase, and their value or consideration was essentially necessary to enable them to cultivate portions of the permanent Reservations, and become self-supporting by the cultivation of the soil and other pursuits of husbandry. "Therefore," the agreement continues, "the said Bands represented in said Treaty, and parties thereto, by their chiefs and head men, now assembled in council, do propose to M. N. Adams, William H. Forbes, and James Smith, Jr., Commissioners on behalf of the United States, as follows:

"First. To sell, cede and relinquish to the United States all their right, title, and interest in and to all lands and territory particularly described in article II of said Treaty, as well as all lands in the Territory of Dakota to which they have title or interest, excepting the said tracts particularly described and bounded in articles III and IV of said Treaty, which last named tracts and territory are expressly reserved as permanent reservation for occupancy and cultivation, as contemplated by articles VIII, IX and X of said Treaty."

"Second. That, in consideration of said cession and relinquishment, the United States should advance and pay annually, for the term of ten years from and after the acceptance by the United States of the propositions herein submitted, eighty thousand ($80,000) dollars, to be expended, under the direction of the President of the United States, on the plan and in accordance with the provisions of the Treaty aforesaid, dated February 19, 1867, for goods and provisions, for the erection of manual labor and public schools, and to the erection of mills, blacksmith shops, and other workshops, and to aid in opening farms, breaking land, and fencing the same, and in furnishing agricultural implements, oxen and milk cows, and such other beneficial objects as may be deemed most conducive to the prosperity and happiness of the Sisseton and Wahpeton Bands of Dakota or Sioux Indians, entitled thereto, according to the said Treaty of February 19, 1867."

This agreement contained seven other articles, some of which had provisions of great value to the Indians. It does not appear that it was ever presented to the Senate of the United States for ratification, but it was communicated to Congress by the Secretary of the Interior; and in the Indian Appropriation Act of February 14, 1873, an amount was conditionally appropriated to meet the first installment of the sum provided by the second article—$80,000. The [61] condition was that the amount should not be expended until that agreement, amended by the exclusion of all the articles except the first two, should be ratified by the Indians. The agreement, exclusive of those articles, was confirmed by Congress. 17 Stat. at L. 456.

The ratification of the agreement, as amended, was obtained from the Indians at the two Reservations; from those on one Reservation, on May 2, 1873, and from those on the other Reservation on the 19th of the same month. This ratification was accepted and approved by the Secretary of the Interior on the 19th of June, 1873, and the expenditure of the appropriation made was authorized. No approval of the agreement was had by Congress until the passage of the Indian Appropriation Act of June 22, 1874, by which it was confirmed and an appropriation made to meet the second installment of the consideration stipulated.

It appears by the findings of the court that some time in the fall of 1871, under the Act of Congress mentioned, and other Acts and Resolutions relating to the same subject, the Railroad Company commenced work on that part of its line of road beginning on the westerly bank of the Red River of the North (which was the eastern boundary of Dakota), and extending westerly through and across what was afterwards shown by the public surveys to be the section of land of which the premises in controversy form a part, namely, section 7 in township 139 and range 48. It also caused all that part of its line of road thus located to be graded and prepared for its superstructure; and in June following the superstructure and the iron rails were laid, and that part of the road was completed which crossed the section named, and ever since the road has been maintained and operated.

On the 21st of February, 1872, the Company filed in the office of the Secretary of the Interior a map showing that part of the general route of the road beginning at the westerly bank of the Red River of the North, and extending westerly to James River, in Dakota Territory. On the 30th of March following, the acting Commissioner of the General Land-Office forwarded to the register and receiver of the Pembina land-office, within the limits of which the tract of land in controversy was situated, a description of the designated route, [62] and, by order of the Secretary of the Interior, directed them to withhold from sale or location, preemption, or homestead entry, all the surveyed and unsurveyed odd-numbered sections of public lands falling within the limits of forty miles, as designated on the map, and stated that this order would take effect from the date of its receipt by them.

The order with the diagram was received by them April 20, 1872. The diagram represented the route of the road as passing over and across the section of land in question. The order of withdrawal thus given was never afterwards revoked.

On May 26, 1873, the Company filed in the office of the Commissioner of the General Land-Office a map, showing the definite location of that part of its line of road extending from the Red River of the North to the Missouri River in Dakota Territory. All that portion of this definite location, from the Red River to the west line of the section named, was the same as that made in 1871. On the 11th of June, 1873, the acting Commissioner of the General Land-Office addressed a letter to the local register and receiver, informing them of the filing of this map of definite location, and transmitted to them a diagram showing the limits of the land grant along said line, and also the limits of the withdrawal ordered on March 30, 1872, upon a designated line; and directed them to withhold from sale or entry all the odd-numbered sections, both surveyed and unsurveyed, falling within those limits. This letter, with the diagram referred to, was received at the Pembina land-office on June 24, 1873.

Soon after the execution of the amended agreement with the Indians, mentioned above, which was approved by the Secretary of the Interior on the 19th of June, 1873, the government land surveys of the region embraced in it were completed, and plats thereof were filed in the local land-office. Those surveys show that the premises in controversy constitute a portion of the odd section number seven, which was granted to the Railway Company.

The defendant, Peronto, settled, as already stated, upon that section on October 5, 1871. It is found by the court that he had all the qualifications of a preemptor, and entered upon the land with the intention of securing a preemption right to it under the laws of the United States, and built a house upon it, in which he resided. On the 11th of August, 1873, he presented his declaratory statement to the register and receiver of the local land-office, stating his intention to claim a preemption right to a portion of the section (describing it) and his settlement thereon in October, 1871. This declaratory statement was presented within three months after the township plats, showing the government surveys, had been filed in the local land-office. The register and receiver refused to file it, for the alleged reason that the land therein described was the land of the Railroad Company, as shown by its diagram filed in the Department of the Interior February 21, 1872, and that his alleged prior settlement was illegal, the lands not being subject to preemption settlement by reason of the Indian Treaty. The defendant thereupon appealed from this ruling to the Commissioner of the General Land-Office, by whom, on the 14th of February, 1874, it was approved and confirmed. The defendant then appealed to the Secretary of the Interior, and he approved the decision of the Commissioner. [63]

No attempt has ever been made to include lands reserved to the United States within a prior grant, where the reservation afterwards ceased to exist. Nor where lands had been otherwise disposed of did their reversion to the government bring them within a previous grant.

It is the Act, and not its denomination, that definitely fixes the line of the road; and the criterion is, has the act done, terminated the volition of the Company in respect to changing that line? if so, the line is "definitely fixed."

Upon construction, all that could be done had been to cause the grant to attach; and on payment by the Company of the costs and receipt of the patents, its title would relate back to the Act causing attachment of the grant.

When the routes were definitely fixed, and it appeared that lands within these limits had been sold at private entry, and taken up by preemptors, or reserved by the United States, an equivalent was provided.

Thus, settlements on the public lands were encouraged, without the aid intended for the construction of the roads being thereby impaired.

Mr. W. P. Clough, for appellee:

Upon the filing of the map of general route, the Commissioner of the General Land-Office, under instructions of the Secretary of the Interior, made an express withdrawal from entry by any mode, for the benefit of the railroad, of all odd-numbered sections of land within the distance of forty miles upon either side of the line of general route; which was never vacated. This withdrawal was effective.

S. 329 (Bk. 27, L. ed. 952).

Mr. Justice Field delivered the opinion of [66]
the court:

The land in controversy and other lands in Dakota, through which the Northern Pacific Railroad was to be constructed, was within what is known as Indian country. At the time the Act of July 2, 1864, was passed, the title of the Indian Tribes was not extinguished. But that fact did not prevent the grant of Congress from operating to pass the fee of the land to the Company. The fee was in the United States. The Indians had merely a right of occupancy, a right to use the land subject to the dominion and control of the government. The grant conveyed the fee subject to this right of occupancy. The Railroad Company took the property with this incumbrance. The right of the Indians, it is true, could not be interfered with or determined except by the United States. No private individual could invade it, and the manner, time, and conditions of its extinguishment were matters solely for the consideration of the government, and are not open to contestation in the judicial tribunals. As we said in Beecher v. Wetherby, 95 U. S. 517 [Bk. 27, L. ed. 440]: "It is to be presumed that in this matter the United States would be governed by such considerations of justice as would control a Christian people in their treatment of an ignorant and dependent race. Be that as it may, the propriety or justice of their action towards the Indians with respect to their lands is a question of governmental policy, and is not a matter open to discussion in a controversy between third parties, neither of whom derives title from [67] the Indians. The right of the United States to dispose of the fee of lands occupied by them has always been recognized by this court from the foundation of the government." In support of this doctrine several authorities were cited in that case.

In Johnson v. McIntosh, 8 Wheat. 575 [21 U. S. bk. 5, L. ed. 689], which was here in 1823, the court, speaking by Chief Justice Marshall, stated the origin of this doctrine of the ultimate title and dominion in the United States. It was this: that, upon the discovery of America, the nations of Europe were anxious to appropriate as much of the country as possible, and, to avoid contests and conflicting settlements among themselves, they established the principle that discovery gave title to the government by whose subjects or by whose authority it was made, against all other governments. This exclusion of other governments necessarily gave to the discovering nation the sole right of acquiring the soil from the natives, and of establishing settlements upon it. It followed that the relations which should exist between the discoverer and the natives were to be regulated only by themselves. No other nation could interfere between them. The chief justice remarked that "The potentates of the old world found no difficulty in convincing themselves that they made ample compensation to the inhabitants of the new, by bestowing on them civilization and Christianity in exchange for unlimited independence." Whilst thus claiming a right to acquire and dispose of the soil, the discoverers recognized a right of occupancy or a usufructuary right in the natives. They accordingly made grants of lands occupied by the Indians, and these grants were held to convey a title to the grantees, subject only to the Indian right of occupancy. The chief justice adds that the history of America, from its discovery to the present day, proves the universal recognition of this principle.

In Clark v. Smith, 13 Pet. 195 [38 U. S. bk. 10, L. ed. 125], which was here in 1839, the patent under which the complainant became the owner in fee of certain lands was issued by the Commonwealth of Kentucky in 1795, when the lands were in possession of the Chickasaw Indians, whose title was not extinguished until 1819. It was objected that the patent was void because it was issued for lands within a country claimed by Indians; but the court re- [68] plied "That the colonial charters, a great portion of the individual grants by the proprietary and royal governments, and a still greater portion by the States of this Union after the Revolution, were made for lands within the Indian hunting grounds. North Carolina and Virginia, to a great extent, paid their officers and soldiers of the Revolutionary War by such grants, and extinguished the arrears due the army by similar means. It was one of the great resources that sustained the war, not only by these States but by others. The ultimate fee (encumbered with the Indian right of occupancy) was in the Crown previous to the Revolution, and in the States of the Union afterwards, and subject to grant. This right of occupancy was protected by the political power and respected by the courts until extinguished, when the patentee took the unencumbered fee. So this court, and the state courts, have uniformly and often holden." 13 Pet. 201 [126].

In the grant to the Railroad Company now before us, Congress was not unmindful of the title of the Indians to the lands granted, and it stipulated for its extinguishment by the United States as rapidly as might be consistent with public policy and the welfare of the Indians.

In compliance with the pledge thus given, the United States took steps, first, to obtain from the Indians the right to construct railroads, wagon roads, and telegraph lines across their lands, and to make such other improvements upon them as the interests of the government might require, and afterwards to obtain a cession of their entire title.

The right to construct railroads and telegraph lines across their lands was secured by the Treaty concluded on the 19th of February, 1867, ratified on the 15th of April, and proclaimed on the second of May of that year. The right was in terms ceded to the United States, but the cession must be construed to authorize any one deriving title from the United States to exercise the same right. 15 Stat. at L. 505.

For the relinquishment of the entire title of the Indians to the lands, an agreement was made by commissioners appointed by the Secretary of the Interior, under the Act of Congress of June 7, 1872. That agreement in form was merely a proposition by the Indians to cede their title, upon certain money considerations to be paid, and certain acts to be per- [69] formed by the United States. Congress declined to approve of it in its entirety, but expressed an approval of it so far as it related to the cession of the title of the Indians upon the money considerations named. It refused, however, to allow an appropriation made to meet the first installment of the money consideration to be expended, except upon the condition that the Indians should abandon the other provisions and ratify the agreement thus modified. The Indians on the different Reservations accepted the condition and ratified the agreement as modified; those on one Reservation on May 2, 1873, and those on the other on the 19th of the same month.

The agreement, thus ratified, was forwarded to the Secretary of the Interior, and was approved by him on the 19th of June following, and on June 22, 1874, Congress approved it in the Indian Appropriation Act of that year, when it also provided for the payment of the second installment of the money consideration.

This modified agreement must be considered as accepted, on the part of the United States, when it was approved by the Secretary of the Interior. Some official recognition was necessary to satisfy those who might be interested as to the good faith of the alleged consent of the Indians; whether the parties acting nominally in their behalf really represented them, and whether their assent was freely given after full knowledge of the import of the legislation of Congress. Proof of these facts was not to rest in the recollection of witnesses, but in the official action of the officers of the government, or in the legislation of Congress. The agreement, however, on the part of the Indians was only to cede their title; it was not a cession in terms by them. The officers of the Land Department, however, treated it as an actual cession of title from its date. The Indians had then retired to the Reservation set apart for them by the Treaty of 1867, thus giving up the occupancy of the other lands. The relinquishment thus [70] made was as effectual as a formal act of cession. Their right of occupancy was, in effect, abandoned, and full consideration for it being afterwards paid, it could not be resumed. The agreement in terms provided that it should be binding from its ratification. So, therefore, considered in connection with the actual retirement of the Indians from the land, it may properly be treated as establishing the extinguishment of their title from its date, so far as the United States are concerned. The definite location of the line of railroad was subsequently made by the company, and a map of it filed with the Secretary of the Interior. The right of the Company, freed from any incumbrance of the Indian title, immediately attached to the alternate sections, a portion of one of which constitutes the premises in controversy. The defendant could not initiate any preemptive right to the land so long as the Indian title remained unextinguished. The Act of Congress excludes lands in that condition from preemption. R. S. § 2257.

If we are mistaken in this view, and the relinquishment of the right of occupancy by the Indians is not to be deemed effected until the agreement was ratified by Congress in June, 1874, notwithstanding their actual retirement from the lands, the result would not be changed. The right of the Company to the odd sections within the limits of its grant, covered by the Indian claim, did not depend upon the extinguishment of that claim before the definite location of the line of the road was made, and a map thereof filed with the Commissioner of the General Land-Office. The provisions of the third section, limiting the grant to lands to which the United States had then full title, they not having been reserved, sold, granted, or otherwise appropriated, and being free from preemption or other claims or rights, did not exclude from the grant Indian lands, not thus reserved, sold or appropriated, which were subject simply to their right of occupancy. Nearly all the lands in the Territory of Dakota, and, indeed, a large, if not the greater portion of the lands along the entire route to Puget Sound, on which the road of the Company was to be constructed, was subject to this right of occupancy by the Indians. With knowledge of their title and its impediment to the use of the lands by the Company, Congress made the [71] grant, with a stipulation to extinguish the title. It would be a strange conclusion to hold that the failure of the United States to secure the extinguishment at the time when it should first become possible to identify the tracts granted, operated to recall the pledge and to defeat the grant. It would require very clear language to justify a conclusion so repugnant to the purposes of Congress expressed in other parts of the Act. The only limitation upon the action of the United States with respect to the title of the Indians was that imposed by the Act of Congress, that they would extinguish the title as rapidly as might be "consistent with public policy and the welfare of said Indians." Subject only to that condition, so far as the Indian title was concerned, the grant passed the fee to the Company. In our judgment, the claims and rights mentioned in the third section are such as are asserted to the lands by other parties than Indians having only a right of occupancy.

Assuming that the extinguishment of the Indian title to the lands in controversy may, so far as any claim to them against the United States is concerned, be held to have taken place at the date of the amended agreement—taking the last date, when the Indians on the second Reservation ratified it—the defendant did not acquire any right of preemption by his continued settlement afterwards. The Act of Congress not only contemplates the filing by the Company, in the office of the Commissioner of the General Land-Office, of a map showing the definite location of the line of its road, and limits the grant to such alternate odd sections as have not, at that time, been reserved, sold, granted, or otherwise appropriated, and are free from preemption, grant, or other claims or rights; but it also contemplates a preliminary designation of the general route of the road, and the exclusion from sale, entry, or preemption of the adjoining odd sections within forty miles on each side, until the definite location is made. The third section declares that after the general route shall be fixed, the President shall [72] cause the lands to be surveyed for forty miles in width on both sides of the entire line as fast as may be required for the construction of the road, and that the odd sections granted shall not be liable to sale, entry, or preemption, before or after they are surveyed, except by the Company. The general route may be considered as fixed when its general course and direction are determined after an actual examination of the country or from a knowledge of it, and is designated by a line on a map showing the general features of the adjacent country and the places through or by which it will pass. The officers of the Land Department are expected to exercise supervision over the matter so as to require good faith on the part of the Company in designating the general route, and not to accept an arbitrary and capricious selection of the line irrespective of the character of the country through which the road is to be constructed. When the general route of the road is thus fixed in good faith, and information thereof given to the Land Department by filing the map thereof with the Commissioner of the General Land-Office, or the Secretary of the Interior, the law withdraws from sale or preemption the odd sections to the extent of forty miles on each side. The object of the law in this particular is plain: it is to preserve the land for the Company to which, in aid of the construction of the road, it is granted. Although the Act does not require the officers of the Land Department to give notice to the local land officers of the withdrawal of the odd sections from sale or preemption, it has been the practice of the Department in such cases, to formally withdraw them. It cannot be otherwise than the exercise of a wise precaution by the department to give such information to the local land officers as may serve to guide aright those seeking settlements on the public lands; and thus prevent settlements and expenditures connected with them which would afterwards prove to be useless.

Nor is there anything inconsistent with this view of the sixth section as to the general route, in the clause in the third section making the grant operative only upon such odd sections as have not been reserved, sold, granted, or otherwise appropriated, and to which preemption and other rights and claims have not attached, when a map of the definite location has been filed. The third section does not embrace [73] sales and preemptions in cases where the sixth section declares that the land shall not be subject to sale or preemption. The two sections must be so construed as to give effect to both, if that be practicable.

In the present case, the general route of the road was indicated by the map filed in the office of the Secretary of the Interior on the 21st of February, 1872. It does not appear that any objection was made to the sufficiency of the map, or to the route designated, in any particular. Accordingly, on the 30th of March, 1872, the Commissioner of the General Land-Office transmitted a diagram or map, showing this route, to the officers of the local land-office in Dakota, and by direction of the Secretary ordered them to withhold from sale, location, preemption, or homestead entry all surveyed and unsurveyed odd-numbered sections of public land falling within the limits of forty miles, as designated on the map.

This notification did not add to the force of the Act itself, but it gave notice to all parties seeking to make a preemption settlement that lands within certain defined limits might be appropriated for the road. At that time the lands were subject to the Indian title. The defendant could not, therefore, as already stated, have then initiated any preemption right by his settlement; and the law cut him off from any subsequent preemption. The withdrawal of the odd sections mentioned from sale or preemption, by the sixth section of the Act, after the general route of the road was fixed, in the manner stated, was never annulled.

It follows that the defendant could never afterwards acquire any rights against the Company by his settlement.

Judgment affirmed.

[148] JOHN J. SHIPMAN, Appt.,
v.
DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, Appt.,
v.
JOHN J. SHIPMAN.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 148.)

Board Public Works, District Columbia—contract to repair roads—"board rates"—commissioners—variance from specifications—casus omissus—bonds made equal to cash—allowances by engineer.

1. Where in the autumn of 1871, the claimant offered to put the canal road, between Aqueduct and Chain Bridges in the District of Columbia, in order, and his terms were not accepted, but a year later the board of public works ordered that a contract should be awarded him for this work, and that he should be notified of its action, and the secretary of the board, instead of notifying him of such action, informed him that a contract had been awarded him at "board rates" and the claimant proceeded to perform the work, being paid therefor at "board rates"—except as to masonry, for which he received $5 per cubic yard, while the "board rates" were $6.50 per perch—and he was paid nothing for haul, and subsequently a contract was drawn at the rates he had been paid and antedated, the court refused to correct the contract, under the claimant's theory that the price fixed for masonry per cubic yard, and the omission to pay for haul was through mistake; "board rates" being claimed.

2. Where, after the commissioners had succeeded the board of public works, the claimant varied from the plans and specifications, by constructing a wall wider than called for, giving his reasons for these changes to the assistant engineer of the District and to the commissioners, who assented thereto, and measurements and payments were made with the knowledge of the assistant engineers and commissioners, after final settlement it was held that a claim by the District of Columbia to recover back the amount paid in excess of the original specifications could not be maintained.

3. Where the instrument extending the contract made no provision for excavation in places where there was no previous wall, a provision in the original contract for "excavations and refilling, 40 cts. per cubic yard, to be measured in excavation only;" and "grading, 30 cts. for each and every cubic yard of earth, sand or gravel, excavated and hauled," will not include such excavation.

4. Where in the contract there is a casus omissus, and the claimant has done the work, and the District has received the benefit of it, the court will examine the findings, and ascertain whether they furnish the means for fixing its value.

5. Where there was a misunderstanding between the parties, as to whether by "an extra compensation of 40 cts. per foot," was intended 40 cts. per square foot, or 40 cts. per lineal foot, a compromise, by fixing upon a rate of 74 and 1-2 cts. a running foot, will be regarded by the court as a settlement of the disputed item, and will not be disturbed.

6. Where, in an emergency, the engineer in chief wrote to the contractor "to repair the roads and culverts, in the vicinity of the work now being performed by you along the Little Falls Road, which have been damaged by the late storms, as extra work, under your contract number 561, with the late board of public works," and the work was performed, the payment called for was in cash; and it was illegal for the commissioners to direct a bill to be made out and certified to at rates which produced an aggregate that would make the payment in certificates equivalent to a payment of the bill rendered, in cash. The amount paid in certificates, will be treated as a cash payment to that amount, although the commissioners had no cash at the time applicable to such payment.

7. Allowances by the engineer in chief, made after the controversy arose, in excess of the contract price for masonry and an allowance for haul, will not be disturbed; the court assuming there may have been good reason for allowing the haul, and the masonry may have been of a different quality from the rubble cement, for which the contract fixes the price at $5.

CROSS APPEALS from the Court of Claims. Affirmed.

This case arose upon a petition filed in the court below by the appellant, John J. Shipman, to recover a large amount claimed to be due the petitioner under a contract with the defendant for the repair of what is known as the Canal Road, located in the District of Columbia.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court of claims adopted by this court, which was delivered by DAVIS, J., as follows:

The items in the claimant's bill of particulars depend, in some measure, upon the force to be given to a contract known as contract No. 561.

In the autumn of 1871 the claimant offered to put the canal road between Aqueduct and Chain Bridges in order. Apparently his terms were not acceptable, for no notice was taken of them. A year later the board ordered that a contract should be awarded him for this work, and directed that he be notified of its action. An attempt was made to connect this act with the claimant's acts of the previous year; but the findings show no such connection, and in our opinion there was none.

The secretary of the board at once wrote to the claimant, but instead of notifying him of the real doings of the board, he notified him that a contract had been awarded him "at board rates," which had not been alluded to by the board in their action. The claimant, before commencing work, saw the defendant's officers in relation to the work and the contract, but what took place can only be inferred from subsequent acts of both parties.

The claimant did work to the amount of a few thousand dollars in the autumn of 1872, for which he was paid in part. In the spring of 1873 he resumed work and continued at it until the autumn, when a final measurement was had of the work done to that time. For all this work he was paid at board rates with two exceptions: (1) he was paid for stone masonry at $5 per cubic yard, while the board rate was $6.50 per perch; (2) he was paid nothing for haul. So far as we can gather from the findings, his bills were rendered at the rates at which they were paid, and the payments were received without any intimation that the amounts allowed were too small.

During the progress of the work the claimant had put macadam on the road by direction of one of the board of public works. This was formally recognized as a part of his contract in November, 1873, and in December, 1873, the contract, No. 561, under which all the work was supposed to have been done, was formally executed.

The findings show that both parties intended to embody in this formal instrument, and supposed they had embodied in it, all the agreements under which the one had been doing work and the other had been paying money. The instrument was antedated for the purpose, as the findings further show, of making it operative during the whole period of the work.

The claimant now, however, makes two objections to this instrument: In the first place it was signed on behalf of the board of public works by Henry D. Cooke, Alexander R. Shepherd, and James A. Magruder. Cooke was a member of the board in October, 1872, when the contract with the claimant was actually made, but he had ceased to be a member in December, 1873, when the formal evidence of it was actually signed. Shepherd and Magruder were members throughout. The total number of the board was five. The claimant maintains that the instrument, not having been signed by a majority of the board, is invalid.

It is unnecessary for us to decide whether he is correct in this contention, for the findings show that the claimant signed that paper for the purpose of showing what his own understanding of the contract was. If, notwithstanding the written instrument, the contract still rested in parol, the court could have no stronger evidence to show what the claimant intended it to be. If, on the other hand, the written contract is valid, the practical result on the issues in this suit is the same.

In the second place the claimant maintains that he engaged to do the work at board rates; that when the written contract varied from board rates by excluding haul, and paying for masonry at only $5 a cubic yard, it was a variation made without his knowledge, and against the intent of both parties; and that, these provisions of the contract having been inserted by mistake, the court should reform the contract by restoring board rates as the measure of compensation. This theory rests for its support upon (1) the letter of the secretary informing the claimant that a contract had been awarded him at board rates; (2) the testimony of the claimant that he supposed the rates stated in the written instrument were board rates.

We have already seen that the letter of the secretary was not justified or authorized by the action of the board. The claimant's contention therefore rests mainly upon his own unsupported testimony. On the other hand, it is contradicted by his own consistent conduct, from October, 1872, when he began work under the original contract, to January, 1876, when he finished under the last extension of the contract. During all this time he rendered accounts and received pay for masonry at $5, and for grading, without claiming haul. We cannot shut our eyes to these practical acts of construction. We think that before he began work he must have known that the secretary had made a mistake. We are also of opinion that when he signed the contract, in December, 1873, he knew what its purport was, and that it expresses the agreement as he understood it.

Having disposed of this general question, we will take up the items of the claim and counterclaim in detail. * * *

The defendant asks judgment for a large sum for alleged overpayment. The facts are briefly these:

The wall was some three miles in length, and in some places as much as ten feet high. In the very outset the claimant varied from the plans and specifications by constructing it wider than they called for. He gave his reasons for these changes to the assistant engineers of the District and to the commissioners, and they assented to the change. From time to time during the work, measurements were taken and returned to the chief engineer, and passed upon by him and payments made in accordance with them; and all these measurements included the variations thus made. The commissioners knew of it and the reasons for it, and consented to it; the assistant engineers knew of it, and the engineer in chief might have known of it if he had paid personal attention to it. There was no attempt at concealment or fraud. When the final payment was made, which is now sought to be recovered back, it was done with the knowledge of the commissioners, and by personal direction of one of them, and with the knowledge and consent of Assistant Engineer Oertly, who was acting as chief in the absence of Mr. Hoxie. The ground of the defendant's claim for repayment is that the engineer-in-chief did not assent to the changes which involved the construction of 4,091.83 yards of masonry beyond his plans. We think this claim cannot be maintained. * * *

The foundation for the wall:—The terms of the contract must govern our decision. It required the claimant to:

"Construct a stone retaining or parapet wall on the south side of the Little Falls Road, between the Aqueduct and Chain Bridges, or at such points along said road as may be authorized by the commissioners, at $5 per cubic yard. * * * The present retaining walls to be removed to such depth from the top as may be directed, and the foundation inspected and approved by the engineer of the District of Columbia before relaying the wall, which is to be done in cement mortar."

A portion of the new wall was constructed in places where there was no old wall. It is admitted that the contract gives the claimant no claim for the labor in getting ready for the foundations in places where there was a previous wall. The claim is confined to excavation in places where there was no previous wall. The instrument extending the contract makes no other provision for payment except that already quoted. We are of opinion that it requires the claimant to do all the work necessary for the finished masonry at the agreed price of $5, unless there is something in the old instrument which gives him further pay for excavation.

Turning to that we find these provisions only: "Excavations and refilling, forty (40) cents per cubic yard, to be measured in excavation only," and "grading, thirty (30) cents for each and every cubic yard of earth, sand, or gravel excavated and hauled."

It is plain that the provision in regard to grading does not apply to this case. We think it equally clear that the other does not. This is not a case of excavation and refilling, like a sewer trench; and the rate of payment agreed upon for such double work is not applicable to this. There being nothing in the old contract to control the plain language of the extension we must decide against the claimant on this item.

The lining back of the wall for drainage:—The specifications called for "a lining of coarse gravel twelve (12) inches in thickness carried up in rear of the retaining wall," and the plans showed this in detail. There was no gravel along the line of the road, and it was mutually agreed, during the construction of the work, that macadam material should be substituted for the gravel. The contract is silent as to the rate of pay for this work, which has been satisfactorily performed. The defendant maintains that it was intended to be paid for by the price allowed for the masonry in the wall.

The claimant contends that he is entitled to compensation (1) for the labor in excavating the place for the reception of the lining, at the rate allowed by the old contract for excavations and refilling; (2) for the lining to be measured as masonry.

It is plain that this work of graveling in the rear of the wall, as contemplated by the contract, was a work of considerable labor and expense. We cannot think that either party intended it to be paid for in computing the masonry. In our opinion it is a casus omissus. The parties have accidentally neglected to fix a price for this work. The claimant has done the work; the District has received the benefit of it; and it only remains for the court to examine the findings and ascertain whether they furnish the means for fixing its value. * * *

The coping on the wall:—The contract called for a—

"Coping to consist of selected stones six to ten inches thick, jointed; in length of not less than two feet, and must project over the parapet wall not less than two nor more than four inches on each side, and must be so disposed along the line of the wall that no two in juxtaposition shall vary in thickness nor in width more than three quarters of an inch."

After laying about a thousand feet of this coping the claimant wrote to the commissioners that it was expensive, arduous and unsatisfactory work to make such coping, and made a proposition in the following language: "That I be allowed to use for the coping North River or other suitable coping stone, for which I will be allowed an extra compensation of forty (40) cents per foot. This stone will cost me, delivered on the ground, nearly (1) dollar per foot, but I am willing to bear more than one half the expense, only asking the District Government to assume the proportion I have named."

To this proposition Mr. Hoxie, on behalf of the District, made the following reply: "You are requested to call at this office to execute the necessary papers for an extension to your contract, No. 561, with the late board of public works, to include the finishing of the parapet wall along the Little Falls Road with the North River coping, at forty cents per lineal foot, payable in 3.65 bonds at par.

The claimant did not call and execute the proposed extension, but instead thereof went on with the proposed change, and the court is now called upon from this correspondence and the acts of the parties to decide what their agreements really were.

Assuming the average thickness of the coping called for by the contract to be 8 inches, and its average width to be 30 inches, the contract price for it; viz., $5.00 per cubic yard, would amount to 30.5 cents per running foot. The diminution in the size caused by using North River blue stone, taking Hoxie's measurements in finding XXVIII, reduced the contract price for it, measured as masonry, to about 15.4 cents per running foot. As some compensation for this reduction, as well as the increased cost of the proposed change (estimated by the claimant at nearly $1.00 per foot), the claimant proposed that he should be allowed an extra compensation of 40 cents per foot. He did not indicate whether he meant 40 cents per square foot or 40 cents per lineal foot. He now says that he intended square feet and argues that the engineer must have so understood him, because any other construction would be inconsistent with the prices of blue stone.

Lieutenant Hoxie's answer may be construed in two ways: (1) either as an acceptance of the claimant's proposition, defining the undefined term in it to be a lineal and not a square foot; or, (2) as a counter proposal of 40 cents a running foot as the entire compensation. We think the first construction the one most consistent with the facts in the case, and the one which gives force to the whole correspondence. It is also the only one consistent with the action of Lieutenant Hoxie at a subsequent stage, when he sanctioned a measurement of the work which contemplated an allowance to the claimant for the coping as masonry, and an additional payment by the foot.

When the parties came to settle, after the work was done, both agreed that the claimant was entitled to be paid for the coping as masonry (which we have seen to be about 15.4 cents per running foot), and at as high a rate as 40 cents extra per lineal foot, or an aggregate of about 55.4 cents per running foot. The claimant contended that he was entitled to a gross allowance of 40 cents per square foot, which, allowing the coping to be 2 feet wide, would be 40 cents a running foot additional, or about 95.4 cents per running foot. The parties compromised by fixing upon a rate of 74½ cents a running foot. We cannot say that this payment was made in mistake of fact. We think that it was made and received as a settlement of a disputed item. Regarding it in this light, we can neither on the one hand set aside the payments already made to enable the defendant to recover on its counterclaim nor can we on the other hand award to the claimant the contract price for the coping as masonry; since the claim for it, however well founded it may have been originally, entered into the settlement by which both parties accepted a rate of compensation which neither contemplated when the work was done. * * *

The next items in consecutive order relate to what is known as the New Cut Road, a road near to and connected with the Canal (or Little Falls) Road, on which the claimant was at work in August, 1875.

It appears that this New Cut road was badly damaged by storms in that month. The three years' experience which the District authorities had had at that time with the claimant as a contractor appears to have inspired confidence, and in the emergency Mr. Hoxie addressed the following letter, on the 31st of August, to the claimant: "You are authorized to repair the roads and culverts in the vicinity of the work now being performed by you along the Little Falls road which have been damaged by the late storms, as extra work under your contract No. 561 with the late Board of Public Works. You will present this order with your bill for the work, which will be done under the direction of Mr. Cunningham and Mr. Carroll, overseers."

No answer was made to this communication, but as the claimant at once went on with the work he must be presumed to have accepted the proposal.

In December he rendered an itemized bill, amounting in the aggregate to over $15,000, and asked for measurement and payment under his contract. This contract called for payment in cash. The defendant had no cash. Under directions of the commissioners a bill was made out and certified to at rates which produced an aggregate that would make a payment in certificates equivalent to a payment of the bill rendered in cash, and the claimant was so paid in certificates.

We do not apprehend that there was anything immoral or intrinsically dishonest in this transaction. The parties assumed what was a manifest fact: that work to be paid for in depreciated securities was nominally worth higher rates than work to be paid for in cash. But the act was clearly illegal. The defendant having agreed to pay cash was legally bound to pay cash; but when it found itself unable to do so, the law forbade it from parting with its securities to a creditor at less than par. It is too clear for argument that what it did was an attempt to do indirectly what the law forbade it to do directly, which a familiar rule of law makes an impossibility.

This payment in certificates to the amount of $22,182.92 must therefore be taken to be a cash payment to that amount on account of the work done on the New Cut Road. It is the only payment that has been made on that account. Our labors in this respect are, therefore, now reduced to ascertaining the amount of the work done by the claimant on that road.

On the 14th December, 1876, Lieutenant Hoxie addressed to the commissioners a letter in which he said: "I transmit herewith final measurement of work done on New Cut Road by J. J. Shipman, under contract No. 561 of the late board of public works, amounting to $24,352.29." The measurements inclosed in this letter show the following apparent variations from contract rates: an allowance of $6.50 for masonry, and an allowance for haul. The counsel for the defendant ask us to strike these items from the measurement. These measurements were made after the present controversy arose, and undoubtedly express Lieutenant Hoxie's well-considered judgment as to the claimant's rights. There may have been good reason for allowing the haul, and the masonry may have been of a different quality from the rubble cement, for which the contract fixes the price at $5. We are not disposed to assume the responsibility of changing these items.

Among the items included in this measurement were 1,090.8 perches of dry wall. The contract fixes no price for such labor and material. Lieutenant Hoxie estimates it to be worth $2.50 per perch, and allows that rate. The claimant contends that it is worth more than that, and introduced considerable proof to sustain his contention. We have reached the conclusion that the rate allowed by Lieutenant Hoxie is below the prices paid for such wall at the time of its construction, and have found that it was worth $3.50 per perch instead of $2.50, as allowed.

As the result of this we disallow the counterclaim on account of the work on the New Cut Road, and allow the claimant as follows:

Work done as by Hoxie's estimate	$24,352 50
1,098.8 perches dry wall, $1 per perch additional	1,098 80
	25,451 30
Less payments in certificates at par	22,182 92
	$3,268 38

Mr. W. Willoughby, for Shipman:

The letter signed by the secretary of the board, whether in fact authorized by the board or not, could not affect the rights of this claimant.

Mr. W. Willoughby, for Shipman, in reply:

The court of claims had equitable as well as legal jurisdiction in cases under this Act, and there was no difficulty in following the rule laid down in the following cases:

Dermott v. Jones, 2 Wall. 9 (69 U. S. bk. 17, L. ed. 764); Dale v. U. S. 14 Ct. Cl. 514, 517; McKinney v. Springer, 3 Ind. 59; S. C. 54 Am. Dec. 470; Hayward v. Leonard, 7 Pick. 181; S. C. 19 Am. Dec. 268.

The finding of the court does not show such a mistake as would vitiate an award. If it did, the contractors are not to be bound by the award, nor by a settlement in pursuance of it if the award be set aside.

Burchell v. Marsh, 17 How. 344 (58 U. S. bk. 15, L. ed. 96).

As showing that the letter of the secretary was binding upon the board of public works as to payments at "board rates" we call attention to Supervisors v. Schenck, 5 Wall. 772 (72 U. S. bk. 18, L. ed. 556).

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

The judgment in this case is affirmed. No disputed questions of law are involved, and our views of the facts are so well expressed in the carefully prepared opinion of the court of claims, found in Shipman v. Dist. Col. 18 Ct. Cl. 291, that we deem it unnecessary to do more than to refer to that opinion for the reasons of our decision.

Affirmed.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the Territory of Montana. Dismissed.

The case is sufficiently stated by the court.

Messrs. J. Hubley Ashton and Nathaniel Wilson, for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Edwin W. Toole and Joseph K. Toole, for defendants in error.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court: [236]

This is a writ of error to the Supreme Court of the Territory of Montana to bring up for review the judgment in a suit where there was not a trial by jury. Under the Act of April 7, 1874, chap. 80, sec. 2, 18 Stat. at L. part 3, page 27, the case should have been brought up by appeal, and the writ of error is therefore dismissed. [237] Hecht v. Boughton, 105 U.S. 235 [Bk. 26, L. ed. 1018]; *U. [110] FIRE ASSOCIATION OF PHILADELPHIA, Plff. in Err.,

v.

PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 110-129.)

Jurisdiction—writ of error to state court—opinion of state court—constitutional law—taxation of foreign corporation by State—State may exclude or impose conditions—when corporation is within jurisdiction of State.

1. Upon a writ of error to review a judgment entered in the Supreme Court of New York in accordance with a decision of the Court of Appeals of that State, this court can examine the opinion of the Court of Appeals, a copy of which, duly authenticated, is transmitted here with the record.

2. It appearing from that opinion that the state court decided against a claim set up by the plaintiff in error under the Constitution of the United States, and that such decision was necessary to the decision of the case, this court has jurisdiction to review that decision.

3. The Statute of the State of New York, providing that when the laws of other States imposed upon insurance companies incorporated under the laws of New York, as a condition to their doing business in such States, greater burdens than were imposed by the laws of New York upon similar companies of such other States doing business in New York, then the same burdens should be imposed upon the companies of such other States doing business in New York as were by the laws of such States imposed upon New York companies, is not contrary to the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing that no State shall "deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

4. A foreign corporation is not within the jurisdiction of the State of New York until it has complied with the laws of that State as to payment of license fees, taxes and the deposit of securities, etc. A corporation having complied with the law and received a license for a year is within the State for that year; but it is within the power of the State to change the conditions of admission at any time as to the future, and if it makes such a change for the future the foreign corporation is not within the State after the expiration of the year for which it was licensed, until it has complied with such changed conditions.

[No. 15.]

Argued Oct. 26, 1886. Decided Nov. 15, 1886.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of New York. Affirmed.

The case is stated by the court.

Mr. Joseph H. Choate, for plaintiff in error:

That a corporation like the plaintiff in error is a "person" within the meaning of the Fourteenth Amendment, seems no longer debatable since the announcement made by the learned chief justice, in the case of Santa Clara Co. v. Southern Pac. R. R. Co. 118 U. S. 396 (Bk. 30, L. ed. 119), that all the members of the court were of the opinion that the corporations in that case, being railroad companies, were properly within the terms of that description.

See also San Mateo Case, 13 Fed. Rep. 722, 746–748, 758–762; Co. of Santa Clara Case, 18 Fed. Rep. 385, 397–404; Kentucky R. R. Tax Cases, 115 U. S. 321 (Bk. 29, L. ed. 414); Chinese Laundry Cases, 118 U. S. 27, 703 (Bk. 28, L. ed. 923, 1145); 118 U. S. 356 (Bk. 30, L. ed. 220).

The plaintiff in error was, in 1881, unquestionably, if a person at all, a person within the jurisdiction of the State of New York. It is a part of the agreed statement of facts that the plaintiff in error had, by direct authority from the State, uniformly maintained its agency within the State from 1872 down to the present time. It transacted its business there under the authority, implied and express, of the State, and under the usual certificate of authority from the State granted in such cases upon compliance with the prescribed conditions. It contributed yearly its quota, by taxation, to the revenues of the State, and was in all respects, and to every intent and purpose, within the jurisdiction of the State of New York. Thus it had, as a Corporation, a legal and actual existence within the State by virtue of the legislative authority of New York, and not by virtue of its Pennsylvania charter. While it is true that a corporation cannot migrate, that is, change its legal residence or citizenship, it is just as true that, in all other respects, in the transaction of its business it can, through the medium of its agents, move about with perfect freedom and, with the consent of the sovereign power, go "within the jurisdiction" of any State. It is possible for a foreign corporation to come "within the jurisdiction" of the State. If this be so, certainly there can be no better or higher evidence of the fact that such a corporation is actually within the jurisdiction than the certificate which it, or its agents, receives from the State, authorizing it to transact business therein, and at the same time subjecting it to the jurisdiction of the state and federal courts of that locality. Indeed, such a certificate is, under the Statutes of New York, the only evidence that a foreign corporation is legally within the State. Such a certificate the plaintiff in error has received from year to year since 1872.

See Lafayette Ins. Co. v. French, 18 How. 404 (59 U. S. bk. 15, L. ed. 451); Ex parte Schollenberger, 96 U. S. 369 (Bk. 24, L. ed. 853); R. R. Co. v. Koontz, 104 U. S. 5, 10–18 (Bk. 26, L. ed. 643–645); St. Clair v. Cox, 106 U. S. 350, 355 (Bk. 27, L. ed. 222, 224).

The question here presented is not as to the right of the State of New York to admit or exclude any or all foreign corporations, or even the particular Corporation here litigating. The State has not undertaken to exclude the plaintiff in error; it has admitted and recognized this Corporation as a part of its own business community, but now, after having got the Company within its territory and in its grasp, seeks to impose upon it an unequal tax, penalty, burden or condition, which is, as we claim, repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, and therefore a tax, penalty, burden or condition which is not within the power of the State to impose. It is on this point, we submit, that the learned judge who delivered the opinion in the court of appeals is clearly in error; that is, in contending that the plaintiff in error was not, at the time of the imposition of this unequal tax and burden, a person "within" the jurisdiction of the State. He says that the Fourteenth Amendment "relates wholly to persons within the jurisdiction, already there in fact and of right, and their treatment thereafter; and not at all to the terms and conditions on which alone they can come in."

People v. Fire Asso. of Phila. 92 N. Y. 311, at p. 326.

But the plaintiff in error was already within the jurisdiction of the State of New York; already there in fact and of right, by permission of the State, from 1872 to 1881; and it is the "treatment thereafter" of which we complain. The State did not meet it at the threshold and seek to exclude it, but admitted it on certain conditions, the legality of which was not disputed, and is not now; and afterwards, to wit, after the passage by the State of Pennsylvania, in 1873, of its Act aimed at foreign corporations, the State of New York sought to impose upon the plaintiff in error, already there in fact and of right, the unequal, and therefore unlawful, burden which it did not impose upon any insurance companies within its limits from other States than Pennsylvania.

The plaintiff in error came into the State of New York in the year 1872, and complied with all the conditions then in force therein. Although the Law of 1865 was then upon the statute books, yet it did not really create or provide for any tax or condition, as to this Pennsylvania Corporation, for the contingency, the happening of which alone gave life and force to that law, as against Pennsylvania corporations; namely, the passage of a law by the State of Pennsylvania imposing a tax upon foreign corporations greater than that imposed upon such companies by the laws of New York did not come to pass until 1873. On April 4, 1873, the State of Pennsylvania passed such an Act. On that day, therefore, and not before, the Act of 1865 sprang into existence as against the plaintiff in error. When it came into the State there was not, so far as it was concerned, any such condition or tax in existence. It had been "within" the jurisdiction of the State an entire year, 1872–1873, before this tax was imposed. Not only so, but if the Act of 1865 is unconstitutional and void, it never was a law of the State of New York, and under no circumstances was the plaintiff in error obliged to recognize it as such. "An unconstitutional law is void, and is as no law."

Ex parte Siebold, 100 U. S. 376 (Bk. 25, L. ed. 719).

Mr. Denis O'Brien, Atty-Gen. of New York, for defendants in error:

The tax imposed upon the plaintiff in error under the Act of 1865 is in the nature of a license fee. It is within the scope of the power of the Legislature of the State of New York to impose upon foreign corporations a tax as the price of the privilege of doing business within the State. It is well settled that the State can prohibit a foreign corporation from coming within its jurisdiction, or it may admit it on such terms as the Legislature shall see fit to impose; and a corporation availing itself of the privilege to do business here must comply with the conditions exacted. Corporations have no legal existence beyond the territorial limits of the sovereignty by which they were created. They are, it is true, ordinarily permitted to make contracts and transact business in other sovereignties, but this provision is due entirely to the comity of States and not to any absolute right. It is a mere privilege that they may be permitted to enjoy on such terms as the legislative power may prescribe, and which may, in the discretion of the Legislature, be absolutely withheld.

Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 13 Pet. 519 (38 U. S. bk. 10, L. ed. 274); Paul v. Va. 8 Wall. 168 (75 U. S. bk. 19, L. ed. 357); Liverpool Ins. Co. v. Mass. 10 Wall. 566 (77 U. S. bk. 19, L. ed. 1029); Cooper Mfg. Co. v. Ferguson, 113 U. S. 727 (Bk. 28, L. ed. 1137).

Nor can the rule that it is within the scope of legislative power to impose a tax upon foreign corporations, as the price of the privilege of doing business within the State, be weakened by the attempted distinction between the cases of corporations desiring to enter a State to do business and those already carrying on business therein at the time of the imposition of an increased tax. No such distinction exists in the law. The power to impose a license tax exists, and has always existed, whether exercised or not. The State waived no right by the fact that the agents of the Corporation were not actually met on the border by an agent of the State with a schedule of conditions. When the Corporation crossed the boundary lines it was chargeable with knowledge of the existence of power and the possibility and probability of its future exercise. The State, as a State, could not take cognizance of the unimportant fact that the plaintiff in error had come within its jurisdiction to carry on the business of making insurances. To say that the State cannot now exercise its inherent and inalienable power, after the Corporation has set up its business, is tantamount to saying that by its coming into the State, the Corporation deprived the State of a portion of its sovereign powers. The State can not only prevent foreign corporations from coming into its jurisdiction, but it has also the power to drive them therefrom after they have come in and established a business therein. The Wisconsin cases, arising upon the statute requiring foreign corporations to stipulate not to transfer suits to the federal courts, are illustrative in the present case. The State Supreme Court held such stipulation binding and constitutional.

Morse v Home Ins. Co. 30 Wis. 496.

The Supreme Court of the United States reversed the decision of the state court and denied the constitutionality of the Act and the binding force of the stipulation.

See 20 Wall. 445 (87 U. S. bk. 22, L. ed. 365).

Thereupon a citizen of Wisconsin applied for a mandamus against the Secretary of State, to compel him to annul the leave granted the company to do business. A writ was awarded by the Supreme Court of Wisconsin, the late Chief Justice Ryan, in a very able opinion, holding the stipulation valid and that mandamus must issue, even though the United States Supreme Court had awarded an injunction against the Secretary of State to prohibit such an act.

State, ex rel. Drake, v. Doyle, 40 Wis. 175.

A mandamus compelling the license was denied.

State, ex rel. Continental Co. v. Doyle, 40 Wis. 220.

The contention came again before the Supreme Court of the United States on appeal from a judgment of the United States Circuit Court directing an injunction against the Secretary of State, to prevent him from revoking the license. The supreme court reaffirmed the unconstitutionality of the act, on the ground that the jurisdiction of the Courts of the United States could not be impaired even by stipulation, but that the State of Wisconsin might enforce the penalty by exclusion, and reversed the judgment.

Doyle v. Continental Ins. Co. 94 U. S. 535 (Bk. 24, L. ed 148).

And this court, in pronouncing that judgment, said: "The correlative power to revoke or recall a permission is a necessary consequence of the main power. A mere license by a State is always revocable." The Act of 1865 and the tax imposed upon the plaintiff in error, thereunder, are not repugnant to the first section of the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, which declares that no State shall deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

The plaintiff in error is not to be regarded as a person within the jurisdiction of the State of New York, within the meaning of the Amendment. A corporation can have no legal existence out of the sovereignty by which it was created. It must dwell in the place of its creation and cannot migrate to another sovereignty.

Bank of Augusta v. Earle, supra; Runyan v. Coster's Lessee, 14 Pet. 122 (39 U. S. bk. 10, L. ed. 382); Covington Drawbridge Co. v. Shepherd, 20 How. 233 (61 U. S. bk. 15, L. ed. 898).

They are the creatures of local law and have not even the right of recognition in other States, except through comity. They cannot make a valid contract outside the State of their origin without the sanction of the foreign State, expressed or implied. Cases cited last above.

Paul v. Va. supra; R. R. Co. v. Koontz, 104 U. S. 5, 11 (Bk. 26, L. ed. 643, 644)

Only within the State of their origin, and there only in a restricted sense, are they to be regarded as citizens; and that restricted sense does not include them within the meaning of that clause of the Constitution which declares that citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several States.

Liverpool Ins. Co. v. Mass. and Paul v. Va. supra.

The franchise of a corporation cannot be taxed outside of the State which granted such franchise; nor can any State tax the property of a foreign corporation, except such portion thereof as is actually within its jurisdiction.

McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 430 (17 U. S. bk. 4, L. ed. 697); State Tax on Foreign Held Bonds, 15 Wall. 300 (82 U. S. bk. 21, L. ed. 179).

These cases cited, both in direct declaration and by clear implication, unmistakably establish the doctrine that in the estimation of the law a corporation cannot leave the State under whose laws it was organized. The business of the plaintiff in error carried on in the State of New York was done solely through insurance agents. Can it be said that a man who sends his money for investment to an agent in another State comes within the jurisdiction of that State, and by virtue of his investments there can claim to be a "person within the jurisdiction" of that State, within the meaning of the Fourteenth Amendment? Yet such is the relation which a corporation, through its agencies, assumes to the jurisdiction and laws of States other than that in which it is organized, except that the privileges of a corporation are special and limited to the objects named in its charter, while the individual is the possessor, by inherent and inalienable rights, of the power and privilege to do everything which lies within the scope of his volition, subject only to the restraints of general and universal law.

Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error to the Supreme Court of the State of New York. Under the provisions of section 1279 of the Code of Civil Procedure of New York, the People of the State of New York and the Fire Association of Philadelphia, a Pennsylvania corporation, being parties to a [111] question in difference which might be the subject of an action, agreed upon a case containing a statement of the facts on which the controversy depended, and presented a written submission of it to the Supreme Court of New York, so that the controversy became an action. The material facts set forth in the case are these:

"The defendant, the Fire Association of Philadelphia, is a corporation created and organized in the year 1820, by and under the laws of the State of Pennsylvania, for the transaction of the business of fire insurance, and having its principal place of business in the City of Philadelphia. In the year 1872 it established an agency in the State of New York, which it has ever since maintained. No question is here raised but that it has uniformly complied with all the requirements and conditions imposed by the laws of this State upon fire insurance companies from other States establishing and maintaining agencies in this State—except the payment of the tax now in dispute, upon premiums received by it in 1881 upon risks located within the State of New York, and which is the subject of this controversy—and has received from year to year certificates of authority from the Superintendent of the Insurance Department of this State, as provided to be issued under the Act, chapter 466 of the Laws of 1853, and the subsequent Acts amendatory thereof.

The Act of the People of the State of New York, passed May 11, 1865, three fifths being present, being chapter 694 of the Laws of 1865, entitled 'An Act in Relation to the Deposits Required to Be Made, and the Taxes, Fines, Fees, and Other Charges Payable by Insurance Companies of Sister States,' as amended by the Act of 1875, chapter 60, provides as follows, viz.: 'Whenever the existing or future laws of any other State of the United States shall require of insurance companies, incorporated by or organized under the laws of this State, and having agencies in such other States, or of the agents thereof, any deposit of securities in such State for the protection of policy holders or otherwise, or any payment for taxes, fines, penalties, certificates of authority, license fees, or otherwise, greater than the amount required for such purposes from similar companies of [112] other States by the then existing laws of this State, then, and in every such case, all companies of such States establishing, or having heretofore established, an agency or agencies in the State shall be and are hereby required to make the same deposit for a like purpose in the Insurance Department of the State, and to pay the superintendent of said department for taxes, fines, penalties, certificates of authority, license fees, and otherwise, an amount equal to the amount of such charges and payments imposed by the laws of such State upon the companies of this State and the agents thereof; and the Superintendent of the Insurance Department is hereby authorized to remit any of the fees and charges which he is required to collect by existing laws, except such as he is required to collect under and by virtue of this Act; Provided, however, that no discrimination shall be made in favor of one company over any other from the same State.'

The State of Pennsylvania, by an Act passed April 4, 1873, and ever since in force, enacted as follows, viz.: 'Section 10. No person shall act as agent or solicitor in this State of any insurance company of another State, or foreign government, in any manner whatever relating to risks, until the provisions of this Act have been complied with on the part of the company or association, and there has been granted to said company or association, by the commissioner, a certificate of authority, showing that the company or association is authorized to transact business in this State; and it shall be the duty of every such company or association, authorized to transact business in this State, to make report to the commissioner in the month of January of each year, under oath of the president or secretary thereof, showing the entire amount of premiums of every character and description received by said company or association in this State, during the year or fraction of a year ending with the thirty-first day of December preceding, whether said premiums were received in money or in the form of [113] notes, credits or any other substitute for money, and pay into the state treasury a tax of three per centum upon said premiums; and the commissioner shall not have power to grant a renewal of the certificate of said company or association until the tax aforesaid is paid into the state treasury.'"

In the year 1881, the defendant, through its authorized agents in the State of New York, received for insurance against loss or injury by fire, upon property located within the State of New York, premiums to the aggregate amount of $196,170.22. The Superintendent of the Insurance Department of New York claimed that the defendant ought to pay, as a tax, for the year 1881, $1,848.45 with proper interest, being the amount arrived at by deducting from $5,885.10 (which would be a tax of three per cent on $196,170.22.), the sum of $4,036.65, which the defendant as a Pennsylvania Corporation had paid as a tax on premiums, during 1881, under laws of New York in force in 1881, other than the Act of 1865, as amended by the Act of 1875. The case then states that "The controversy between the parties is as to whether the defendant is liable to pay any tax to the Superintendent of the Insurance Department of the State, upon the said premiums received by it in the year 1881, and if any what amount;" that "The defendant claims that it is not liable to the plaintiffs for any amount, insisting, first, that the said Act of 1865, as amended by the Act of 1875, is unconstitutional and void, and not a legitimate exercise of legislative power," and making further claims as to the amount due from it if the Act in question is valid; that "The question submitted to the court for decision upon the foregoing statement of facts is whether the defendant is liable to pay to the plaintiffs, or to the superintendent, the whole, or any, and if any what, part of the" $1,848.45; and that judgment is to be entered according to its decision.

The agreed case having been heard by the supreme court in general term, as required by law, it rendered a judgment to the effect that the defendant was not liable to pay any part of such amount claimed by the superintendent. Two of the three judges holding the court concurred in that judgment. The third dissented. [114]
The opinions of the majority and minority accompany the record. The majority held that the Statutes of New York in question were void because in conflict with the Constitution of New York, and did not discuss any question arising under the Constitution of the United States. The dissenting judge differed with the majority as to the question adjudged by them, and further said: "Nor can I agree with the claim that this statute is contrary to the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States."

The plaintiffs having appealed to the Court of Appeals of New York, that court reversed the judgment of the supreme court, and rendered judgment for the plaintiffs for $1,848.45, with interest and costs, and remitted the record to the supreme court, where a judgment to that effect was entered, to review which the defendant has brought a writ of error. The court of appeals, in its decision (92 N. Y. 311), after overruling the view taken by the majority of the judges of the supreme court as to the validity of the statute under the Constitution of New York, proceeds to consider its constitutionality under that clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Federal Constitution which commands that no State shall "deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." It holds that that clause has no application to the rights of the defendant, because being a foreign Corporation, it was not within the jurisdiction of New York, until it was admitted by the State, upon a compliance with the conditions of admission which the State imposed and had the right to impose.

The defendant claims here the benefit of the Fourteenth Amendment; and a question has occurred as to whether the record presents that point for our review. There being no pleadings, [115] the obvious place to look for the claim would be the agreed statement of facts. But all that is there said is that the defendant insists that the statute is "unconstitutional and void and [116] not a legitimate exercise of legislative power." The question was considered in both the supreme court and the court of appeals, as to the validity of the statute, under the Constitution of New York, as being a law made to depend for its operation on the legislation of a foreign State, and thus an illegitimate exercise of legislative power. This contention is fairly within the words of the agreed statement, and if it depended wholly on that statement to determine whether the record raises a federal question, some doubt might exist. But in view of what was said in Murdock v. Memphis, 20 Wall. 590,633 [87 U. S. bk. 22, L. ed. 429, 443], in Gross v. U. S. Mortgage Co. 108 U. S. 477 [Bk. 27, L. ed. 795], and in Adams Co. v. Burlington & Mo. R. R. Co. 112 U. S. 123 [Bk. 28, L. ed. 678], we think that we are at liberty to look into the opinion of the court of appeals, a copy of which, duly authenticated by the proper officer, is transmitted to us with the record, in compliance with our Eighth Rule, for the purpose of aiding in determining what was decided by that court. From that opinion it appears that the court not only decided against the defendant all the questions other than federal which were raised, including two under the Constitution of New York, but also decided against it the federal question referred to. If the court had decided in its favor any one of the other questions which went to the whole cause of action, there would have been no necessity for considering the federal question. But as it was, the decision of that question became necessary to the disposition of the case, and was fully considered, not sua sponte, but as a point presented by the defendant.

The provision of the Fourteenth Amendment, which went into effect in July, 1868, is that no State shall "deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." The first question which arises is whether this Corporation was a person within the jurisdiction of the State of New York, with reference to the subject of controversy and within the meaning of the Amendment.

The defendant, on the assumption that if it was within the jurisdiction of the State of New [117] York, it was, though a foreign Corporation, a "person," and so entitled to the benefit of the Amendment, contends that it was within such jurisdiction. The argument is, that it established an agency within the State in 1872, which it had ever since maintained; that it complied, from year to year, with all the requirements and conditions imposed by the laws of the State on foreign fire insurance companies doing business in the State; that it received from year to year certificates of authority from the Superintendent of the Insurance Department, as provided by statute; that, under those circumstances, it was legally within the State and within its jurisdiction; that, being in the State, by permission of the State, continuously from 1872 to 1882, the State imposed on it, while there, in 1882, an unequal and unlawful burden; and that the New York Act of 1865 did not come into effect as to Pennsylvania corporations until the Pennsylvania Act of 1873 was passed, at which time the defendant had already been a year in the State.

But we are unable to take that view of the case. In Paul v. Virginia, 8 Wall. 168 [75 U. S. bk. 19, L. ed. 357], at December Term, 1868, a Statute of Virginia required that every insurance company not incorporated by Virginia, should, as a condition of carrying on business in Virginia, deposit securities with the state treasurer, and afterwards obtain a license; and another statute made it a penal offense for a person to act in Virginia as agent for an insurance company not incorporated by Virginia, without such license. A person having acted as such agent without a license, and been convicted and fined under the statute, this court held that there had been no violation of that clause of article 4, section 2, of the Constitution of the United States, which provides that "The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States;" nor any violation of the clause in article 1, section 8, giving power to Congress "To regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States." The view announced was that corporations are not citizens within the clause first cited, on the ground that the privileges and immunities secured to the citizens of each State in the several States are those which are common to the citizens of of the latter States, under their Constitutions and laws, by virtue of their being citizens; and [118] that, as a corporation created by a State is a mere creation of local law, even the recognition of its existence by other States, and the enforcement of its contracts made therein, depend purely on the comity of those States—a comity which is never extended where the existence of the corporation or the exercise of its powers is "prejudicial to their interests or repugnant to their policy." And the court, speaking by Mr. Justice Field, said: "Having no absolute right of recognition in other States, but depending for such recognition and the enforcement of its contracts upon their assent, it follows, as a matter of course, that such assent may be granted upon such terms and conditions as those States may think proper to impose. They may exclude the foreign corporation entirely, they may restrict its business to particular localities, or they may exact such security for the performance of its contracts with their citizens as in their judgment will best promote the public interest. The whole matter rests in their discretion." As to the power of Congress to regulate commerce among the several States, the court said that, while the power conferred included commerce carried on by corporations as well as that carried on by individuals, "issuing a policy of insurance is not a transaction of commerce." This decision only followed the principles laid down in the earlier cases of Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 13 Pet. 519, 588 [38 U. S. bk. 10, L. ed. 274, 307], and Lafayette Ins. Co. v. French, 18 How. 404 [59 U. S. bk. 15, L. ed. 451].

The same rulings were followed in Ducat v. Chicago, 10 Wall. 410 [77 U S. bk. 19, L. ed. 972], where it was said that the power of a State to discriminate between her own corporations and those of other States desirous of transacting business within her jurisdiction being clearly established, it belonged to the State to determine as to the nature or degree of discrimination, "subject only to such limitations on her sovereignty as may be found in the fundamental law of the Union."

Other cases to the same effect are Liverpool Ins. Co. v. Massachusetts, 10 Wall. 566 [77 U. S. bk. 19, L. ed. 1029]; Doyle v. Continental Ins. Co. 94 U. S. 535 [Bk. 24, L. ed. 148], and Cooper Mfg. Co. v. Ferguson, 113 U. S. 727 [Bk. 28, L. ed. 1137].

As early as 1853, the State of New York, by [119] a statute (chap. 466), required of every fire insurance company incorporated by any other

State or any foreign government, as a prerequisite to doing business in the State, that it should file an appointment of an attorney on whom process was to be served, and a statement of its pecuniary condition, and procure from a designated public officer a certificate of authority stating that the company had complied with all the requisitions of the statute; and also required the renewal from year to year of the statement and evidence of investments; and provided that such public officer, on being satisfied that the capital of the company and its securities and investments remained secure, should furnish a renewal of the certificate of authority. A violation of the provisions was made a penal offense. This Act, with immaterial amendments, is still in force.

This Pennsylvania Corporation came into the State of New York to do business, by the consent of the State, under this Act of 1853, with a license granted for a year, and has received such license annually, to run for a year. It is within the State for any given year under such license, and subject to the conditions prescribed by statute. The State, having the power to exclude entirely, has the power to change the conditions of admission at any time, for the future, and to impose as a condition the payment of a new tax, or a further tax, as a license fee. If it imposes such license fee as a prerequisite for the future, the foreign corporation, until it pays such license fee, is not admitted within the State or within its jurisdiction. It is outside, at the threshold, seeking admission, with consent not yet given. The Act of 1865 had been passed when the Corporation first established an agency in the State. The amendment of 1875 changed the Act of 1865 only by giving to the superintendent the power of remitting the fees and charges required to be collected by then existing laws. Therefore the Corporation was at all times, after 1872, subject, as a prerequisite to its power to do business in New York, to the same license fee its own State might thereafter impose on New York companies doing business in Pennsylvania. By going into the State of New York in 1872, it assented to such prerequisite as a [120] condition of its admission within the jurisdiction of New York. It could not be of right within such jurisdiction, until it should receive the consent of the State to its entrance therein under the new provisions; and such consent could not be given until the tax, as a license fee for the future, should be paid.

It is not to be implied, from anything we have said, that the power of a State to exclude a foreign corporation from doing business within its limits is to be regarded as extending to an interference with the transaction of commerce between that State and other States by a corporation created by one of such other States.

Judgment affirmed.

James H. McKenney, Clerk, Sup. Court, U. S.

Mr. Justice Harlan, dissenting:

Under the decision just rendered, the State of New York is permitted to subject a corporation of another State, within her limits by her consent, to higher taxes in respect to its business than is imposed there upon similar corporations of other States.

At the last term of this court, when counsel were about to enter upon the argument of the case of Santa Clara Co. v. Southern Pac. R. R. Co. 118 U. S. 396 [Bk. 30, L. ed. 119], involving the validity of a system devised by one of the States for the taxation of railroad corporations of a certain class—the chief justice observed: "The court does not wish to hear argument on the question whether the provision in the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution, which forbids a State to deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws, applies to these corporations. We are all of opinion that it does." This, it is true, was said in regard to corporations of the particular State whose legislation was assailed as unconstitutional; but it is equally clear that a corporation of one State, doing business in another State by her consent, is to be deemed, at least in respect to that business, a "person" within the jurisdiction of the latter State, in the meaning of the Fourteenth Amendment.

The denial of the equal protection of the laws may occur in various ways. It will most often [121] occur in the enforcement of laws imposing taxes. An individual is denied the equal protection of the laws if his property is subjected by the State to higher taxation than is imposed upon like property of other individuals in the same community. So, a corporation is denied that protection when its property is subjected by the State, under whose laws it is organized, to more burdensome taxation than is imposed upon other domestic corporations of the same class. So, also, a corporation of one State doing business by its agents in another State by the latter's consent, is denied the equal protection of the laws, if its business there is subjected to higher taxation than is imposed upon the business of like corporations from other States. These propositions seem to me to be indisputable. They are necessarily involved in the concession that corporations, like individuals, are entitled to the equal protection of the laws.

The plaintiff in error is a Corporation of Pennsylvania. In 1872 it established and has ever since maintained an agency in the State of New York. It had its agents there when the taxes for 1881, here in question, were assessed.

The laws of New York prescribe certain conditions precedent to the right of a fire insurance company from another State to transact business there. It must possess a certain amount of actual capital; appoint an attorney in the State, service of process upon whom is to be "deemed a valid personal service upon the corporation" in any action "upon a policy or liability issued or contracted while such corporation transacted business" there; file in the insurance department a certified copy of its charter, together with a statement, verified by the oath of its chief officer and secretary, showing the name of the company, place where located, amount of its capital and assets, the extent to which its real estate is incumbered, the par and market value of all shares of stock held by it, the estimated value of its bonds, mortgages and other securities, the extent of its indebtedness, the amount of its losses, adjusted and unpaid, or incurred and in process of adjustment, the losses disputed, and the claims existing against it. It is also provided that no business shall be transacted in the State by the agent of any company from another State, while [122] its capital is impaired to the extent of 20 per cent. It further requires from such companies an annual statement, showing in detail the items making up their capital, and the deductions to be made therefrom. It was made the duty, first of the State Comptroller, and subsequently of the Superintendent of Insurance—these requirements of the statute being first complied with—to issue to the company, thus seeking admission into the State, a certificate showing its lawful right to transact business within her limits. Laws, N.Y. 1853, chap. 466; Laws, 1862, chap. 6, § 1, and chap. 367, § 5; 1871, chap. 388; Laws, 1874, chap. 331, § 1; Laws, 1875, chap. 555, § 1.

That the plaintiff in error conformed to these statutory provisions, and was admitted into New York for the transaction of business is shown by the agreed case, from which it appears that it "has uniformly complied with all the requirements and conditions imposed by the laws of this State upon fire insurance companies from other States establishing and maintaining agencies in this State, except the payment of the tax now in dispute upon premiums received by it in 1881 upon risks located within the State of New York, and which is the subject of this controversy; and has received from year to year certificates of authority from the Superintendent of the Insurance Department of this State, as provided to be issued under the Act, chapter 466 of the Laws of 1853, and the subsequent Acts amendatory thereof."

In view of these admitted facts, how can it be said that this Pennsylvania Corporation was not, in respect to its corporate business, within the jurisdiction of New York during the year when the tax in dispute accrued? That a corporation of one State, doing business in another State by the latter's consent, evidenced by the official certificate given by her insurance department in conformity with her laws, and liable, precisely as domestic corporations are, to be brought into her courts through service of process upon its duly appointed attorney or agent, in reference to any business transacted or liability incurred by it there, is to be deemed within the jurisdiction of that State, seems to me entirely clear. In Ex parte Schollenberger, 96 U. S. 374 [Bk. 24, L. ed. 854], it was decided that a for- [123] eign insurance company, doing business in Pennsylvania, under the authority of a statute of that Commonwealth requiring, as a condition precedent to its being there, an agreement that judicial process served upon its agent should have the same effect as if served upon the corporation, was, within the meaning of the Act of Congress of 1875, "found" in that State so as to give jurisdiction to the Courts of the United States, sitting in that State, of suits brought there against such company, accompanied by service of process upon its agent. The subject was again considered in St. Clair v. Cox, 106 U. S. 357 [Bk. 27, L. ed. 225], where it was said that there was no sound reason why, in the case of an insurance company doing business in another State, by an agent, under statutes such as those referred to, it should not be deemed to be represented in the latter by such agent, and held responsible for its obligations and liabilities there incurred. See also R. R. Co. v. Harris, 12 Wall. 65 [79 U. S. bk. 20, L. ed. 354]; R. Co. v. Whitton, 13 Wall. 285 [80 U. S. bk 20, L. ed. 576].

It was said in argument that the plaintiff in error entered New York with the knowledge, derived from the Act of 1865, that if Pennsylvania thereafter subjected New York insurance companies to higher taxes than the latter State imposed upon Pennsylvania corporations of the same class doing business in New York, the taxes levied upon it would be correspondingly increased; therefore, it is argued, the entrance of the plaintiff in error into New York was subject to the reserved right of that State thus to increase the taxes upon its business. The same idea is embodied in the suggestion that New York made it a prerequisite, from and after 1865, to the right of a fire insurance corporation of another State to transact business in New York, that it should pay such increased taxes, however much they might be in excess of the taxes imposed there upon corporations of the same class from the remaining States. Now, it is submitted: 1. That no such obligation was imposed by the statute upon the plaintiff in error as a prerequisite to its right to enter New York and transact business there. The agreed case shows not only that the Insurance Department of New York has certified its right to do business in that State, but that the certificate was made as provided in the Act of 1853 and the Acts amend- [124] atory thereof. Besides, there is no clause in the statute directing that department to withhold or to revoke a certificate upon the failure or refusal of the company to pay these increased taxes. The regularity and validity of that certificate was not questioned in argument, is not now disputed, and there is not a word in the statute to the effect that the payment of these increased taxes is a prerequisite to the right of the Company to remain in the State and transact business. Indeed, it is evident that the State purposely avoided establishing any such prerequisite to the right to enter her limits. She only seeks, after admitting the plaintiff in error and certifying its right to do business, to subject it to the taxation in question. 2. The power of New York to impose this increased tax surely cannot depend upon the fact that she gave notice of what she would do in the contingency expressed in the Act of 1865. Such notice neither creates a power to do that which the State could not otherwise constitutionally do, nor makes it the duty of the plaintiff in error to submit to an illegal exaction. At last, the real question presented is, whether Pennsylvania corporations can be subjected to higher taxes in New York than are imposed there upon corporations of the same class from other States.

It is said that a State may exclude altogether from its borders a corporation of another State or may admit it upon such terms or conditions as she may elect to prescribe. It is quite true that general language to that effect was employed in Paul v. Virginia, 8 Wall. 168 [75 U. S. bk. 19, L. ed. 357], where the only question necessary to be determined was as to the validity of a Statute of Virginia providing that before an insurance company, not incorporated by that State, should carry on business there, it must obtain a license therefor, and deposit with the state treasurer, as security for its engagements, bonds of a specified character and amount. In the course of the opinion which disposed of that question, it was said that a corporation of one State, "having no absolute right of recognition in other States, but depending for such recognition and the enforcement of its contracts upon their assent, it follows, as a matter of course, that such assent [125] may be granted upon such terms and conditions as those States may think proper to impose. They may exclude the foreign corporation entirely; they may restrict its business to particular localities, or they may exact such security for the performance of its contracts with their citizens as in their judgment will best promote the public interest. The whole matter rests in their discretion." But I submit that it is the settled doctrine of this court that the terms and conditions so prescribed must not be repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, or inconsistent with any right granted or secured by that instrument. In Ducat v. Chicago, 10 Wall. 415 [77 U. S. bk. 19, L. ed. 978], it was said by Mr. Justice Nelson, speaking for the court, that, in respect to the nature or degree of discrimination which a State may make between her own corporations and those of other States, "It belongs to the State to determine, subject only to such limitations on her sovereignty as may be found in the fundamental law of the Union." It was so decided in Ins. Co. v. Morse, 20 Wall. 445, 455–6 [87 U.S. bk. 22, L. ed. 365, 369], where the question was as to the validity of a Statute of Wisconsin relating to the admission into that State of fire insurance companies incorporated by other States. Besides the condition that they should designate some attorney in Wisconsin upon whom process against the company could be served, it imposed the further one that it should file in the proper office an agreement stipulating that it would not remove to the courts of the United States any suit brought against it in the local courts. An insurance company of New York established an agency in Wisconsin, and complied in all respects with these conditions; it filed the required agreement. In support of the validity of those conditions, the State relied upon the very language above quoted from Paul v. Virginia. But the court was careful to say that that language must be understood with reference to the facts in the case and to the question to be decided, which was stated to be simply "whether the State might require a foreign insurance company to take a license for the transaction of its business, giving security for the payment of its debts." Care was taken to further announce that the general language employed in Paul v. Virginia was not intended [126] to impair the language in Lafayette Ins. Co. v. French, 18 How. 407 [59 U. S. bk. 15, L. ed. 458], where the court, speaking by Mr. Justice Curtis, said: "A corporation created by Indiana can transact business in Ohio only with the consent, express or implied, of the latter State. This consent may be accompanied by such conditions as Ohio may think fit to impose, and these conditions must be deemed valid and effectual by other States and by this court; Provided, They are not repugnant to the Constitution and laws of the United States, or inconsistent with those rules of public law which secure the jurisdiction and authority of each State from encroachment of all others, or that principle of natural justice which forbids condemnation without opportunity for defense." Upon these grounds it was held, in Insurance Co. v. Morse, that the Wisconsin Statute, so far as it required insurance companies of other States to stipulate that they would not exercise the right to have suits against them removed to the national courts, was void, equally because it created an obstruction to the exercise of a privilege granted by the Constitution and laws of the United States, and tended to oust the courts of the Union of a jurisdiction conferred upon them. Much that was said in that case is pertinent to the present one. After observing that the courts would not enforce an agreement between a citizen of New York and a citizen of Wisconsin, that the former would, in no event, resort to the federal courts sitting in Wisconsin for the protection of his rights of property, or an agreement between the same parties, upon whatever consideration, that the citizen of New York would, in no case, when called into the courts, either of Wisconsin or of the federal courts sitting in that State, demand a jury to determine his rights of property, but would submit such rights to arbitration or to the decision of a single judge, the court said: "We see no difference in principle between the cases supposed and the case before us. Every citizen is entitled to resort to all the courts of the country, and to invoke the protection which all the laws of all those courts may afford." The court further said that the right of the insurance company to remove the suit was "denied to it by the state court on the ground that it had made the agreement referred to, and that the statute of the State authorized and re- [127] quired the making of the agreement. We are not able to distinguish this agreement and this requisition, on principle, from a similar one made in the case of an individual citizen of New York. A corporation has the same right to the protection of the laws as a natural citizen, and the same right to appeal to all the courts of the country. The rights of an individual are not superior, in this respect, to that of a corporation. The State of Wisconsin can regulate its own corporations and the affairs of its own citizens, in subordination, however, to the Constitution of the United States. The requirement of an agreement like this from their own corporations would be brutum fulmen, because they possess no such right under the Constitution of the United States. A foreign citizen, whether natural or corporate, in this respect possesses a right not pertaining to one of her own citizens. There must necessarily be a difference between the status of the two in this respect."

The only difference between Insurance Co. v. Morse and the present case is that in the former the New York corporation expressly agreed, in writing, that it would not exercise its constitutional privilege of removing suits against it into the courts of the Union, while the Pennsylvania Corporation received an official certificate of its right to transact business in New York with notice derived from the Act of 1865, that that State would, after 1878—the date of the Pennsylvania Statute—claim from it higher taxes than she imposed upon like corporations from the remaining States doing business in her limits by her consent. If the plaintiff in error, by merely maintaining its agencies in New York, is to be held to have impliedly agreed to submit to such increased taxation, is that anything more than an implied agreement that it would not assert a right secured to it by the Constitution of the United States? Can it be that a corporation is estopped to claim the benefit of the constitutional provision securing to it the equal protection of the laws simply because it voluntarily entered and remained in a State which has enacted a statute denying such protection to it and to like corporations from the same State? Is the right to that protection any less valuable or fundamental than [128] the right to remove a suit into the courts of the Union for trial? Will it be held that an express agreement by a corporation not to exercise the latter right is void and not enforcible, but that a local statute denying the equal protection of the laws to a corporation will be upheld, simply because that corporation came within the jurisdiction of the State which assumed to make such denial, and received from her officers, acting in conformity with her laws, a certificate of its right to transact business there? Will effect be given in one case to what (erroneously, I think) is called an implied agreement to surrender a constitutional right, while an express agreement in the other to surrender a constitutional right is held to be invalid?

Even if it were conceded that a State, which provides for the organization, under her own laws, of corporations for the transaction of every kind of business, could arbitrarily exclude from her limits similar corporations from the remaining States, and declare all contracts made within her jurisdiction with corporations from other States, to be void—concessions to be made only for the purposes of this case—it would not follow that she could subject corporations of other States, doing business within her limits under a license from the proper department, to higher taxes than she imposes upon other corporations of the same class from the remaining States. The plaintiff in error, having been in 1881 lawfully within New York by its agents, cannot be denied there the equal protection of the laws because the State which created it may have adopted a system of taxation different from that devised by New York. The case, in its legal aspects, is precisely the same as if Pennsylvania had never passed the Statute of 1873, but New York had, in that year, imposed upon fire insurance companies from Pennsylvania higher taxes than she imposed upon similar corporations from other States.

It would seem to be the result of the decision in this case, that New York may prescribe such varying rates of taxation upon insurance corporations of the remaining thirty-seven States, within her jurisdiction, as she chooses; the rate for corporations from each State differing from the rate established for corporations of the [129] same class from all other States, and the rate in respect to corporations of other States being higher than she imposes upon her own corporations of the same class. Such legislation would be a species of commercial warfare by one State against the others, and would be hostile to the whole spirit of the Constitution, particularly the Fourteenth Amendment, securing to all persons within the jurisdiction of the respective States the equal protection of the laws.

For the reasons which have been stated, I feel obliged to withhold my assent to the opinion and judgment of the court.

*HOME INSURANCE COMPANY OF NEW YORK, Plff. in Err., [129]

v.

PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 129-148.)

Corporations—state tax on franchise or business—percentum on capital stock on declared dividends of 6 per cent or more.

During the year 1881 the Home Insurance Company paid dividends at the rate of 10 per cent upon its entire capital stock of $3,000,000, of which sum $1,940,000 was, on the first day of November, 1881, invested in United States bonds. The Statute of New York imposed a tax, as a tax upon its corporate franchise or business, to be computed as follows: if the dividend amount to 6 or more per centum, then at the rate of one quarter mill upon the capital stock for each 1 per cent of dividend. The Company claimed that it was taxable by this Act only upon the part of its capital stock not invested in bonds of the United States. The State asserted that the tax was upon the basis of the Company's entire capital. The question was whether the tax in question was in fact levied upon the franchises of the Company, or upon the property of the Corporation invested in the securities of the United States. Upon an agreed case submitted by the parties to the Supreme Court of New York, the tax upon the basis of the Company's entire capital was sustained. This judgment was affirmed by the court of appeals of that State. This court being equally divided in opinion, the judgment of the court below stands affirmed.

[No. 14.]

Argued Oct. 25, 26, 1886. †Decided Nov. 15, 1886.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of New York. Affirmed.

The plaintiff in error (defendant below) is an Insurance Company of the State of New York. The action was brought to enforce a tax claimed to be due the State under chapter 542, section 3, of the laws of that State for 1880, as amended by chapter 361, section 3, of the laws of 1881, which, after describing the corporations subject to its provisions, continues as follows: "Shall be subject to and pay a tax upon its corporate franchise or business, into the treasury of the State annually, to be computed as follows: if the dividend or dividends made or declared by such corporation, joint-stock company or association during any year ending with the first day of November, amount to 6, or more than 6, per centum upon the par value of its capital stock, then the tax to be at the rate of one quarter mill upon the capital stock for each one per centum of dividends so made and declared." When the dividends are under 6 per cent another method of computation is provided, which it is not here essential to describe.

By section 5 of the same Act a further tax, eight tenths of 1 per centum upon the gross amount of their receipts for premiums, also a tax upon their corporate franchise and business, was required to be paid by fire and marine insurance companies annually into the state treasury. The Act further provides that such corporations shall be exempted from all further taxation for state purposes, except upon their real property. In case of the intentional neglect or refusal of the corporations bound, to report their condition or pay the taxes as therein required, it was provided that an action to recover the tax might be brought by the Attorney-General, and also their respective charter and corporate privileges should be forfeited and terminated.

*See S. C. in N. Y. Court of Appeals, 92 N. Y. 328.
†Petition for reargument granted Feb. 8, 1887.

An agreed case under the Code of Civil Procedure section 1279, stating the facts, was submitted by the parties to the Supreme Court of New York, which shows the total capital stock of the plaintiff in error to be $3,000,000, of which the sum of $1,940,000 was, on the first day of November, 1881, invested in United States bonds. The annual dividends declared by the Corporation for the year preceding that date was 10 per cent upon its entire capital stock. The tax imposed under these Acts, computed upon such dividend, aggregated $7,500. The question presented by the agreed case was whether the tax in question was in fact levied upon the franchises of the defendant, or upon the property of the Corporation invested in the securities of the General Government. Judgment was rendered in favor of the State. This the court of appeals affirmed, and a final judgment upon the remittitur was entered in the supreme court. To that judgment defendant sued out this writ of error, upon the ground that "there was drawn in question the validity of a statute of the State, and of an authority exercised thereunder, on the ground of their being repugnant to the Constitution or laws of the United States, and the decision was in favor of such their validity." It is here assigned as error that the judgment was erroneous in holding that the defendant was liable for a tax computed upon the basis of its entire capital, when it should have been held that the defendant was liable only for a tax upon that part of its capital not invested in United States bonds.

Messrs. Benjamin H. Bristow and David Willcox, for plaintiff in error:

No tax can be imposed upon that part of defendant's capital invested in United States bonds. A State cannot burden the operations of the national government by taxing its bonds without its consent.

M'Culloch v. Md. 4 Wheat. 316, 436 (17 U. S. bk. 4, L. ed. 579, 608); Weston v. Charleston, 2 Pet. 449 (27 U. S. bk. 7, L. ed. 481); Banks v. Mayor, 7 Wall. 16 (74 U. S. bk. 19, L. ed. 57); People v. Commissioners, 90 N. Y. 63.

A tax upon the capital of a corporation is a tax upon the property in which the capital is invested. No part of the capital invested in United States bonds therefore is taxable.

Bank of Commerce v. N. Y. 2 Black, 620 (67 U. S. bk. 17, L. ed. 451); Bank Tax Case, 2 Wall. 200 (17:793).

Whether or not this is a tax upon capital is to be determined, not by the form of the statute, but by its effect. When the statute was first enacted the Legislature merely imposed the tax. The following year it inserted the definition thereof; "as a tax upon corporate franchise or business." But if the tax is, in its nature and effect, a tax upon capital, it is none the less so because of this amendment declaring it to be a tax upon franchise or business. The question is whether or not the tax is such as the Legislature can impose. This obviously must be decided by the courts, irrespective of any declaration as to the character of the tax by the Legislature itself.

Brown v Md. 12 Wheat. 419 (25 U. S. bk. 6, L. ed. 678); Ward v. Md. 12 Wall. 418 (79 U. S. bk. 20, L. ed. 449); Welton v. Mo. 91 U. S. 275 (23:347); Webber v. Va. 103 U. S. 344 (26:565); Walling v. Mich. 116 U. S. 446 (29:691).

In Smith v. Turner, "Passenger Cases," 7 How. 283 (48 U. S. bk. 12, L. ed. 702), a state statute provided that the health officer of the Port of New York should collect from the masters of vessels a certain sum for each passenger. The moneys were to be used in supporting the Marine Hospital. Yet this was held to be a regulation of commerce.

In Henderson v. Mayor, 92 U. S. 259 (Bk. 23, L. ed. 543), a state statute provided that the owners of steamers bringing passengers from foreign ports should give a bond for each passenger against his becoming a public charge, or at their option make a cash payment. It was claimed that as the object of the provision was not taxation, but protection against pauperism, it was valid as within the police power. But the court, Miller, J., held otherwise.

To the same effect is Chy Lung v. Freeman, 92 U. S. 275 (Bk. 23, L. ed. 550); Inman Steamship Co. v. Tinker, 94 U. S. 238 (24:118); Cook v. Pa. 97 U. S. 566 (24:1015); Transportation Co. v. Parkersburg, 107 U. S. 691 (27:584); Matter of Jacobs, 98 N. Y. 98; Almy v. Cal. 24 How. 169 (65 U. S. bk. 16, L. ed. 644); Bank Tax Case, supra; Cummings v. Mo. 4 Wall. 277, 325 (71 U. S. bk. 18, L. ed. 356, 363); Crandall v. Nevada, 6 Wall. 35 (18:745); State Freight Tax, 15 Wall. 232 (21:146); Hannibal, etc. R. R. Co. v. Husen, 95 U. S. 465 (24:527); Telegraph Co. v. Texas, 105 U. S. 460 (26:1067); Moran v. New Orleans, 112 U. S. 69 (28:653); Kentucky R. R. Tax Cases, 115 U. S. 321, 337 (29:414, 418); Pullman S. C. Co. v. Nolan, 22 Fed. Rep. 276, 281; People v. Allen, 42 N. Y. 404, 413; Matter of Deansville Cem. Asso. 66 N. Y. 569.

Clearly therefore the declaration by the Legislature that this is a tax on franchise or business is not controlling. "The name of this imposition is immaterial; it is the substance we are to consider."

Inman Co. v. Tinker, supra.

The statute has not the effect of imposing a tax upon franchise or business. The modes in which the franchise of a corporation can be taxed are clearly defined. It may be done by imposing a fixed sum or "a graded contribution proportioned either to the value of the privileges granted, or to the extent of their exercise, or to the results of such exercise."

State Tax on R. Gross Receipts, 15 Wall. 284 (82 U. S. bk. 21, L. ed. 164); Delaware R. R. Tax, 18 Wall. 206, 231 (21:888, 896).

These provisions of the Act do not impose a fixed sum; nor do they impose a contribution proportioned to the extent of the exercise of the franchise—to the amount of business done. That species of tax is imposed by section 5 of the same Act. But these provisions do not refer to the amount of the business in any way. Is this then, "a contribution proportioned to the value or results of the privileges granted?" The franchise is "the right to use the tangible property in a special manner for the purposes of gain."

State R. R. Tax Cases, 92 U. S. 575 (Bk. 23, L. ed. 663).

It is itself a part of the property of the Corporation, but quite distinct and separate from its tangible property.

Gordon v. Appeal Tax Court, 3 How. 133, 150 (44 U. S. bk. 11, L. ed. 529, 537); Wilmington R. R. Co v. Reid, 13 Wall. 264, 265 (80 U. S. bk. 20, L. ed. 568).

It is a thing "capable of appraisal and ascertainable by evidence, and is frequently made the subject of taxation by the sovereign power. It is a right separate and distinct from the capital and moneyed assets of a corporation, and as to the value of which they furnish no evidence."

Conaughty v. Saratoga Co. Bank, 92 N. Y. 401. See to same effect Veazie Bank v. Fenno, 8 Wall. 533 (75 U. S. bk. 19, L. ed. 482); Monroe Co. Sav. Bank v. Rochester, 37 N. Y. 365; Porter v. Rockford etc. R. R. Co. 76 Ill. 561.

Its value is readily ascertained. It is determined by subtracting from the total actual value of the capital stock the total value of all items of property other than franchise. The remainder is, of course, the value of the franchise; the value of the right to use the tangible property in a special manner for the purpose of gain. This method has the approval of this court.

State R. R. Tax Cases, supra.

It is approved elsewhere as well.

Spring Valley Water Works v. Schottler, 62 Cal. 69; People v. Badlam, 57 Cal. 594; San Jose Company v. January, Id. 614.

But here neither the value of this part of the property of the Corporation, nor the results of its use, are in any way ascertained. It is claimed that this is a tax upon the franchise or its results, upon the ground that the tax is measured by the profits resulting from the use of the franchise—by the capacity of the Company to declare dividends. This is clearly erroneous. The tax is a percentage upon that part of defendant's income which it has distributed in dividends—its net income of profits—without discrimination as to the source thereof. This, of course, is a tax upon the property from which the income arises.

Bank of Ky. v. Commonwealth, 9 Bush, 46; Opinions of Justices, 53 N. H. 634; People v. Commissioners, 90 N. Y. 63; Weston v. Charleston, 2 Pet. 472 (27 U. S. bk. 7, L. ed. 489).

But the franchise is only one part of defendant's property. It is only in part the source of the dividends or net profits. They are the product of all the property. And as the tax includes property not taxable it cannot be sustained as a tax on the franchise.

Santa Clara Co. v. Southern Pac. R. R. Co. 118 U. S. 394 (ante, 118).

But the State claims that this court is already committed to the view that this is a tax upon franchise. And the court below placed its decision chiefly upon this ground.

Society for Savings v. Coite, 6 Wall. 594 (73 U. S. bk. 18, L. ed. 897); Provident Inst. v. Mass. 6 Wall. 611 (18:907).

These cases were decided upon two grounds: [137]
1. It was held that a tax consisting of a percentage upon the deposits made with a savings bank is a tax upon its franchise or business, and not a tax upon the property in which deposits may be invested after they are received. 2. It was held, further, that the decision of the state court, although criticised in one of the cases as "founded in unsubstantial distinctions," was binding upon this court. Whatever may be thought of the soundness of this, Louisville Co. v. Palmes, 109 U. S. 244 (Bk. 27, L. ed. 922), it has no present application. For it is not sought to sustain the present tax by any decision of the courts of the State construing the statute by which it is imposed.

The former ground, it has been claimed, con- [138]
trols the present case. Clearly this cannot be so. The question now involved is entirely different. There the tax was a percentage upon the deposits, "simply the sums received, wholly irrespective of the disposition made of the same."

Prov. Inst. v. Mass. supra, 627 (912).

The liability arose by reason of the receipt of the deposit. It was quite immaterial what became of the money after it was received, whether or how it was invested, or what profit was realized from it.

But in the present case the tax is not measured by the moneys received by defendant—by the volume of its business, the extent to which it has exercised its franchise. The tax is a percentage compounded of two factors, the capital and the dividends. That is to say, it is measured by defendant's permanent investment in the business, and the net profits realized from its entire property.

In the cases in 6 Wallace then, the tax was independent of the tangible property of the corporation or any profits therefrom. There the burden of the tax rested upon the franchise. But here, clearly, the ultimate burden rests upon the property of defendant invested in part in United States securities. That therefore is the subject of the tax.

State Freight Tax Cases, supra.

In case of corporations paying less than 6 per cent, the Act provides that there shall be a tax upon the "actual value" of their capital. It is settled that a tax in that form is a tax upon the property in which the capital is invested, and that corporations upon which it is imposed are entitled to deduct their United States bonds from the amount of the assessment.

Bank of Commerce v. New York, and Bank Tax Case, supra.

But if the tax upon corporations paying 6 per cent or more be a franchise tax, such corporations will not be entitled to the deduction of their United States bonds to which those paying less than 6 per cent are entitled. Still further, where a corporation has paid less than 6 per cent upon its common stock, it will be entitled to exemption, as to its common stock, for the amount of its capital invested in United States bonds, but not as to its preferred stock, although all its capital may be so invested.

If, then, this be a tax upon capital, the statute establishes a comprehensive system which bears equally upon all corporations which it affects. If it be a franchise tax, the statute is utterly incongruous and bears unequally both upon different corporations, and also upon different property of the same corporation. This the court below meets by saying that the Legislature has power to impose unequal taxes. This may be so. But the same court had already laid down the rule that in matters of taxation "it is a sacred duty to impose the burdens equally, and to enforce the maxim of law and ethics, that equality is equity."

People v. Commissioners, 76 N. Y. 64.

"Equality of taxation is a fundamental principle of our government which no legislation, in the absence of the most explicit provisions, will be presumed to have intended to violate."

People v. Supervisors, 20 Barb. 81; affd. in People v. Supervisors, 16 N. Y. 424.

That, doubtless, is the principle of construction to be followed here. The statute, indeed, admits of no construction other than that which will produce this result. The tax is a percentage upon the capital. The amount of this percentage varies, but the subject matter taxed remains the same.

Oswego Starch Factory v. Dolloway, 21 N.Y. 449; Commonwealth v. R. R. Co. 29 Pa. 370; Lehigh Co. v. Commonwealth, 55 Pa. 448.

The provisions of this Act have been judicially construed in accordance with these views. They were copied literally from a Statute of Pennsylvania, Laws of 1879, p. 114, section 4. and have long existed there in the same substantial form.

Laws of 1844, p. 498, § 33; 1859, p. 529; 1868, p. 109, § 4.

It is well settled there that they impose a tax upon the property of the corporation (Westchester Co. v. County of Chester, 30 Pa. 232; Lackawanna, I. & C. Co. v. Luzerne Co. 42 Pa. 424; Phœnix Iron Co. v. Commonwealth, 59 Pa. 104; Commonwealth v. Pittsburg, etc. R. Co. 74 Pa. 83; Catawissa R. R. Co.'s Appeal, 78 Pa. 59; Coatesville Gas Co. v. County of Chester, 97 Pa. 476), and that "the dividend of profit earned by the stock is but a means of ascertaining its value."

Lehigh Co. v. Commonwealth, supra; Commonwealth v. Standard Oil Co. 101 Pa. 119.

The Pennsylvania Statute too, was before this court in Gloucester Ferry Co. v. Pa. 114 U. S. 196 (Bk. 29, L. ed 158), and was then regarded as impoaing "a tax upon the capital" of corporations affected.

If, however, defendant be taxable upon the basis of its entire capital, including the bonds, the tax is repugnant to the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States. The defendant is a person within the meaning of this provision.

County of Santa Clara v. Southern Pac. R. R. Co. supra; County of San Mateo v. Southern Pac. R. Co. 18 Fed. Rep. 722.

Inequality of taxation is a denial of equal protection.

Strauder v. West Va. 100 U. S. 303 (Bk. 25, L. ed. 664); County of San Mateo v. Southern Pac. R. Co. supra; Exchange Bank of Columbus v. Hines, 3 Ohio St. 1; People v. Weaver, 100 U. S. 539 (25: 705); Supervisors v. Stanley, 105 U. S. 305 (26: 1044); Evansville Bank v. Britton, 105 U. S. 322 (26: 1053); County of Santa Clara v. Southern Pac. R. R. Co. supra.

The present application of these principles is manifest. The tax upon corporations declaring less than 6 per cent is a tax upon their property, and they are entitled to deduct from the assessment the amount of their United States bonds.

Bank Tax Case, supra.

Unless, then, those declaring over 6 per cent are allowed the same deduction—are relieved from taxation to the extent of their United States bonds—the tax is unequal, and therefore unconstitutional.

No doubt the Legislature may divide corporations into as many classes as the different pursuits followed by them may require.

Railroad Tax Cases, supra.

But there can be no classification by arbitrary rules among those engaged in the same business in the same locality.

San Mateo Co. v. Southern Pac. R. Co. supra; Gilman v. Sheboygan, 2 Black, 510 (67 U. S. bk. 17, L. ed. 305); Albany City Nat. Bank v. Maher, 9 Fed. Rep. 884; County of Santa Clara v. Southern Pac. R. Co. 18 Fed. Rep. 385; Dundee etc. Co. v. School Dist. 19 Fed. Rep. 359; Oliver v. Washington Mills, 11 Allen, 283: Stuart v. Palmer, 74 N. Y. 183; State v. Township, 36 N. J. L. 66; City v. McQuillan, 9 Dana 513; Howell v. Bristol, 8 Bush, 493; Atty-Gen. v. Winnebago etc. Plank R. Co. 11 Wis. 35; New Orleans v. Home Ins. Co. 23 La. Ann. 449; Re Ah Fong, 3 Sawy. 144; Parrott's Case, 6 Sawy. 349; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. R. R. Commission, 19 Fed. Rep. 679.

Upon principle the rule in regard to uniformity of taxation upon franchises must be the same as in regard to taxes upon any other property. There can be no more reason why arbitrary distinction should be made between persons owning that species of property, than between the owners of property of any other kind. And it is so held.

County of San Mateo v. Southern Pac. R. Co. supra; Portland Bank v. Apthorp, 12 Mass. 252; Commonwealth v. People's Sav. Bank, 5 Allen, 428; Oliver v. Washington Mills, 11 Allen, 268; Parish of Orleans v. Cochran, 20 La. Ann. 373; State v. Merchants Ins. Co. 12 La. Ann. 802; East St. Louis v. Wehrung, 46 Ill. 392.

If, then, the tax upon this dividend be a tax upon the franchise, the statute is unconstitutional; for it subjects defendant to assessment and taxation upon its franchises at a higher rate than that imposed upon others in precisely the same situation. It therefore denies to defendant equal protection of the laws.

Mr. Denis O'Brien, Atty-Gen. of New York, for defendants in error:

The decision of the court of appeals on the construction of the Constitution and Statutes of New York will be followed by this court.

Township of Elmwood v. Marcy, 92 U. S. 289 (Bk. 23, L. ed. 710); Fairfield v. Gallatin Co. 100 U. S. 47 (25 : 544).

Questions not decided in the state court, because not raised and presented by the complaining party, will not be re-examined in this court upon a writ of error.

Hamilton Co. v. Mass, 6 Wall. 632 (73 U. S. bk. 18, L. ed. 904); Railway Co. v. Guthard, 114 U. S. 133 (29 : 118).

The tax imposed upon the plaintiff in error was a tax upon its franchises, and not upon its property or capital stock.

Prior to the passage of this Act corporations were assessed and taxed upon their capital stock, under the provisions of the Revised Statutes of the State of New York, by the local officials for both local and state purposes.

A comparison of those provisions (2 N. Y. R. S. 7th ed. 1036 et seq.) with those of the Act in question, shows radical differences in the method of assessment and collection of the taxes imposed upon these bodies, and clearly discloses the intention of the Legislature, in the enactment of the Statutes of 1880 and 1881, to formulate a new and distinct scheme of taxation for all the corporate, associate or joint-stock bodies included within the terms of its provisions.

The law distinctly states that the plaintiff in error shall pay a tax, as a tax upon its corporate franchises or business, into the treasury of the State annually, and then provides the method of computation.

Franchises are special privileges conferred by government upon individuals; no franchise can be held which is not derived from a law of the State.

Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 13 Pet. 595 (38 U. S. bk. 10, L. ed. 811).

The State may impose taxes upon the corporation as an entity existing under its laws, as well as upon the capital stock of the corporation, or its separate corporate property; and the manner in which its value shall be assessed, and the rate of taxation, however arbitrary or capricious, are mere matters of legislative discretion.

Delaware R. R. Tax Case, 18 Wall. 206 (85 U. S. bk. 21, L. ed. 888).

Nothing can be more certain in legal decision than that the privileges and franchises of a private corporation may be taxed by a State for the support of a state government. Authority to that effect resides in the State independent of the Federal Government.

Society for Savings v. Coite, 6 Wall. 594 (73 U.S. bk. 18, L. ed. 897). See also State R. R. Tax Cases, 92 U. S. 575 (23 : 663).

This tax, therefore, being a tax upon the franchise of the plaintiff, it matters not how his capital stock or property may be invested, whether in United States securities or otherwise.

People v Commissioners, 4 Wall. 244 (71 U S. bk. 18, L. ed. 344); Nat. Bank v. Commonwealth, 9 Wall. 353 (19 : 701); Van Allen v. Assessors; 3 Wall. 573 (18 : 229); Society for Savings v. Coite, supra; Provident Inst. v. Mass. 6 Wall. 612 (18 : 907); Hamilton Co. v. Mass, supra.

The Bank Tax Case of New York, expressly distinguishes between a property and a franchise tax.

Bank Tax Case, 2 Wall. 209 (69 U S. bk. 17, L. ed. 795).

The tax in question being upon the franchises of the plaintiff in error, the first section of the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution has no application. There is nothing in this case showing an unequal exaction; in proportion to their earning capacity, and the value of their franchises, they are taxed. Even were it not so a franchise tax is not within the rule of uniformity.

Ducat v. Chicago, 10 Wall. 410 (77 U. S. bk. 19, L. ed. 972).

It is respectfully urged that this contention is based almost entirely upon a recent decision rendered in the case of the County of San Mateo v. Southern Pacific R. R. Co. 13 Fed. Rep. 722.

It is respectfully insisted that the broad scope given to the first section of the Fourteenth Amendment by this decision is not sustainable on principle or reason; that it was intended simply and solely to prevent discrimination against the negroes.

Slaughter House Cases, 16 Wall. 36, 81 (83 U. S. bk. 21, L. ed. 394, 410).

The Statutes of New York simply aggregate certain corporations into one class of taxpayers, and impose upon them a tax which is uniform as to the whole class. It is sufficient that the tax imposed be uniform and equal, as to the class upon which it operates.

State R. R. Tax Cases, supra; Kentucky R. R. Tax Cases, 115 U. S. 322 (Bk. 29, L. ed. 414).

But the San Mateo Case is a direct authority for the imposition of the tax in this case. There the tax was one on property, here one on franchises. "Taxation on business in the form of licenses may vary according to the calling or occupation licensed, and the extent of business transacted."

San Mateo County Case and Provident Inst. v. Mass supra.

The first section of the Fourteenth Amendment having no application, the Legislature, in the exercise of a taxing power, is supreme, unless limited by the Constitution of the State. Our court of last resort has decided the statutes in question to be constitutional and valid.

People v. Home Ins. Co. 92 N. Y. 328.

Its decision is final and there is no question before this court.

CUNARD STEAMSHIP COMPANY, Limited, Plff. in Err., [245]

v.

PATRICK CAREY.

Steamship Co —injury to employee—negligence of fellow-servant—contributory negligence.

While a longshoreman, employed for two years previous by a steamship company, was assisting in shifting coal from the hold of the steamship Batavia to the steerage deck above, by hooking a loaded tub to the hoisting apparatus and unhooking the empty bucket when it descended, two falls being used on the hoisting apparatus, each operating a tub, one of which ascended, while the other descended, only one being in his charge, he was injured by the loaded tub falling upon him, caused by the drawing of a splice from the untwisting of the rope. He brought suit against the steamship company to recover damages, alleging that the rope forming a part of the hoisting apparatus, by reason of its defectiveness broke, whereby the coal tub attached thereto fell upon the plaintiff without any fault on his part. There was a finding for the plaintiff for $15,000 and judgment was rendered thereon. Error was assigned by the defendant, on the grounds that the court refused to direct a verdict for the defendant, because (1) the evidence proved that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence; and because (2) the evidence failed to establish negligence on the part of the defendant; and because (3) the injury was occasioned through the negligence of a fellow servant, for which defendant was not liable; and because (4) the court erred in its charge to the jury, as well as in refusing to charge as requested by the defendant's counsel. This court being equally divided, the judgment of the court below stands affirmed.

[No. 29.]

Argued Nov. 8, 1886. Decided Nov. 16, 1886.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York. Affirmed.

This was an action by an employee to recover for personal injuries received while in the service of the plaintiff in error.

The action was commenced in the Superior Court of the City of New York, and was removed to the United States Circuit Court on petition of the defendant, a foreign corporation.

Patrick Carey had been in the employ of the Steamship Company for two years as longshoreman, and on the evening of November 8, 1880, was sent, with others, into the hold of the steamer Batavia to assist in shifting coal from that place to the steerage deck above. The particular work assigned to him was that of hooking full tubs to the hoisting apparatus, and of unhooking empty tubs when they descended; and his duty required him to be stationed at the edge of the hatch, on the in-shore side of the ship, where the coal was which the men were engaged in shifting.

Two falls were in use on the hoisting apparatus, each operating a tub, one of which ascended while the other descended, and a man named Henretty was stationed in the hold, on the side of the hatch opposite to Carey, whose duties were similar to those of Carey. Each attended to the tub ascending and descending on his side of the hatch.

Each fall was rigged to a block on a gaff or boom over the hatch, and ran from thence through a block or davit at the side of the ship, from thence through a block on the end of a scow alongside the ship, and from thence to a drum inside the house on the scow The drums were turned by an engine on the scow, and the drum which operated the particular fall in question was in charge of one O'Brien. The other drum was in charge of one Higgins, and the engine on the scow was in charge of one Redmond.

The superintendent of the dock, having general authority over all matters connected therewith, was named Storey. Under him was a foreman stevedore, Craven, who had charge of loading and unloading the ships, who hired and discharged all the longshoremen, set them to work, and exercised supervision over all things connected with that work. Under Craven were bosses of different gangs, and among them was Christopher Gerraghty, the boss of the coal gang, who had charge of the men, to see that they did their duty. The care and repair of the apparatus used by the men were in charge of the storekeeper, David Smith. The placing of the apparatus in position for work was in charge of the rigger, Graham.

On the evening in question, Craven directed Graham to rig the falls for the purpose of hoisting out the coal. He went to the storehouse and selected a fall, i. e., a rope, from among others; told Short, another rigger, to place it in position and superintend that job. It was a spliced rope, such as are commonly used for that purpose.

Craven sent ten men into the hold to get out the coal, and stationed one on each side of the hatch in the hold, and one on each side of the hatch on the steerage deck. The men commenced work between six and seven o'clock and worked until about half past ten. At that time Carey had hooked his tub loaded with coal to the fall, and it had ascended nearly to the steerage deck. He then stepped out from under the deck at the edge of the hatch, and across the hatch, directly under the loaded tub, in order to reach the empty tub descending on the opposite side of the hatch. While in this position the full tub which he had sent up fell upon him.

Craven had remained upon the deck attending to his duties until about nine o'clock, when he went home, leaving Gerraghty in charge of the men. Down to the time Craven left no notice had been given to him by anyone, as to the condition of any of the apparatus.

Some time after eight o'clock, O'Brien, before whom a considerable portion of the rope was constantly in sight, first noticed that something was the matter with the rope which he was operating, It was his duty to watch the rope, to work it carefully, to take care of it if the turns or twists came out of it; viz., to retwist it, and to report its condition if unfit for work for any reason. He did nothing—neither stopped his drum, attended to the rope himself, nor reported its condition—until Gerraghty, who had been notified by someone concerning the rope, came down upon the scow some time afterwards. O Brien then spoke to Gerraghty concerning the rope. Gerraghty took the rope off the drum, and put back the turns or twists which had come out, dipped the rope in the water and put it back on the drum, and when he left the scow directed O'Brien to look out for the rope and, if the turns came out again, to take it off and put them in. O'Brien continued to operate the rope, and saw that it was getting worse, but did nothing himself to correct its condition; he neither stopped the drum nor attended to the rope, nor gave notice. O'Brien says that he spoke to Gerraghty a second time about the condition of the rope, but does not say what was done or said by Gerraghty at that time. He does not remember whether Gerraghty's action with regard to the rope was on the first or second occasion of his speaking to him, except that he does say that Gerraghty directed him to put the turns in the rope if they came out again. This, however, O'Brien failed to do. He continued to hoist with the rope, and some time afterwards the splice drew, by reason of the rope untwisting, and the disaster followed.

It is customary to use spliced ropes for the purpose of hoisting, and the splice in and of itself, constitutes no defect, and in no manner weakens the rope for use. It is also usual for the turns or twists to come out of the rope while being operated single, by reason of the motion of the drum or the revolving of the articles hoisted, which necessitates watchfulness and care on the part of those operating the falls, to see that the turns do not come out to the detriment of the rope. The rope in question was good and sufficient for the purpose, when the work commenced that evening.

The plaintiff had been directed not to go under the open hatch when a load was ascending, and had also been repeatedly warned against doing the same thing. The tub fell by reason of the drawing of the splice, caused by the untwisting of the rope.

The court refused to direct a verdict for the defendant, but left the jury to decide upon uncontradicted testimony: first, whether or not the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence; and second, whether or not Gerraghty was a fellow workman with the plaintiff, or the representative of the defendant, for whose negligence the defendant would be liable. To this ruling the defendant excepted.

The court further charged the jury that the rope was a spliced rope; that the injury occurred by the untwisting and drawing apart of the portion that was spliced; that the important duty of the hour was to see that the rope did not untwist; and that if the rope was in good condition when it went upon the fall, and thereafter became in bad condition, which Gerraghty knew, and should have attended to himself and did not, and the accident happened in consequence, the defendant was liable. The defendant excepted.

Messrs. Frank D. Sturges, R. D. Benedict and Owen & Gray, for plaintiff in error:

The law is well settled that if a party has by his own acts contributed to his injury he cannot recover. Prudence is imposed as a continual duty.

That the plaintiff was guilty of a breach of legal duty which contributed to his injury should have been decided as a matter of law by the court.

This obligation does not require the master to keep the apparatus in a safe condition at every moment of work, so far as such safety depends upon the due performance of that work by the servants, and their fellows:

Armour v. Hahn, 111 U. S. 313 (Bk. 28, L. ed. 440.

Laber v. Cooper, 7 Wall. 565 (74 U. S. bk. 19, L. ed. 151).

The court refused an instruction discriminating between a duty devolving upon the master, for breach of which he would be liable, and one devolving upon a servant, for breach of which the master would not be liable. No proof having been made showing a liability of the master, the court should have directed a verdict for defendant.

A question should not be submitted to the jury upon a mere scintilla of evidence.

Improvement Co. v. Munson, 14 Wall. 442 (81 U. S. bk. 20, L. ed. 867).

Messrs. Hermon H. Shook and William C. Trull, for defendant in error:

This court has held contributory negligence to be a question of fact for the jury.

Nor can it be claimed that the doctrine of constructive negligence should be applied.

Hough v. R. R. Co. supra.

Here was evidence of an unsafe rope being used by the defendant, evidence that it broke, evidence that the plaintiff was injured thereby. This established at least presumptively the negligence of the defendant.

Stokes v. Saltonstall, 13 Pet. 181 (38 U. S. bk. 10, L. ed. 115); Trans. Co. v. Downer, 11 Wall. 180 (78 U. S. bk. 20, L. ed. 160).

The defendant's duty was discharged when, but only when, its agents, whose duty it was to supply the instrumentalities, had exercised due care, as well in their purchase originally, as in keeping and maintaining them in such condition as to be reasonably and adequately safe for use by employees.

Hough v. R. Co supra; Wabash R. Co. v McDaniels, 107 U. S. 454 (Bk. 27, L. ed. 605).

Here was actual notice to the agent, to whom the defendant had delegated its duty of maintaining secure apparatus for the use of the servants.

Hough v. R. Co. supra; Pantzar v. Mining Co. 99 N. Y. 368; Corcoran v. Holbrook, 59 N. Y. 517.

Where the master furnishes defective or inadequate machinery for use in the prosecution of his business, he is not excused by the negligence of a servant in using the machinery, from liability to a co-servant, which could not have happened had the machinery been suitable for the use to which it was applied.

On the question of contributory negligence the defendant's witnesses corroborated the plaintiff's. They all agreed that it was a necessary duty for Carey to step out into the hatch in order to grasp a descending tub. His act, therefore, did not relieve the Company.

It is within the province of a court in the exercise of its discretion to sum up the facts in the case to the jury, and submit them with the inferences of law deducible therefrom to the free judgment of the jury, exercising care to separate the law from the facts.

Ins. Co. v. Trefz, 104 U. S. 197 (Bk. 26, L. ed. 708); Tracy v. Swartwout, 10 Pet. 80 (35 U. S. bk. 9, L. ed. 354); Games v. Stiles, 14 Pet. 322 (10:476).

The court should not instruct the jury that certain evidence in the case does not warrant them in finding negligence. The question should be left to the jury upon the whole evidence.

Smith v. Condry, 1 How. 28 (42 U. S. bk. 11, L ed. 35).

Instructions to the jury should not be given in such form as to supersede an inquiry by them into the facts of the case.

Canal Co. v. Knapp, 9 Pet. 541 (34 U S. bk. 9, L. ed. 222).

The main charge of the judge covered the entire case and properly submitted it to the jury. Further instructions were, therefore, properly refused.

R. R. Co. v. Horst, 93 U. S. 291 (Bk. 23, L. ed. 898).

The judge was not bound to give instructions in the terms required by the defendant below. It was sufficient if so much thereof was given as was applicable to the evidence before the jury, and the merits of the case as presented by the parties.

Clymer v. Dawkins, 3 How. 674 (44 U. S. bk. 11, L. ed. 778); Kelly v. Jackson, 6 Pet. 622 (Bk. 8. 523); R. Co. v. McCarthy, 96 U. S. 258 (24:693).

Even if, in twenty-three exceptions, there should be discovered a few technical errors, it plainly appears on the face of the record that the judgment below was right, and this court has repeatedly refused to reverse judgments on errors committed on trials, which worked no injury to plaintiffs in error, and which could not have affected the verdict.

Railway Co. v. Ross, Brobst v. Brock, M. & M. R. R. Co. v. Jurey, and Bank v. Bank, supra.

A suit in admiralty cannot be maintained in the courts of the United States to recover damages for the death of a human being on the high seas, or waters navigable from the sea, caused by negligence, in the absence of an Act of Congress, or a statute of a State, giving a right of action therefor.

2. If a suit in rem can be maintained in admiralty against an offending vessel for the recovery of such damages when an action at law has been given therefor in the State where the wrong was done, or where the vessel belonged (as to which the court expresses no opinion), the action must be brought within the time provided by the statute which gives the right of action.

[No. 9.]

Argued April 7, 1886. Decided Nov. 15, 1886.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania. Reversed.

The case is stated by the court.

Mr. Thomas Hart, Jr., for appellants.

Mr. Henry Flanders, for appellees.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit in rem begun in the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania, on the 25th of February, 1882, against the steamer Harrisburg, by the widow and child of Silas E. Rickards, deceased, to recover damages for his death caused by the negligence of the steamer in a collision with the schooner Marietta Tilton, on the 16th of May, 1877, about one hundred yards from the Cross Rip Light Ship, in a sound of the sea embraced between the coast of Massachusetts and the islands of Martha's Vineyard and Nantucket, parts of the State of Massachusetts. The steamer was engaged at the time of the collision in the coasting trade, and belonged to the Port of Philadelphia, where she was duly enrolled according to the laws of the United States. The [200] deceased was first officer of the schooner, and a resident of Delaware, where his widow and child also resided when the suit was begun.

The Statutes of Pennsylvania in force at the time of the collision provided that "Whenever death shall be occasioned by unlawful violence or negligence, and no suit for damages be brought by the party injured, during his or her life," "the husband, widow, children or parents of the deceased, and no other relative," "may maintain an action for and recover damages for the death thus occasioned." "The action shall be brought within one year after the death, and not thereafter." Brightly, Purd. Dig. 11th ed. 1267, §§ 3, 4, 5; Act of April 15, 1851, § 18; Act of April 6, 1855, §§ 1, 2.

By a Statute of Massachusetts relating to railroad corporations, it was provided that "If, by reason of the negligence or carelessness of a corporation, or of the unfitness or gross negligence of its servants or agents while engaged in its business, the life of any person, being in the exercise of due diligence, * * * is lost, the corporation shall be punished by a fine not exceeding five thousand nor less than five hundred dollars, to be recovered by indictment and paid to the executor or administrator for the use of the widow and children." * * * "Indictments against corporations for loss of life shall be prosecuted within one year from the injury causing the death." Gen. Stat. Mass. 1860, chap. 63, §§ 97–99; Stat. 1874, chap. 372, § 163.

No innocent parties had acquired rights to or in the steamer between the date of the collision and the bringing of the suit.

Upon this state of facts the circuit court gave judgment against the steamer in the sum of $5,100, for the following reasons:

"1. In the admiralty courts of the United States the death of a human being upon the high seas or waters navigable from the sea, caused by negligence, may be complained of as an injury, and the wrong redressed under the general maritime law.

"2. The right of the libelants does not depend upon the statute law of either the States of Massachusetts or Pennsylvania, and the limitation of one year in the statutes of those States [201] does not bar this proceeding.

"3. Although an action in the state courts of either Massachusetts or Pennsylvania would be barred by the limitation expressed in the statutes of those States, the admiralty is not bound thereby, and in this case will not follow the period of limitation therein provided and prescribed. The drowning complained of was caused by the improper navigation, negligence and fault of the said steamer, producing the collision aforesaid, and the libelants are entitled to recover.

"4. As there are no innocent rights to be affected by the present proceedings, and no inconvenience will result to the respondents from the delay attending it, the action, if not governed by the statutes aforesaid, is not barred by the libelants' laches." The Harrisburg, 15 Fed. Rep. 610.

From that decree this appeal was taken, and the question to be decided presents itself in three aspects, which may be stated as follows:

1. Can a suit in admiralty be maintained in the courts of the United States to recover damages for the death of a human being on the high seas, or waters navigable from the sea, caused by negligence, in the absence of an Act of Congress, or a statute of a State, giving a right of action therefor?

2. If not, can a suit in rem be maintained in admiralty against an offending vessel for the recovery of such damages when an action at law has been given therefor by statute in the State where the wrong was done, or where the vessel belonged?

3. If it can, will the admiralty courts permit such a recovery in a suit begun nearly five years after the death, when the statute which gives the right of action provides that the suit shall be brought within one year?

It was held by this court, on full consideration, in Ins. Co. v. Brame, 95 U. S. 756 [Bk. 24, L. ed. 582], "that by the common law no civil action lies for an injury which results in death." See also Dennick v. R. R. Co. 103 U. S. 11, 21 [Bk. 26, L. ed. 439, 442]. Such also is the judgment of the English courts, where an action of the kind could not be maintained until Lord Campbell's Act, 9 and 10 Vic. chap. 93. It was so recited in that Act, and so said by Lord Blackburn in The Vera Cruz, 10 App. Cas. 59, decided by the House of Lords in 1884. Many of the cases bearing on this question are cited in the opinion in Ins. Co. v. Brame. Others will be found referred to in an elaborate note to Carey v. Berkshire R. R. Co. 48 Am. Dec. 633. The only American cases in the common-law courts against the rule to which our attention has been called are Cross v. Guthery, 2 Root, 90; Ford v. Monroe, 20 Wend. 210; James v. [205] Christy, 18 Mo. 162; and Sullivan v. Union Pac. R. R. Co. 3 Dill. 334. Cross v. Guthery, a Connecticut case, was decided in 1794, and cannot be reconciled with Goodsell v. Hartford etc. R. R. Co. 33 Conn. 55, where it is said: "It is a singular fact that by the common law the greatest injury which one man can inflict on another, the taking of his life, is without a private remedy." Ford v. Monroe, a New York case, was substantially overruled by the Court of Appeals of that State in Green v. Hudson R. R. R. Co. 2 Keyes, 294; and Sullivan v. Union Pac. R. R. Co. decided in 1874 by the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Nebraska, is directly in conflict with Insurance Co. v. Brame, decided here in 1878.

We know of no English case in which it has been authoritatively decided that the rule in admiralty differs at all in this particular from that at common law. Indeed, in The Vera Cruz, supra, it was decided that even since Lord Campbell's Act a suit in rem could not be maintained for such a wrong. Opinions were delivered in that case by the Lord Chancellor (Selborne), Lord Blackburn and Lord Watson. In each of these opinions it was assumed that no such action would lie without the statute, and the only question discussed was whether the statute had changed the rule.

In view, then, of the fact that in England (the source of our system of law, and from a very early period one of the principal maritime nations of the world) no suit in admiralty can be maintained for the redress of such a wrong, we proceed to inquire whether, under the general maritime law as administered in the courts of the United States, a contrary rule has been or ought to be established.

In Plummer v. Webb, 1 Ware, 75, decided in 1825, Judge Ware held, in the District Court of the United States for the District of Maine, in an admiralty suit in personam, that "the ancient doctrine of the common law, founded on the principles of the feudal system, that a private wrong is merged in a felony, is not applicable to the civil polity of this country, and has not been adopted in this State" (Maine), and that "a libel may be maintained by a father, in the admiralty, for consequential damages re- [206] sulting from an assault and battery of his minor child," "after the death of the child, though the death was occasioned by the severity of the battery;" but the suit was dismissed, because upon the evidence it did not appear that the father had in fact been damaged. The case was afterwards before Mr. Justice Story on appeal, and is reported in 4 Mas. 380, but the question now involved was not considered, as the court found that the cause of action set forth in the libel and proved was not maritime in its nature.

We find no other reported case in which this subject was at all discussed until Cutting v. Seabury, 1 Sprague, 522, decided by Judge Sprague in the Massachusetts District in 1860. In that case, which was in personam, the judge said that "The weight of authority in the common-law courts seems to be against the action, but natural equity and the general principles of law are in favor of it," and that he could not consider it "as settled that no action can be maintained for the death of a human being." The libel was dismissed, however, because on the facts it appeared that no cause of action existed even if in a proper case a recovery could be had. The same eminent judge had, however, held as early as 1849, in Crapo v. Allen, 1 Sprague, 185, that rights of action in admiralty for mere personal torts did not survive the death of the person injured.

Next followed the case of The Sea Gull, Chase's Dec. 145, decided by Chief Justice Chase in the Maryland District in 1867. That was a suit in rem by a husband to recover damages for the death of his wife caused by the negligence of the steamer in a collision in the Chesapeake Bay, and a recovery was had, the chief justice remarking that "There are cases, indeed, in which it has been held that in a suit at law no redress can be had by the surviving representative for injuries occasioned by the death of one through the wrong of another; but these are all common-law cases, and the common law has its peculiar rules in relation to this subject, traceable to the feudal system and its forfeitures," and "it better becomes the humane and liberal character of proceedings in admiralty to give than to withhold the remedy, when not 207] required to withhold it by established and inflexible rules." In his opinion he refers to the leading English case of Baker v. Bolton, 1 Camp. 493, where the common-law rule was recognized and followed by Lord Ellenborough in 1808, and to Carey v. Berkshire R. R. Co. 1 Cush. 475, to the same effect, decided by the Supreme Court of Massachusetts in 1848, and then says that "In other States the English precedent has not been followed." For this he cites as authority Ford v. Monroe, supra, decided in 1838, but which, as we have seen, had been overruled by Green v. Hudson R. R. R. Co. in 1866, only a short time before the opinion of the chief justice was delivered, and James v. Christy, supra, decided by the Supreme Court of Missouri in 1853. The case of The Highland Light, Chase's Dec. 150, was before Chief Justice Chase in Maryland about the same time with The Sea Gull, and while adhering to his ruling in that case, and remarking that "the admiralty may be styled, not improperly, that human providence that watches over the rights and interests of those 'who go down to the sea in ships and do their business on the great waters,'" he referred to a Maryland Statute giving a right of action in such cases, and then dismissed the libel because on the facts no liability was established against the vessel as an offending thing.

Afterwards, in 1873, Mr. Justice Blatchford, then the Judge of the District Court for the Southern District of New York, sustained a libel by an administrator of an infant child who took passage on the steamer City of Brussels with his mother at Liverpool, to be carried to New York, and while on the voyage was poisoned by the carelessness of the officers of the vessel and died on board. The City of Brussels, 6 Ben. 370. The decision was placed on the ground of a breach of the contract of carriage.

The next case in which this jurisdiction was considered is that of The Towanda, 34 Legal Int. (Phil.) 394; S. C. 5 Cent. L. J. 418, decided by Judge McKennan in the Circuit Court for the [208] Eastern District of Pennsylvania in 1877, and before the judgment of this court in Ins. Co. v. Brame, supra. In that case the ruling of Chief Justice Chase in The Sea Gull was approved, and the same authorities were cited with the addition of Sullivan v. Union Pac. R. R. Co. supra.

In The Chas. Morgan, 2 Flip. 274, before Judge Swing, in the Southern District of Ohio, on the 24th of October, 1878, the subject was again considered. That was a suit in rem, by the wife of a passenger on a vessel, to recover damages for the death of her husband; and in deciding upon the sufficiency of a plea to the jurisdiction, the judge, after quoting a remark of Mr. Justice Clifford in Steamboat Co. v. Chase, 16 Wall. 532 [83 U. S. bk. 21, L. ed. 372], that "Difficulties, it must be conceded, will attend the solution of this question, but it is not necessary to decide it in this case," retained the libel because, "as the case at bar will probably go to the Supreme Court of the United States, it will be better for all parties that the appeal should be taken after a trial upon its merits." Our decision in Ins. Co. v. Brame was announced on the 21st of January, 1878, but was evidently not brought to the attention of the judge, because, while citing quite a number of cases to show that the weight of authority was in favor of the English rule, he makes no reference to it. Indeed, it is probable that the volume of the reports in which it appears had not been generally distributed when his opinion was filed.

It thus appears that prior to the decision in Ins. Co. v. Brame the admiralty judges in the United States did not rely for their jurisdiction on any rule of the maritime law different from that of the common law, but on their opinion that the rule of the English common law was not founded in reason, and had not become firmly established in the jurisprudence of this country. Since that decision the question has been several times before the circuit and district courts for consideration. In The David Reeves, 5 Hughes, 89, Judge Morris, of the Maryland District, considering himself bound by the authority of The Sea Gull, which arose in his district, and had been decided by the chief justice in the circuit court, maintained jurisdiction of a suit in rem by a mother for the death of her son in a collision that occurred in the Chesapeake Bay. He conceded, however, that this was contrary to the common law and to [209] the admiralty decisions in England; but, as the question had never been passed on in this court, he yielded to the authority of the circuit court decision in his own district.

The case of Holmes v. Oregon & Cal. R. R. Co. 6 Sawy. 262; S. C. 5 Fed. Rep. 75, was decided by Judge Deady, in the Oregon District, on the 28th of February, 1880; and he held that a suit in personam could be prosecuted in admiralty against the owner of a ferry boat engaged in carrying passengers across the Willamette River, between East Portland and Portland, for the death of a passenger caused by the negligence of the owner. He conceded that no such action would lie at common law, but, as in his opinion the civil law was different, he would not admit that in admiralty, "which is not governed by the rules of the common law," the suit could not be maintained. His decision was, however, actually put on the Oregon Statute, which gave an action at law for damages in such a case, and the death occurred within the jurisdiction of the State. Judge Sawyer had previously decided, in Armstrong v. Beadle, 5 Sawy. 484, in the Circuit Court for the District of California, that an action at law under a similar Statute of California would not lie for a death which occurred on the high seas and outside of the territorial limits of the State. In The Clatsop Chief, 7 Sawy. 274, S. C. 8 Fed. Rep. 163, Judge Deady sustained an action in rem against an offending vessel for a death caused by negligence in the Columbia River and within the State of Oregon.

In Re Long Island etc. Trans. Co. 5 Fed. Rep. 599, which was a suit for the benefit of the Act of Congress limiting the liability of the owners of vessels, Judge Choate, of the Southern District of New York, decided that in New York, where there is a statute giving a right of action in cases of death caused by negligence, claims for damages of that character might be included among the liabilities of the owner of the offending vessel. In that case the injury which caused the death occurred within the limits of the State. In the opinion it is said (p. 608): "It has been seriously doubted whether the rule of the common law, that a cause of action for an injury to the person dies [210] with the person, is also the rule of the maritime law. There is some authority for the proposition that it is not, and that in admiralty a suit for damage in such a case survives. The Sea Gull, 2 L. T. R. 15; S. C. Chase's Dec. 145; Cutting v. Seabury, 1 Sprague, 522; The Guldfax, 19 L. T. R. 748; S. C. L. R. 2 Adm. & Eccl. 325; The Epsilon, 6 Ben. 381. But, however it may be in respect to the original jurisdiction of admiralty courts, I see no valid reason why the right of a person to whom, under the municipal law governing the place of the transaction and the parties to it, the title to the chose in action survives, or a new right to sue is given for damages resulting from a tort, the admiralty courts, in the exercise of their jurisdiction in personam over marine torts, should not recognize and enforce the right so given." This case was decided on the 12th of February, 1881, and on the 21st of the same month Judge Brown, of the Eastern District of Michigan, in The Garland, 5 Fed. Rep. 924, held that a suit in rem could be maintained by a father for the loss of the services of his two sons, killed in a collision in the Detroit River. In his opinion he said: "Were this an original question, * * * I should feel compelled to hold that this libel could not be maintained. But other courts of admiralty in this country have furnished so many precedents for a contrary ruling, I do not feel at liberty to disregard them, although I am at loss to understand why a rule of liability differing from that of the common law should obtain in these courts." His decision was, however, finally put on a Statute of Michigan which gave an action at law for such damages.

In The Sylvan Glen, 9 Fed. Rep. 835, Judge Benedict, of the Eastern District of New York, dismissed a suit in rem on the ground that the Statute of New York giving an action for damages in such cases created no maritime lien. This case was decided on the 4th of October, 1881. At November Term, 1882, of the Circuit Court for the Eastern District of Louisiana, Judge Billings decided, in The E. B. Ward, Jr. 4 Woods, 145, S. C. 16 Fed. Rep. 255, that a suit in rem could not be maintained for damages for the death of a person in a collision [211] on the high seas through the fault of a vessel having its home port in New Orleans, as the Statute of Louisiana did not apply to cases where the wrongful act which caused the death occurred outside of the State. Afterwards, in June, 1883, Judge Pardee of the circuit court for the same district decided otherwise. The E. B. Ward, Jr. 17 Fed. Rep. 456. In his opinion he said (p. 459): "Upon the whole case, considering the natural equity and reason of the matter, and the weight of authority as determined by the late adjudicated cases in the admiralty courts of the United States, I am inclined to hold that the ancient common-law rule, 'Actio personalis moritur cum persona,' if it ever prevailed in the admiralty law of this country, has been so modified by the statutory enactments of the various States and the progress of the age, that now the admiralty courts 'are permitted to estimate the damages which a particular person has sustained by the wrongful killing of another,' and enforce an adequate remedy. At all events, as the question is an open one, it is best to resolve the doubts in favor of what all the judges consider to be 'natural equity and justice.'" He also was of opinion that, as the offending vessel was wholly owned by citizens of Louisiana, and the Port of New Orleans was her home port, the Louisiana Statute applied to her, and that the court of admiralty could enforce such a right of action in a proceeding in rem. See also The E. B. Ward, Jr. 23 Fed. Rep. 900.

The case of The Manhasset, 18 Fed. Rep. 918, was decided by Judge Hughes, of the Eastern Virginia District, in January, 1884; and in that it was held that a suit in rem could not be maintained by the administratrix against a vessel, under the Statute of Virginia which gave an action for damages caused by the death of a person, even though the tortious act was committed within the territorial limits of the State, but that the widow and child of the deceased man had a right of action, by a libel in rem, under the general maritime law, which they could maintain in their own names and for their own benefit. In so deciding the judge said: "The decision of Chief Justice Chase in the case of The Sea Gull, supra, establishes the validity of such a libel in this circuit. I would [212] maintain its validity independently of that precedent. Such a right of action is a maritime right, conferred by the general maritime law (Domat, Civil Law, pt. 1, bk. 2, tit. 8, § 1, art. 4; Grotius, lib. 2, c. 17, § 13; Ruth. Inst. 206; Bell, Prin. Sc. Laws, p. 748, § 2029; Ersk. Inst. bk. 4, tit. 4, § 105) and is not limited as to time by the twelve months' limitation of the state statute."

The last American case to which our attention has been called is that of The Columbia, 27 Fed. Rep. 704, decided by Judge Brown, of the Southern District of New York, during the present year. In giving his opinion, after referring to the fact that, as he understood, the question was then pending in this court, the judge said: "Awaiting the result of the determination of that court, and without referring to the common-law authorities, I shall hold in this case, as seems to me most consonant with equity and justice, that the pecuniary loss sustained by persons who have a legal right to support from the deceased, furnishes a ground of reclamation against the wrong doer which should be recognized and compensated in admiralty."

In Monaghan v. Horn, in Re The Garland, 7 Can. Sup. Ct. Rep. 410, the Supreme Court of Canada held that a mother could not sue in her own name in admiralty for the loss of the life of her son, on the ground that no such action would lie without the aid of a statute; and the Statute of the Province of Ontario, where the wrong was done, and which was substantially the same as Lord Campbell's Act, provided that the action should be brought in the name of the administrator of the deceased person. No authoritative judgment was given as to the right of an administrator to sue in admiralty under that Act. This was in 1882, before The Vera Cruz, supra, in the House of Lords.

Such being the state of judicial decisions, we come now to consider the question on principle.

It is no doubt true that the Scotch law "takes cognizance of the loss and suffering of the family of a person killed," and gives a right of action therefor under some circumstances. Bell's Prin. Laws, Scot. 7th ed. p. 934, § 2029; Cadell v. Black, 5 Paton, 567; Weems v. Mathieson, 4 Macq. 215. Such also is the law of [213] France. 28 Merlin's R. 442, verbo Reparation Civile, § IV; Rolland v. Gosse, 19 Sirey, 269. It is said also that such was the civil law, but this is denied by the Supreme Court of Louisiana in Hubgh v. N. O. & C. R. R. Co. 6 La. Ann. 495, where Chief Justice Eustis considers the subject in an elaborate opinion after full argument. A reargument of the same question was allowed in Hermann v. N. O. & C. R. R. Co. 11 La. Ann. 5, and the same conclusion reached after another full argument. See also Grueber's Lex Aquilia, 17. But however this may be, we know of no country that has adopted a different rule on this subject for the sea from that which it maintains on the land; and the maritime law, as accepted and received by maritime nations generally, leaves the matter untouched. It is not mentioned in the laws of Oleron, of Wisbuy, or of the Hanse Towns, 1 Pet. Adm. Dec. Appx., nor in the Marine Ordinance of Louis XIV., 2 Pet. Adm. Dec. Appx.; and the understanding of the leading text writers in this country has been that no such action will lie in the absence of a statute giving a remedy at law for the wrong. Ben. Adm. 2d ed. § 309; 2 Pars. Ship. & Adm. 350; Henry, Adm. Jur. 74. The argument everywhere in support of such suits in admiralty has been, not that the maritime law, as actually administered in common-law countries, is different from the common law in this particular, but that the common law is not founded on good reason, and is contrary to "natural equity and the general principles of law." Since, however, it is now established that in the courts of the United States no action at law can be maintained for such a wrong in the absence of a statute giving the right, and it has not been shown that the maritime law, as accepted and received by maritime nations generally, has established a different rule for the government of the courts of admiralty from those which govern courts of law in matters of this kind, we are forced to the conclusion that no such action will lie in the courts of the United States under the general maritime law. The rights of persons in [214] this particular under the maritime law of this country are not different from those under the common law, and as it is the duty of courts to declare the law, not to make it, we cannot change this rule.

This brings us to the second branch of the question, which is, whether, with the Statutes of Massachusetts and Pennsylvania above referred to in force at the time of the collision, a suit in rem could be maintained against the offending vessel if brought in time. About this we express no opinion, as we are entirely satisfied that this suit was begun too late. The statutes create a new legal liability, with the right to a suit for its enforcement, provided the suit is brought within twelve months, and not otherwise. The time within which the suit must be brought operates as a limitation of the liability itself as created, and not of the remedy alone. It is a condition attached to the right to sue at all. No one will pretend that the suit in Pennsylvania, or the indictment in Massachusetts, could be maintained if brought or found after the expiration of the year; and it would seem to be clear that, if the admiralty adopts the statute as a rule of right to be administered within its own jurisdiction, it must take the right subject to the limitations which have been made a part of its existence. It matters not that no rights of innocent parties have attached during the delay. Time has been made of the essence of the right, and the right is lost if the time is disregarded. The liability and the remedy are created by the same statutes, and the limitations of the remedy are, therefore, to be treated as limitations of the right. No question arises in this case as to the power of a court of admiralty to allow an equitable excuse for delay in suing, because no excuse of any kind has been shown. As to this, it only appears that the wrong was done in May, 1877, and that the suit was not brought until February, 1882, while the law required it to be brought within a year.

The decree of the Circuit Court is reversed and the cause remanded, with instructions to dismiss the libel.

ACALUS L. PALMER, Plf. in Err., [9

v.

ERWIN A. HUSSEY.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 96–99.)

Bankruptcy—claim of immunity under section 5117 R. S.—adverse decision by state court—this court has jurisdiction—certificate under section 5119 R. S., conclusive of fact and regularity of discharge—fraud—trust.

1. This court has jurisdiction of a writ of error to review the judgment of a state court against a claim of immunity, under section 5117, R. S., from the operation of a discharge in bankruptcy, because of the fraudulent and fiduciary character of the debt.

2. Under section 5119 R. S., the certificate of discharge in bankruptcy is conclusive evidence "of the fact and regularity of such discharge."

3. Upon the facts disclosed by the record this court holds, under its ruling in Hennequin v. Clews, Bk. 28, that there was no such fraud, or trust, in respect to the debt in question, as to bar the operation of the discharge.

[No. 445.]

Submitted Nov. 1, 1886. Decided Nov. 15, 1886.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of New York.

On motion to dismiss, (denied), with which is united a motion to affirm. Affirmed.

The history and facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Archibald W. Speir, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. Samuel W. Bower, for defendant in error.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court:

This record shows that on the 18th of April, 1874, Acalus L. Palmer recovered a judgment in the Supreme Court of New York against Erwin A. Hussey for $82,128.77 on account of certain bonds of the United States which had been placed in his hands by Palmer, and for which he bound himself by a writing, the material part of which is as follows:

"These bonds we hold subject to the order of A. L. Palmer, at ten days' notice, agreeing to collect the coupons for his account, free of charge, and to allow him two per cent per annum interest on the par value of said bonds, said interest to commence and count June 1, 1866; interest on the 7-30 bonds payable June and December 15; on 5-20 May and November 1.

"E. A. HUSSEY & Co."

[97] In the complaint it was alleged that the bonds "were received by the defendant from the plaintiff as his agent and broker, in a fiduciary capacity, upon the arrangement and agreement as contained" in the foregoing paper; "that the said defendant, without the authority or permission of the plaintiff, has fraudulently and willfully sold, disposed of, and misapplied the said bonds, and has refused to deliver up the same to the said plaintiff, who has frequently demanded the same from him, and given the notice so to do as required by the agreement." This was denied in the answer. The suit was begun September 7, 1868.

On the 20th of January, 1868, Hussey filed his petition in bankruptcy, and was duly adjudicated a bankrupt January 24. On the 17th of May, 1880, he received his final discharge. The record does not show when his application for a discharge was made to the bankrupt court. On the 12th of June, 1880, he moved the supreme court to perpetually enjoin the collection of the judgment in favor of Palmer because of his discharge. In his affidavit in support of this motion, and which presents the grounds of the relief asked, it is stated:

"That, among other grounds of objection to my discharge in bankruptcy made by the plaintiff, it was charged that I have been guilty of improper and undue delay in said proceedings. That that question was presented to the court and fully explained, and the court decided that I was not guilty of laches, and was entitled to my discharge."

In opposition to the motion the counsel of Palmer filed a counter affidavit setting forth the grounds of defense, and, among others, that the judgment was an adjudication that "The bonds were received in a fiduciary capacity," and were "fraudulently and willfully sold, disposed of, and misapplied by Hussey."

The supreme court, both at special and general term, denied the motion on the ground that the judgment on its face showed that the debt was created by fraud, and while Hussey was acting in such a fiduciary capacity as to prevent the discharge in bankruptcy from operating as a release. This order was reversed by [98] the court of appeals, and the execution of the judgment perpetually enjoined, because the fraud and trust established by the findings were not of a character to bar the effect of the discharge. To reverse that judgment this writ of error was brought, which Hussey now moves to dismiss because no federal question was raised or decided, and with this motion he has united a motion to affirm under Rule 6, section 5.

The motion to dismiss is denied. Palmer in his affidavit, which in this case takes the place of technical pleading, specially set up and claimed an immunity under section 5117 of the Revised Statutes from the operation of the discharge in bankruptcy, because of the fraudulent and fiduciary character of his debt, and the decision was against him. This gives us jurisdiction, since the exemption depends on the construction and effect of section 5117, which provides that "No debt created by the fraud * * * of the bankrupt, or * * * while acting in any fiduciary character, shall be discharged by proceedings in bankruptcy." As the affidavit of Hussey set forth the date of the adjudication in bankruptcy and the date of discharge, the question of delay in making an application, and the construction and effect of section 5108 may also, perhaps, have been raised on the record. The opinion of the court of appeals shows that both of these questions were actually presented to and decided by that court. Palmer v. Hussey, 87 N. Y. 303.

Upon the facts set forth in the affidavit of Hussey, which are not denied in the counter affidavit of the attorney of Palmer, and upon the facts as they appear in the record of the judgment to be enjoined, it is clear that, under the ruling of this court in Hennequin v. Clews, 111 U. S. 677 [Bk. 28, L. ed. 566], there was no such fraud in the creation of the debt, and no such trust in respect to the possession of the bonds by Hussey, as to bar the operation of the discharge.

By section 5119 of the Revised Statutes, the certificate of discharge is made conclusive evidence in favor of the bankrupt, 'of the fact and regularity of such discharge." We must presume, therefore, that the application was made within the time required by section 5108, or, if not, that any delay there may have been was satisfactorily explained before the discharge was granted. The certificate is conclusive on [99] this question.

As these are the only federal questions presented, and one has been already settled by our decision in Hennequin v. Clews, and the other needs no further argument, the motion to affirm is granted.

Affirmed.

NEW YORK, LAKE ERIE AND WESTERN RAILROAD COMPANY, Appt. [296]

v.

TOM NICKALS ET AL

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 296-311.)

Railroad corporations—"plan and agreement" for reorganization of the Erie Railway Company—directors may devote profits to improvements instead of dividends.

1. The provision of the "plan and agreement" for the reorganization of the Erie Railway Company (which was also contained in the articles of association of the new Company), that certain preferred stock should be issued "entitling the holders to noncumulative dividends, at the rate of 6 per cent per annum in preference to the payment of any dividend on the common stock, but dependent on the profits of each particular year, as declared by the board of directors," did not operate to deprive the directors of the discretion with which managing agents of corporations are usually invested when distributing the earnings of property committed to their hands.

2. The words "as declared by the board of directors" in this passage refer to "dividends," and not to "profits." The directors therefore had the power to devote the profits of any given year to improvements of the property to the exclusion of any dividend to the preferred stockholders.

3. The fact that the report of the directors to the shareholders and bondholders for the year 1880 showed "a net profit from the operations of the year of $1,790,620.71," does not enable the preferred stockholders to maintain an action against the Company for a dividend.

[No. 22.]

Argued Nov. 1, 2, 1886. Decided Nov. 29, 1886.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York. Reversed.

The case is stated by the court.

Messrs. William D. Shipman, B. H. Bristow and David Willcox, for appellant:

In no aspect can these preferred stockholders be deemed, either in law or equity, to be creditors or quasi creditors of the Company. Their relation to the Company is, pure and simple, that of stockholders. On this point the authorities are not only decisive, but in their scope and effect go further, and hold that where a party subscribes for and takes preferred stock, the payment for which is substantially a loan or advance of money to the company, he is still a stockholder and not a creditor. This has been repeatedly held where the stock was not only preferred, but dividends thereon at a given annual rate guarantied by the company issuing it.

Williston v. Mich. S. & N. I. R. R. Co. 13 Allen, 400; Taft v. Hart. Prov. & F. R. R. Co. 8 R. I. 310.

The phraseology of the thirteenth section of the plan and agreement is consistent with no other view. It places the holders of preferred stock in the same category as the holders of common stock, with only one qualification. It uses the words "dividends" and "dividend" in the same sense, and as equally applicable to both. The words, "as declared by the board of directors," are clearly used in the ordinary sense, and refer to the setting apart net profits for distribution through the declaration of a dividend. There is no such thing known in our law, or in the practice of our corporations, as a "declaration of profits," as distinguished from a declaration of dividends. The words, "as declared by the board of directors," refer to a formal, official and final act of the board on the subject matter. "Profits" are not in any official or legal sense "declared." As they may appear on the books, they are the result of the particular account of which they are the outcome. The account is made up by the bookkeeper or auditor and speaks for itself. A certification or repetition of the account, or its result, in a report does not change its status or quality, or the relation of the stockholders to the fund. In any other view the words, "as declared by the board of directors," have no meaning and perform no office.

See St. John v. Erie R. Co. 22 Wall. 136–148 (89 U. S. bk. 22, L. ed. 743–746); Warren v. King, 108 U. S. 389 (27: 769); St. John v. Erie R. Co. 10 Blatchf. 271, 279.

The complainants, therefore, being preferred stockholders entitled to dividends, and not creditors entitled to the payment of a debt, what are their rights in the eye of the law under the thirteenth section? The answer is that they have a right to be preferred to the common stockholders in the distribution of the profits. In other words, if the directors consider it proper, in view of the affairs of the Company as a whole, to declare any dividend, they must first declare one at the rate of 6 per cent, payable to the preferred stockholders. In administering the affairs of a corporation the directors have many implied powers, one of which is to determine whether a dividend should be declared or not, and at what rate. The law invests them with a discretion in this particular. If they deem it wise and prudent to accumulate a portion of the surplus earnings to meet future contingencies, or to apply them to the improvement of the property for its more efficient and profitable working and the better security of all concerned, including the bondholders and other creditors, the stockholders and the public, so far as their duty to the public is concerned, they have the right and power to do so. To this every stockholder, preferred as well as common, assents when he becomes an owner of shares.

Clearwater v. Meredith, 1 Wall. 25, 40 (68 U. S. bk. 17, L. ed. 604, 608); Morawetz, Private Corp. p. 351, § 348; Union Pac. R. R. Co. v. U. S. 99 U. S. 402 (25: 274).

This discretionary power of the directors must be exercised bona fide and in a reasonable manner, and within these limits the courts regard their action as final and do not disturb it.

Barnard v. Vermont & Mass. R. R. Co. 7 Allen, 521; Karnes v. Rochester & Gen. Val. R. R. Co. 4 Abb. Pr. N. S. 107; Culver v. Reno Real Est. Co. 91 Pa. 367; Richardson v. Vermont etc. R. R. Co. 44 Vt. 622; Stevens v. South Devon R. Co. 9 Hare, 313, 326.

Still further; the directors' report shows that the surplus over and above operating expenses and fixed charges has been expended upon improvements absolutely necessary to fully develop the business and economically operate the road. There are therefore no surplus profits arising from the business of the Corporation; for expenses such as these are a part of its business and are chargeable against the earnings before any dividends can be paid. They are liabilities which the directors are authorized to incur. According to well established rules, therefore, they must be discharged before anything is payable in dividends.

Mr. C. E. Tracy, for appellees:

The special contract of the articles of association overrides any discretionary power the directors might otherwise have.

Bates v. Androscoggin & Ken. R. R. Co. 49 Me. 491; Boardman v. L. S. & M. S. R. R. Co. 84 N. Y. 157.

Were it not for the expressions "noncumulative dividends," and "dependent on the profits of each particular year," the dividends in arrears would have to be made up before dividends could be paid on the common stock.

Prouty v. M. S. & N. I. R. R. Co. 1 Hun, 655; 85 N. Y. 272; Boardman v. L. S. & M. S. R. R. Co. supra; Henry v. G. N. R. Co. 4 Kay & J. 1; Matthews v. Same, 5 Jur. N. S. part 1, 284; Allen v. L. & E. R. R. Co. 25 Weekly R. 524; Dent v. London Tramway Co Eng. L. R. 16 Ch. Div. p. 353.

Such a provision or contract necessarily abrogates any discretionary power of the directors.

Barnard v. V. & M. R. R. Co. 7 Allen, 521; Richardson v. Same, 44 Vt. 613; West Chester etc. Co. v. Jackson, 77 Pa. 321; Scott v. Eagle Fire Ins. Co. 7 Paige, 198.

In the case at bar, there were certainly profits of the particular year, and the profits as such had been declared by the board of directors in their report to the stockholders. Every requirement of the contract had been thus complied with, for by no possible construction can the words "as declared by the board of directors," be held to relate to other than the "profits of each particular year." Similar language is used respecting the payment of interest on the "noncumulative income bonds," provided for in paragraph 19 of the articles of association; it is made dependent upon "the net earnings of" the Company for that year, as declared by the board of directors.

The reported cases upon the preferred stock of the appellant's predecessor company (Thompson v. E. R. R. Co. 42 How. Pr. 68, and St. John v. Same, 10 Blatchf. 271; S. C. 23 Wall. 136 (89 U. S. bk. 22, L. ed. 743) turn upon the intendment of the special clause or contract there appearing. They demonstrate, however, the proposition that preferred stock represents a contract, the extent and legal effect whereof depend upon the terms and conditions of the contract itself, as interpreted under the ordinary rules of law.

By the decree below it was adjudged, in accordance with the prayer of the bill, that the New York, Lake Erie and Western Railroad Company was required by its articles of association to declare a dividend of 6 per cent upon its preferred stock, for the year ending September 30, 1880, payable out of the net profits accruing that year from the use of its property, after meeting operating expenses, interest on funded debt, rentals of leased lines and other fixed charges. A judgment was rendered against it for $20,280—the amount which the plaintiffs would have received if a dividend had been made—with interest thereon from January 15, 1881, to the date of the decree, and also for their costs and disbursements. The cause was referred to a special commissioner to ascertain the names of all other parties entitled to receive similar dividends.

The case made by the pleadings, exhibits, and proofs is substantially as will now be stated.

The Farmers' Loan and Trust Company having commenced an action in the Supreme Court of New York for the foreclosure of two mortgages executed by the Erie Railway Company upon its line of railway, property, rights, privileges and franchises—one of September 1, 1870, to secure its obligations known as first consolidated mortgage bonds and sterling loan bonds, and the other of February 4, 1874, to secure its obligations known as second consolidated mortgage bonds and gold convertible bonds—and having also brought ancillary suits for the foreclosure of the same mortgages in the States of New Jersey and Pennsylvania, certain parties, on the 14th of December, 1877, entered into a plan and agreement for the readjustment of their rights in the mortgaged premises upon an equitable basis. Those constituting in that agreement the parties of the first part were holders of common and preferred stock of the Erie Railway Company, of coupons of the first consolidated mortgage and sterling loan bonds, and of bonds and coupons both of the second consolidated mortgage and gold convertible series. The parties of the second part, Edwin D. Morgan, John Lowber Welsh, and David A. Wells, were purchasing trustees. The agreement provided for co-operation in all proceedings for final foreclosures and sales in the respective States under the mortgage of February 4, 1874; for the purchase of the mortgaged premises and franchises by the trustees with bonds and coupons and other means to be placed at their disposal for that purpose by the parties of the first part; and for the organization by such trustees, in conformity with the laws of New York, of a new corporation, with an amount of stock not exceeding the then amount of the stock of the Erie Railway Company, and which should hold the property, rights and franchises so purchased, subject to six prior mortgages then resting upon the premises or upon part of them, including the first consolidated mortgage of September 1, 1870. The new Corporation was required, as the consideration for the property, rights and franchises purchased, to deliver to the parties of the first part its funded coupon bonds, bearing interest at 7 per cent in gold, to an amount equal in the aggregate to the coupons of the first consolidated mortgage to be funded by those parties; mortgage bonds, bearing 6 per cent interest in gold, to an amount equal to the principal of the second consolidated and gold convertible bonds held by the parties and secured by the mortgage of February 4, 1874—the back interest to be represented by funded coupon bonds. In reference to the sterling loan bonds, the agreement provided that they should be regarded as having been exchanged for the first consolidated mortgage [299] [300] bonds on the first of September, 1875, the coupons due on that day being funded at the rate of 6 per cent per annum as it stood previous to such assumed exchange.

The provisions of the plan and agreement which bear more or less upon the question before the court, are as follows:

"13. Preferred stock, to an amount equal to the preferred stock of the Erie Railway Company now outstanding, to wit: eighty-five thousand three hundred and sixty-nine (85,369) shares of the nominal amount of one hundred dollars each, entitling the holders to noncumulative dividends, at the rate of six per cent per annum, in preference to the payment of any dividend on the common stock, but dependent on the profits of each particular year, as declared by the board of directors.

"14. Common stock, to an amount equal to the amount of the common stock of the said company now outstanding; to wit, seven hundred and eighty thousand shares, of the nominal amount of one hundred dollars each."

"18. Preferred stock of the old company, in respect of which three dollars gold for each share has been or may be paid, and common stock of the old company, in respect of which six dollars gold per share has been paid or may be paid, may be exchanged for the new stock, in paragraphs 18 and 14 mentioned, share per share, preferred for preferred, and common for common, without any liability to make any further payment in respect of such new stock: Provided, however, That such new stock, whether common or preferred, shall be issued and held in conformity with and subject to the trust for voting hereinafter mentioned.

"19. In addition to the new common and preferred stock, the parties of the first part shall also receive for the amount of such payments, as mentioned in the last preceding paragraph, noncumulative income bonds, without mortgage security, payable in gold, in London and New York, on the first day of June, 1977, and bearing interest from December 1, 1879, also payable in gold, in London and New York, at the rate of six per cent per annum, or at such lesser rate for any fiscal year as the net earnings of the company for that year, as declared by the board of directors and applicable for the purpose, shall be sufficient to satisfy; these bonds to have yearly coupons attached.

"20. Preferred stock, in respect of which two dollars gold per share has been paid or may be paid, and common stock, in respect of which four dollars gold per share has been or may be paid, may be exchanged share for share, but in conformity with and subject to the said trust for voting, for new stock of like class, without any liability to make any further payment in respect of such new stock; but no income bonds or other obligation or security shall be issued or delivered in respect of such reduced payments.

"21. * * *; and all payments made or to be made in respect of old, preferred or common stock shall be deemed to be in consideration of the concessions and agreements made by the holders of the said first and second consolidated mortgage and gold-convertible bonds, the available funds resulting from such concessions being used for the improvement or increase of the property of the new Company.

"22. The stock of the new Company, both common and preferred, not required for exchange as above provided, may, with the consent of the parties of the first part, but not otherwise, be issued and disposed of by the Company for its own benefit, at such rates and upon such terms as to the said Company may seem proper. All moneys which have been or may hereafter be paid in respect of stock as above set forth, and which shall not be required for the purpose of carrying into execution this plan and agreement, shall be expended for the benefit of said new Company, or in the improvement or increase of its property, under the direction of the parties of the first part, and any balance not so expended shall be paid over to the said new Company."

The property and franchises in question were sold under decrees of foreclosure on the 24th of April, 1878, and were purchased by the trustees, subject to the before mentioned six mortgages. Immediately thereafter, on April 26, 1878, the purchasing committee and their associates organized the New York, Lake Erie and Western Railroad Company, in conformity with statutes providing for the reorganization of railroads sold under mortgage, and for the formation in such cases of new companies. Laws, N. Y. 1874, chap. 430; Id. 1876, chap. 446. The provisions of the before mentioned plan and agreement were set out in the articles of association. On the 9th of December, 1880, the board of directors submitted to shareholders and bondholders a report of the operations of the new Company for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1880, from which it appears that the gross earnings for that year were $18,698,108.86, while operating expenses were $11,643,925.85, leaving $7,049,188.51 as "net earnings from traffic." To this sum the report adds $783,956.65 "as earnings from other sources," making $7,833,140.16 as the total earnings for the year in question. From the last sum, $6,042,519.45 were deducted for "interest on funded debt, rentals of leased lines and other charges," leaving, in the language of the report, "a net profit from the operations of the year of $1,790,620.71." Referring to the latter sum, the report continues: "This amount, together with $737,119.34 received during the year from the assessments paid on the stock of the Erie Railway Company, has been applied to the building of double track, erection of buildings, providing additional equipment, acquiring and constructing docks at Buffalo and Jersey City, and to the addition of other improvements to the road and property."

[3

The theory of the present suit is that the sum of $1,790,620.71—ascertained to be the "net profit" derived from the operations of the Company for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1880, after paying operating expenses and fixed charges—constituted a fund applicable, primarily, to the payment of a 6 per cent dividend upon preferred stock. The use of that fund for any other purpose was, it is claimed, a breach of trust on the part of the Company and a violation of rights secured to preferred stockholders, both by the plan and agreement of December 14, 1877, and by the Company's articles of association. On the day the directors made their report to shareholders, they declared, by resolution, that in the then condition of the Company's property they did not "deem it wise or expedient to declare a dividend upon its preferred stock." It also clearly appears in evidence that the earnings for the year in question, after paying operating expenses and fixed charges, together with the amount realized from assessments paid on stock, were, in good faith, used in improving the Company's road and other property; that these improvements were in pursuance of a general plan marked out pending negotiations for reorganization; that the estimate of their extent and cost was made with reference to a general understanding that they would be commenced and carried to completion as rapidly as possible with money derived from assessments on stockholders, from concessions of interest by bondholders, from earnings of the Company, and from other sources; that the capacity of the

Company to make earnings with less expense than formerly in proportion to service rendered and therefore its ability to earn the net profit which it did in 1880, was due to the bettered condition of the road and its equipment arising from these improvements, "thus, in the increase of traffic, and in the reduction of expenses, producing this result of $1,790,620.71." The testimony of Mr. Jewett, the president of the Company, which is uncontradicted by any evidence in the record, is that the use of that fund in the way in which it was applied was imperatively demanded by the interests as well of creditors, shareholders, and bondholders, as of the public. In answer to the question, whether these expenditures increased the earning capacity of the road and diminished relatively the expense of doing business, he said: "In my judgment, if these improvements had not been made, and most judiciously made, the Company could not have paid its fixed charges; it would have again gone into bankruptcy and the entire interest of the stockholders been destroyed."

The court below adjudged, in effect, that the right to a dividend, for the year ending September 30, 1880, payable out of the "net profit" arising from the operations for that period, was absolutely secured to preferred stockholders both by the plan and agreement and by the articles of association. Such, it held, was the contract between the Company and the preferred stockholders, which the court was not at liberty to disregard. This, in our judgment, is an erroneous interpretation of both the agreement and the Company's charter. There is nothing in the language of either necessarily depriving the directors of the discretion with which managing agents of corporations are usually invested when distributing the earnings of property committed to their hands. As was said by the court, in Clearwater v Meredith, 1 Wall. 25, 40 [68 U. S. bk. 17, L. ed. 604, 608], "When any person takes stock in a railroad corporation he has entered into a contract with the company that his interests shall be subject to the direction and control of the proper authorities of the corporation to accomplish the object for which the company was organized." The directors of such corporations, having opportunities not ordinarily possessed by others of knowing the resources and condition of the property under their control, are in a better position than stockholders to determine whether, in view of the duties which the corporation owes to the public, and of all its liabilities, it will be prudent in any particular year to declare a dividend upon stock. While their authority in respect of these matters may, of course, be controlled or modified by the Company's charter, and while the power of the courts may be invoked for the protection of stockholders against bad faith upon the part of the directors, we should hesitate to assume that either the Legislature or the parties intended to deprive the corporation, by its managers, of the power to protect the interests of all, including the public, by using earnings when necessary, or when, in good faith, believed to be necessary, for the preservation or improvement of the property intrusted to its control.

The claim of the appellees is based mainly on the thirteenth article of the agreement of 1877. It is contended that, as the noncumulative dividends to which preferred stockholders were entitled was "dependent on the profits of each particular year, as declared by the board of directors," the intention was to require the declaration and payment of a dividend in every year when it should be officially declared that there were net profits from the operations of that year.

It is not without significance that the words just quoted from the preliminary agreement for organization are omitted from that paragraph of the articles of association which, in obedience to the requirement of the statute (Laws, 1876, chap. 446, § 1, subd. 2), specifies the rights of each class of stockholders. That paragraph provides that the holders of preferred stock shall be entitled to "noncumulative dividends at the rate of 6 per cent per annum in preference to the payment of any dividend on common stock." The omission, in that connection, of the words "but dependent on the profits of each particular year, as declared by the board of directors," gives some force to the suggestion of counsel that the contemporaneous construction of those words by the parties was, that they conferred no such right upon preferred stockholders as they now claim. Independently of this view, we are of opinion that the contention of appellees is not sustained by a reasonable construction of the agreement. That instrument did, indeed, provide for preferred shareholders being paid a dividend of 6 per cent before any dividend was paid to common shareholders. But it was not intended to confer upon the former an absolute right to a dividend in any particular year, dependent alone on the fact, or the official ascertainment of the fact, that there were profits in that year, after paying operating expenses and fixed charges. The words of the thirteenth article "as declared by the board of directors" do not qualify the words "dependent on the profits for each particular year." They should rather be read in connection with the preceding words, "noncumulative dividends, at the rate of 6 per cent per annum, in preference to the payment of any dividend on the common stock." Preferred stockholders of the old company, receiving in exchange preferred stock in the new Company, did not thereby become creditors of the latter. Their payments on account of old stock were in consideration of the concessions and agreements made by bondholders. In certain circumstances they also received income bonds. They were stockholders in the old corporation, and they held that relation to the reorganized Company. What was stipulated to be paid to them as holders of preferred stock in the new Company was not a debt, payable in every event out of the general funds of the Corporation, but a dividend, "as declared by the board of directors," and payable out of such portion of the profits as should be set apart for distribution among shareholders; noncumulative, because, "dependent on the profits of each particular year," and not to be fastened on the profits of succeeding years. That the parties contemplated a declaration of a dividend, and not a mere statement of net profits during a designated period, is made evident by the requirement that "dividends" to preferred stockholders should be paid "in preference to the payment of any dividend on the common stock." This language is not consistent with the theory that the holders of preferred stock were entitled to 6 per cent thereon simply because there were profits, and irrespective of any declaration of a dividend. A declaration of profits, as, in itself, and without further action by the directors, entitling shareholders to dividends, is unknown in the law or in the practice of corporations. Dividends are "declared" by some formal act of the corporation; the question whether there are or are not profits being settled entirely by the accounts of the company as kept by subordinate officers, not by the mere statement of directors as to what appears upon its books.

A different view would lead to results which sound policy would seem to forbid, and which, therefore, it is not to be supposed were contemplated by the parties. For, if preferred stockholders become entitled to dividends upon a mere ascertainment of profits for a particular year, the duty of the company to maintain its track and cars in such condition as to accommodate the public and provide for the safe transportation of passengers and freight would be subordinate to their right to payment out of the funds remaining on hand after meeting current expenses and fixed charges. Indeed, there is some ground to contend that, according to appellees' interpretation of the charter, the directors were not at liberty, in any year when the current receipts were in excess of operating expenses, to pay even interest on funded debt, or rentals of leased lines, before paying a dividend on preferred stock. We are of opinion, that while the agreement of 1877 and the articles of association sustain the claim of preferred stockholders to a 6 per cent dividend in [307] advance of common stockholders, the former are not entitled, of right, to dividends, payable out of the net profits accruing in any particular year, unless the directors of the Company formally declare, or ought to declare, a dividend payable out of such profits; and whether a dividend should be declared in any year is a matter belonging in the first instance to the directors to determine, with reference to the condition of the Company's property and affairs as a whole. As the evidence shows that the profits for the year ending September 30, 1880, were applied to objects that were legitimate and proper, and as the condition of the Company was not such as to make the declaration of a dividend a duty upon the part of the directors, we perceive no ground upon which the claim of the appellees can be sustained.

Attention is called by counsel to the language of the nineteenth article of the plan and agreement of reorganization, as throwing some light on the true interpretation of the thirteenth article. We do not think that that article aids the contention of appellees. The noncumulative income bonds, provided for in the nineteenth article, were to bear 6 per cent interest, or such lesser rate, "for any fiscal year, as the net earnings of the Company for that year, as declared by the board of directors and applicable for the purpose, shall be sufficient to satisfy." So far from these words aiding the contention of appellees, they tend to show that the directors had the right to determine whether the condition of the Company did not require a reduction of the interest. Such, we think, is the meaning of the words "and applicable for the purpose." The applicability of net earnings for interest on such income bonds could only be determined by them.

A case very much resembling this is St. John v. Erie R. Co., 22 Wall. 136, 147 [89 U. S. bk. 22, L. ed. 743–746]. Certain creditors of that company received preferred stock, in lieu of payment of their debts, under a clause of its charter providing that such stock should be entitled "to preferred dividends out of the net earnings of said road (if earned in the current year, but not otherwise), not to exceed 7 per cent in any one year, payable semi-annually, after payment of mortgage interest and de- [308] layed coupons in full." A preferred stockholder sought by suit to enforce full payment of his dividends from the net earnings, prior to any payment on account of new leases of roads, or of debts subsequently contracted for borrowed money used in the repair and equipment of the road, in paying rent on leased lines, and interest on the money so borrowed. The circuit court (10 Blatchf. 271) said: "What it (the stock) is entitled to is 'dividends,' and only 'dividends,' and they are of a defined and special character. It is entitled to nothing else. It has no privilege or priority by reason of being preferred stock, except in reference to stock that is not so preferred, that is, common stock. In reference to such common stock the preferred stock is entitled to its specified preferential dividends, and is not entitled to anything else in reference to anything." Upon appeal to this court it was held that the suit could not be maintained; that the takers of the preferred stock had abandoned their position as creditors and assumed that of stockholders, in which capacity they could claim dividends only when they were declared or should be declared; that they were only entitled to dividends out of the net earnings of the principal road and its adjuncts accruing in the current year; that, as the company had not agreed to be limited in the exercise of its faculties and franchises, it had the right to conduct its operations in good faith as it might see fit; and that the materials for the computation of its net earnings in any particular year were to be derived from all of its operations, viewing its business as a unit, and not from a part of its operations, or without reference to the necessary and legitimate purposes to which its current receipts might be applied for the benefit of all interested in the property. These principles were again applied in the analogous case of Warren v. King, 108 U. S. 389 [Bk. 27, L. ed. 769]. See also Union Pac. R. R. Co. v. U. S. 99 U. S. 402 [Bk. 25, L. ed. 274]; Barnard v. Vermont & Mass. R. R. Co. 7 Allen, 521; Williston v. Mich. S. & N. I. R. R. Co. 13 Allen, 400; Chaffee v. Rutland R. R. Co., 55 Vt. 110; Taft v. Hartford, P. & F. R. R. Co. 8 R. I. 310; Elkins v. Camden & Atlantic R. R. Co. 36 N. J. Eq. 233; Lockhart v. Van Alstyne, 31 Mich. [309] 76; Culver v. Reno Real Est. Co. 91 Pa. 367.

The views we have expressed are not inconsistent with the adjudged cases upon which appellees' counsel chiefly rely. A brief reference to some of them will be sufficient. In Dent v. London Tramway Co. 16 Ch. Div. 344, decided by Sir George Jessel, Master of the Rolls, at special term, the company increased its capital stock by an issue of shares of the same denomination as the prior shares, "bearing a preferential dividend of 6 per cent per annum over the present shares of the company, dependent upon the profits of the particular year only." There the question was whether the company was bound to pay preferred stockholders the amount of a dividend declared for the half year ending December 31, 1878, but which it has refused to pay, and also a dividend for the year 1879, which, it is to be inferred from the report of the case, ought to have been declared. The precise point determined is shown in these remarks of the court: "The argument of the company amounts to this, that inasmuch as they have improperly paid to their ordinary shareholders very large sums of money which did not belong to them, they, the company, are entitled to make good that deficiency by taking away the fund available for the preference shareholders, to an amount required to put the tramway in proper order. When the argument is stated in that way, it is clear that it cannot be sustained. The company either have a right to recover back from the ordinary shareholders any sums overpaid, or not. If they have a right, they must recover them; if they have no right to recover them, a fortiori they have no right to recover them from the preference shareholders, and, of course, still less right to take away the dividends from the preference shareholders."

It is scarcely necessary to say that the present case is entirely different from the one decided by the English court. No question was raised in the latter as to the authority and discretion of directors to use earnings for the improvement of the corporate property from year to year. In was, in effect, a contest simply between preferred and common stockholders. [310] The only point decided was that the payment of large sums of money to common stockholders, which should have been used in the repair of the tramway, was not a valid ground for refusing to pay preferred stockholders dividends to which they were entitled. To withhold dividends from preferred stockholders, in order to make good a deficiency caused by payments to common shareholders which ought not to have been made, was practically to destroy the right of preference. A different decision would have made the preferred shareholders pay what the company should have recovered from the common stockholders by suit.

The case of Richardson v. Vermont & Mass. R. R. Co. 44 Vt. 613, is also relied upon to support the decree below. There the question was as to the right to recover interest dividends on stock, to be paid in full at a specified date, if there was then sufficient money in the company's treasury. If there was not enough for that purpose, then as much should be paid as the amount in the treasury justified, the balance when the treasurer was able to make payment. The defense was that there was an adequate remedy at law and that the stock certificates were void. The certificates were held to be valid, the right to resort to equity was sustained, and the company was required to pay. The vital fact in that case distinguishing it from this one is that the company substantially admitted that it had funds applicable to the payment of the claims, if they should be held to be valid. Some of the general observations of the court seem to be in accord with the views we have expressed. "The mere fact," the court said, "of the corporation having funds in its treasury sufficient in amount to pay the orators, would not be sufficient to show the ability of the corporation contemplated in the vote and certificates. That ability must consist of a fund adequate not only for the payment of the claims of the plaintiffs in the cause, but for the payment of all other stockholders having like claims; and must be a surplus fund over and above what is requisite for the payment of the current expenses of the business, for discharging its duties to creditors, and over and above what reasonable prudence would require to be kept in the treasury to meet the accidents, risks and contingencies incident to the business of [311] operating the railroad. In other words, there must be such pecuniary ability as would, but for the obligation to pay this interest, justify the payment of a dividend to stockholders."

Our attention is also called to the case of Boardman v. L. S. & M. S. R. Co. 84 N. Y. 157. But it has no direct bearing on the questions before us. It only decides that the dividends provided for in the contract there in question were not only to be preferred, but, being guarantied, were cumulative, and a specific charge upon the accruing profits, to be paid as arrears, before any other dividends were paid on the common stock. "The doctrine," said the court, "that preference shareholders are entitled to be first paid the amount of dividends guarantied, and of all arrears of dividends or interest, before the other shareholders are entitled to receive anything; and, although they can receive no profits where none are earned, yet as soon as there are any profits to divide they are entitled to the same, is fully supported by authority." It thus appears that that was a contest between preferred and common stockholders. No questions arose as to whether the company, under the circumstances, could or could not, in their discretion, have withheld a declaration of dividend.

Without further discussing the questions involved or suggesting other grounds upon which our conclusion might rest, we are satisfied that the complainants are not entitled to recover.

The decree is reversed and the cause is remanded, with directions to dismiss the bill.

CHARLES H. HAPGOOD ET AL., Appts., [226]
v.
HORACE L. HEWITT.

(See S. C. Reporter's ed. 226-234.)

Invention by employee—right of employer to use, after patent issued to employee—implied license of employer, not transferable.

Upon a bill filed by an assignee against a former employee of the assignor for the purpose of compelling the transfer of a patent for an article invented by the employee while at work for the assignor, and to enjoin any action at law or in equity for infringement, held:

1. That under the contract of employment the employee was not expressly required to exercise his inventive skill for the benefit of his employer, and that at best the employer had a mere license to use the invention.

2. That such a naked license did not pass by the employer's assignment.

3. That a court of equity would not interfere to enjoin a pending or threatened suit at law to which there existed a perfect legal defense.

[No. 88.]

Argued Nov. 10, 11, 1886. Decided Nov. 29, 1886.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Indiana. Affirmed.

The case is stated by the court.

Messrs. E. W. Pattison and Newton Crane, for appellants:

1. Under the facts alleged in the amended bill the corporation of Hapgood & Company was the equitable owner of the patent issued to the defendant.

McClurg v. Kingsland, 1 How. 202 (42 U. S. bk. 11, L. ed. 102); Wilkins v. Spafford, 13 Pat. Off. Gaz. 675; Whiting v. Graves, 13 Pat. Off. Gaz. 455; Continental Windmill Co. v. Empire Windmill Co. 8 Blatchf. 295; S. C. 4 Fish. Pat. Cas. 428; Gower v. Andrew, 59 Cal. 119; Grumley v. Webb, 44 Mo. 444.

2. If the right which accrued to Hapgood & Company was only a license, that is sufficient to support the suit instituted by the trustees.

3. Such license is transmissible to the new corporation, the Hapgood Plow Company.

Brooks v. Byam, 2 Story, 525; Curt. Pat. 4th ed. 213; Wilson v. Stolly, 5 McLean, 1; Goodyear v. Cong. Rubber Co. 3 Blatchf. 449; Goff v. Oberteuffer, 3 Phil. 71.

1 Story, Eq. Jur. 669, 703; Hartford v. Chipman, 21 Conn. 488; Barber v. Barber, 21 How. 592 (62 U. S. bk. 16, L. ed. 229).

Messrs. E. E. Wood and Edward Boyd, for appellee.

[227] Mr. Justice Blatchford delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit in equity brought in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Indiana, by Charles H. Hapgood, James H. Hesse, and John Packer, trustees of Hapgood & Company, a dissolved Missouri corporation, and the Hapgood Plow Company, an Illinois [228] corporation, against Horace L. Hewitt. The main object of the suit is to obtain from Hewitt the transfer of letters patent granted to him for an invention. The defendant interposed a general demurrer to the bill, for want of equity. The circuit court sustained the demurrer and dismissed the bill (Hapgood v. Hewitt, 11 Biss. 184), and the trustees have appealed to this court.
